all laws, decrees, and ordinances of the Spanish or Mexican Governments relating to, or affecting, land titles or claims in California or New Mexico; and also certified copies of all memorials or petitions presented to the Supreme Government of Mexico, in relation to lands in said State and Territory while in possession of the said Republic, together with all documentary evidence touching said subject. And further, to obtain such other information, under the direction of the Attorney General, as may be useful in adjusting land claims before the board organized under the act of 3d March, 1851.

Mr. GEYER. I would like to be informed whether this agent is to go to Mexico for the purpose of obtaining the muniments of titles of individual claimants? Or, to what do these documents he is directed to procure relate? The evidences of title I should suppose the claimants themselves ought to produce. If there be any other documents which the agent can procure, under this section, I am not aware of it. It may be important to collect and translate these evidences for the information of the Commissioners and the Supreme Court of the United States, when that court shall have to act on any case which may be brought before it; but I cannot understand why an agent should be sent to collect evidences of title for individuals, at the expense of the Government. The language of the amendment seems to cover that object, and I wish to inquire whether it is desirable that a public agent should be employed for that purpose?

Mr. PRATT. I understand that it is the object of my friend, the Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, after having amended it so far as he thinks necessary. Am I right in making that statement?

Mr. WELLER. No, sir. I do not propose to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands. That committee reported the bill, and these are two additional sections.

Mr. PRATT. Then I was misinformed.

Mr. WELLER. The testimony I expect to obtain by sending such a commissioner to Mexico, is designed to save expense to the Government, as well as to promote the interests of the Government in other respects.

It is well known that many grants were made in California and New Mexico by the supreme Government of Mexico; and the evidence of such grants you must obtain in Mexico—you may search in vain for it in California. I propose, therefore, to send an agent there for the purpose of ascertaining the precise character of these grants, for I know that some have been made by the supreme Government of Mexico, of which we have no evidence at all in California. I am afraid, also, that the time will come when evidence will be manufactured in Mexico, for the purpose of bolstering up titles in California which have no real foundation. The sooner, therefore, you send an agent to Mexico, the sooner you will ascertain the facts in regard to the evidence that may be there, and the better you will secure the interests of our own Government. If you obtain nothing by sending out this agent, except the fact that there is nothing there at all, you will save an immense amount to the Government, for I am much afraid that titles will be manufactured in that country. The object of the amendment, therefore, is to send persons to Mexico to procure copies of all decrees and ordinances that may have been passed by the Mexican Government, in relation to these lands, and to obtain copies of all memorials presented to that Government, touching these grants. It is to supply that testimony which we cannot obtain elsewhere, and that in the decision of these cases, these commissioners may have before them all the evidence which it is possible to procure.

Mr. GWIN. This proposition has been maturely considered. It has been submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, and approved by one of the judges of the Supreme Court, the Secretary of the Interior, and also by the Committee on Finance. I have no doubt of the absolute necessity of this evidence, in order to secure justice in the decision of claims to land in California. I have authority for saying that the Supreme Court has postponed decisions in important land cases in other States for years, for the want of such information as will be collected, if this section of the bill passes. And I have reason to know, that unless the laws, ordinances, &c., authorized to be collected by this section, are furnished to the Supreme Court, the appeals on land claims from California will remain on the docket for years. The Supreme Court cannot decide upon a title, until all the evidences of title, and the laws under which they originated, are collected in the form proposed in this bill. In similar cases in other States, the court has refused to take them up for years, for want of such evidences of titles as it is now proposed to obtain.

Mr. DAVIS. If I understand the proposition precisely, it is the same which has once been before the Senate. I then listened to the discussion which took place, and I was very well satisfied that some measure of this description ought to be taken, for the obvious reason that the initiation of land titles is, to some extent, among the records of the Republic of Mexico, as I understand. There is no means of tracing up such titles to their origin except through these records. That is applicable, as I understand, to a certain extent, to titles in California. Is that so?

Mr. WELLER. It is so.

Mr. DAVIS. It is indispensable, if the courts are to be called upon to decide these questions of title, that the evidence should be produced; and I think it is more convenient to obtain that evidence now, and, as the Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] suggests, more safe that the titles should be investigated early, and that these documents, or copies of them, should be obtained and should be in the possession of the proper authorities in this country, to be disposed of as the public exigency may require. It seems to me eminently judicious and wise that this proposition should be carried out; and I apprehend, too, that there is some foundation for the suggestion thrown out by the Senator from California, and that if these matters are left to be managed according to the wits of men, it is not improbable that false papers may be manufactured in the Republic of Mexico, and become a source of serious difficulties hereafter. I think it is safer, and indeed that it is indispensable, that we should have this evidence in the early stages of the settlement of those countries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Was this bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I should be very glad to hear some explanation of it.

A SENATOR. The bill was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The Chair understands that the bill was first referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; that committee was discharged from its further consideration, and it was then referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WELLER. The whole bill came from the Committee on Public Lands, with the exception of two sections which I have had added to it.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, the bill, as originally presented to the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, consisted of but a single section. The object of that section was to secure payment for certain surveys in reference to private land claims in California. The committee added a clause in reference to that section, to act as a limitation upon it as originally introduced. The bill, as it now stands, as reported by the Committee on Public Lands, limits the payment out of the public Treasury, or out of what is known as the surveying fund, to a single instance, and that is, to the survey of the exterior limits of the private land claims when the private claims lie within the region where the public survey is going on. There are no actual marks or monuments of survey to those original claims under the Spanish and Mexican grants to be found. The consequence is, that in making the surveys, running the township lines, and other lines, where the land is subdivided in that country, the surveyor has no means of ascertaining when he arrives at a portion of country embraced within a private claim; and he can have no knowledge of that subject until the exterior lines be in some manner ascertained.

There was an application here to cause surveys to be made of all the private claims whenever they were presented to the board of commissioners. But the committee thought that, in one class of cases to which I have already referred, it was necessary that there should be some surveys, and that there need be none in other classes. They have, therefore, confined the surveys to cases where the private land claim is within the immediate vicinity of the surveys which are now progressing under the direction of the surveyor general; so that when, in surveying a large tract of country into townships, a private claim is found to lie in the vicinity, an application is made to the board, before whom the claim is presented, and the exterior line is surveyed—the line is ascertained by the surveyors. They then close in upon that line in making the exterior survey. It is true, that when the claim is finally adjusted, it may be that these lines of exterior survey may not be found to be the true lines of the grant; but it will be perceived at once that the necessity of something of this kind is manifest from this fact, that otherwise the surveys of the public lands would be continued across the private land claims. It will cost more money to continue the surveys across the private land claims, than to arrest them and survey the exterior boundary, and then close the lines upon the exterior survey. And that is the whole object and design of the bill.

It is not surprising that difficulties should be found both to private claimants and the public surveyors, in carrying on the surveys under these circumstances; but, by limiting it in this manner, it is believed that there will be much less expense than there would be if any other course were pursued.

The bill provides, as I before remarked, for payment from the surveying fund, that is, from the public Treasury, only in those cases which I have mentioned. The large class of private claims which are scattered over the country, from one end to the other, not in the immediate vicinity of the surveys now progressing, of course will not come under the provisions of this bill, as surveys will not there be made.

There is another provision made by the committee in reference to appeals to be taken from the decision of the board of commissioners on private land claims. It proposes to extend the time of taking appeals. The object of the provision in that respect is to secure greater facilities for appeals to be taken in those cases and to enable the parties to come up directly. It requires the action of the board, in preparing the papers necessary to take the appeal before the court where it may finally come to a decision, before the Supreme Court. The magnitude of these claims is evidently such that a large portion of them must inevitably be decided by the judicial tribunals of the country. My own opinion is, that the greater the facilities afforded for a decision before the court of last resort, the better it will be both for the public interests and for the claimants. I do not believe that they can be settled in any other manner.

There is also a provision introduced which repeals the operation of the former law requiring a deraignment of title to be produced in all instances before the board. It was found to be a matter of very little consequence to securing the rights of parties and the public, and at the same time it was found to be attended with very great inconvenience, and, in many instances, enormous expense to the claimant. These are the main features of the bill as it is presented.

Mr. WELLER. There is another important amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and which is, in my judgment, very necessary to the execution of the law of March 3, 1851. It is in regard to the taking of testimony. The act of 1851 provides that testimony may be taken before the board, or before any member thereof. Now, the act of 1851 gives to the board of commissioners all the vitality they have; and when that act attempts to point out a particular manner in which testimony may be taken it cannot be taken in any other way. One of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Public Lands is, that depositions may be taken, upon interrogatories and cross-interrogatories, before any person authorized by the laws of the State of California to administer oaths.

There is a difference of opinion upon this subject. There are some persons who believe, that under the law of 1851, testimony could have been taken in this way. But the general opinion of the profession has been, and the opinion of the board is, that testimony could only be taken before the board, or some member thereof. Now, as a consequence resulting from that practice, it sometimes requires eight or ten days to take the deposition of a single witness. Oftentimes these witnesses are in a distant part of the State, old and infirm, and the board sit in the city of San Francisco; so that it was utterly impossible to bring witnesses from the greater portion of the State, in order to have their testimony taken.

The amendment to which I allude obviates that difficulty, by authorizing the taking of depositions, by interrogatories filed, in any portion of the State, before any person who is authorized by the laws of the State to administer oaths. It is of the greatest importance, in my judgment, that that provision of the bill should be passed at once, in order to enable the board of commissioners to facilitate the business of adjusting these claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GEYER. I ask that the last amendment be reserved, and that the question be taken separately upon it.

Mr. FELCH. I ask also that the amendment made to the sixth section, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, as to the salary of the assistant law agent, be reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If such is the pleasure of the Senate, the question on those amendments will be reserved.

Mr. PRATT. There is one section in the bill, as reported by the committee, to which I ask the attention of my friends from California. It strikes me that it would be extremely injudicious to adopt the principle which is contained in the section to which I allude. Under the original act, testimony could only be taken before one of the commissioners. The land in California either belongs to the United States, or it belongs to individuals. For the protection of the United States, it was provided in the original act, that testimony, in reference to the title to private claims, should only be taken before one of the commissioners. The bill, as reported by the committee, proposes to alter the original act, by allowing testimony to be taken in the country, before any one authorized to administer an oath—before a justice of the peace, a notary public, or anybody else—upon interrogatories filed by the claimant.

Now, suppose a case arises. A valuable territory is in question. It belongs to the United States, unless it belongs to some private claimant. The private claimant, instead of taking his testimony, as the original law provided, before the officers appointed by the United States, is authorized by this bill, if it passes, to go before some justice of the peace, file his interrogatories, and the United States will not be represented, unless it be upon interrogatories filed. The answers taken in this way before these magistrates, are to be returned as evidence of the title of these private individuals. I apprehend a great deal of evil will result to the United States from this course of examination. The Government, in nine cases out of ten, will not be represented at all; and this will put it in the power of private claimants to collect only such testimony as may be collected to corroborate their own claim, which will be determined in this way. There will not ordinarily be any cross-interrogatories filed at all. There will be no examination with regard to the credibility of witnesses, and the United States will not be protected at all by the clause which has been adopted. I therefore ask that the vote be taken separately on that section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that it would be better to take the question on each amendment separately; and then Senators can discuss each as it comes up.

Several SENATORS. Agreed!

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, as the second, third, and fourth sections, were concurred in.

The next amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was read, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the board of commissioners for the ascertaining and settling the said private land claims may authorize and direct the clerks of the said board to superintend the taking of depositions to be used before the said board whenever the law agent or assistant agent cannot attend the taking thereof. The said board, upon the application of any claimant, or of the law agent, under this act and the act of which this is amendatory, may direct a commission to issue to take depositions before any officer authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths; in all which cases written interrogatories shall be filed before said board at least forty days before the time fixed for taking said depositions; and cross-interrogatories if desired, shall be filed before said board within twenty days after the filing of the aforesaid interrogatories. The depositions thus taken shall be carefully sealed up, and transmitted by the officer taking the same, to the secretary of the said board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this amendment.

Mr. PRATT. That is the section to which my objection obtains. I notice, from the reading of it, that there is an additional objection to it, which I did not urge before. By the original act, there was a law officer of the Government who was to take this testimony—who was to be present, in order to examine and cross-examine witnesses who were to be produced on the part of the private claimants. Now, the amendment proposes to alter the act of 1851 by substituting any one of the clerks of the board in place of the law agent of the Government. That is an additional objection, it seems to me, to the one which I urged a short time ago. The act of 1851 was intended to protect the Government, first, by the appointment of a law agent, who should be the law officer of the Government, to conduct this examination; secondly, that the examination itself should be taken before the commissioners appointed by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, I confess I have not been able to discover the force of the objection urged by the honorable Senator from Maryland against the fifth section of the bill, unless it be admitted that a man is much more apt to commit perjury in the State courts than in the Federal courts. I cannot discover there is any force in his argument, unless it be admitted that this board of commissioners, being Federal officers, have the power to administer an oath in such a way that a man would not be so apt to commit perjury as if that oath were administered by one of the State judges. Now, what is there in the amendment? It is simply a proposition that this testimony, which is to be introduced before the board of land commissioners, shall be taken under oath—that all the solemnities which the law usually imposes upon human testimony shall be imposed upon that upon which the commissioners are called to adjudicate these claims. Under the old law there is a provision that the testimony shall be taken before the board of commissioners, or some member thereof, in the presence of the law agent. The effect of that provision was, that you could only take one deposition at a time, because there being but one law agent, he was compelled to be present at the taking of the whole testimony. Oftentimes ten, and in some cases, to my own knowledge, fifteen days were consumed in the taking of a single deposition. If they were to go on in that way under the old law, I venture the prediction that it would take at least fifteen years to pass upon the land titles which have been already presented to the board.

The object of this amendment which is proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, is simply to authorize the taking of testimony before any tribunal authorized by the laws of the State of California to administer oaths. The section provides that the law agent or assistant law agent—for you create one under this bill—shall be present at the taking of these depositions; or, in the discretion of the board of commissioners, one of the clerks may be authorized to superintend the taking of that testimony. What is the objection to that? If this bill passes, there will be a law agent and assistant law agent. There are already five clerks. Any one of these clerks may be deputized by the board of commissioners to attend before any person authorized to take testimony in any portion of the State of California.

I apprehend that these land commissioners, looking to the interests of the General Government, will take care to send the law agent, or assistant law agent, or some competent person, to take the testimony, wherever testimony is to be taken which is material in the adjudication of a claim. Suppose a claim be presented—and there are many of them—from the county of San Diego, the extreme southern county of the State, portions of it lying at a distance of eight hundred miles from San Francisco, where the board of commissioners meet. Suppose there are witnesses in that section of the State, whose testimony is important only to prove the possession of the property on the part of the claimant, or some other matter, which is not very material as to the title. That witness may be an old or infirm person, and it may be utterly impossible for the claimant to get him up to the city of San Francisco, where the land commissioners are in session, and that claimant must then necessarily be deprived of the benefit of this testimony. Now, is there any justice in that? If there be an officer in that portion of California—in San Diego county—who is authorized to administer oaths, wherefore, I ask, is there any impropriety in filing interrogatories, and cross-interrogatories before the board of commissioners, and ordering that testimony to be taken?

The Senator from Maryland says that the object of the original provision was to guard against perjury. You can guard against perjury as well by requiring the party to swear before the local authorities as before the Federal authorities. I know that all the profession who have been engaged in this business in the city of San Francisco, have petitioned for this very amendment which is now proposed by the Committee on Public Lands. I have seen a memorial, signed by every one of the counsel who are now engaged in the prosecution of these claims before the board of land commissioners, and signed, also, by the law agent, calling upon this Government so to amend the law as to make the act of 1851 a practicable one. From my own knowledge of the transaction of business before the board, I may well say that, unless this amendment be made to the law—if you continue to take the depositions under the act of 1851, fifteen or twenty years will be necessarily consumed in the adjustment of these land claims. Of course, it is to the interest, not only of the Federal Government, but of the State Government, that all questions connected with the title to lands in California, should be settled as speedily as possible. It is to the interest of the Government; it is to the interest of the emigrant, who is daily settling on these lands, which may be owned by private claimants. It is, therefore, in order to facilitate the settlement of these claims—in order that these questions may be decided at once, that it becomes necessary to authorize depositions to be taken in some other way than that provided by the old law.

Mr. GWIN. I am not opposed to this section of the bill, but I think it proper that I should explain why the act of 3d of March, 1851, is supposed to have proved deficient, and requires the amendment proposed. It was expected, when that law passed, that the board of commissioners would go through the country; that they would go where these land claims were. The first thing which they did when they got to California, was to decide that they would remain at San Francisco, inasmuch as the Government had not made any provision to pay their expenses for holding sessions of the board in various portions of the State.

The delegation of the State applied to the Secretary of the Interior, and have finally obtained an order for the commissioners to go from point to point, to accommodate the land claimants, as they should, and no doubt would have done at first, but for the unwise economy of the last Congress in failing to allow the necessary expenses of the board. It was proposed as an amendment to the act of the 3d of March, 1851, by a Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Benton], no longer a member of this body, that the board should be required to hold sessions at various specified points in the State; but I looked upon it so much as a matter of course that the President would require them to hold their sessions where the claims were, that I opposed the amendment. I did not think it possible that any board of commissioners would come to any other conclusion but that they were to travel through the country wherever the claims were; but it seems that the present board did come to another conclusion, and it was with great difficulty we could get an order for them to go from one part of the State to another. The former Senator from Missouri [Mr. Benton] proposed an amendment to the act above referred to, making it the duty of the board of commissioners to sit at San Diego, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, Monterey, San José, Sonoma, and other places, and take testimony; but that was not agreed to by the Senate for the reasons above stated. I presumed, at that time, that the President would conceive this to be the duty of the commissioners, and issue orders accordingly. They have not traveled over the country; and hence, I am in favor of increasing the number of officers to some limited extent, before whom the testimony may be safely taken; but I am entirely opposed to any construction of the original law that will release the President from the obligation of ordering the commissioners to hold their sessions in various sections of the State.

As my colleague has stated, a number of members of the bar of San Francisco have petitioned for an increase of the number of officers before whom testimony may be taken. No doubt these gentlemen would like very much to have the board sit all the time in San Francisco, because they would then get control of the business before the commission; but when the commissioners go from one section of the State to another, the difficulty which the board has labored under, while sitting at San Francisco, will be, in a great degree, removed. At the same time, I am in favor of extending the power of taking testimony to other officers, as my colleague has proposed, with secure guards to provide against loosely taking evidence that may be produced to confirm fraudulent claims. I shall not oppose his proposition, but I have thought it proper to state why there was a limitation in the original law. That limitation was inserted with the understanding that the board of commissioners would go from point to point throughout the State, and would not render it necessary to bring witnesses from great distances, and for the additional reason that there should be the most rigid examination, when oral testimony or unofficial papers were necessary to sustain a claim for land. Too many guards cannot be thrown round the taking of testimony of this kind. Land claims that rest in whole or in part upon oral or unofficial written testimony, should be passed upon with the greatest caution.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, it was my misfortune, perhaps, in the course of the remarks which I made, to be not understood by my honorable friend from California, [Mr. WELLER.] I will, however, endeavor to make myself understood by the Senate. The original law attempted to protect the United States by two means—first, that all the examinations of testimony should be taken before commissioners appointed by the United States; and secondly, that the examination of witnesses should be conducted by the law officers of the Government.

Now, the proposition upon our table to which I object, annuls both of these muniments of protection which were thrown around the United States by the original act; for in place of the board of commissioners taking testimony, it is to be taken before any magistrate, or any person authorized by the laws of California to administer an oath. In the next place, the examination of witnesses is to be conducted, under the proposed amendment, by any clerk of the board, instead of a law officer of the Government. I submit to the good sense of the Senate whether there is not force in the objection that the United States are not protected by this mode of examination as they were protected by the original law? Will any one tell me that an examination taken before a magistrate, a one-sided examination, to which the United States are not parties at all, and where they are not represented by anybody, or if represented, where they are represented by a clerk not a lawyer—a person not capable of making an examination as reliable as one under the original law? I do not say that the witnesses will be more apt to commit perjury by being examined before a State tribunal, than before a Federal tribunal; but by having a cross-examination made in person by the law officer of the Government, you may get information which may be important to the United States; you may be able to get, in legal form, in this way, the precise facts of the case. That is prevented if you pass the amendment to which I have made objection. If that amendment be adopted, any private claimant in California can go before a magistrate in any remote part of the State, eight hundred or one thousand miles away from where the board sits, collect his witnesses, and have an ex parte examination there; and that is to be returned as the evidence of title upon the part of the individual as against the United States. Would not the United States be better protected if that examination were conducted before a commissioner and by the law officers appointed by the United States? Now, if my honorable friend cannot see the force of the objection, I think it is not my fault, but his.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, I do not think that I misunderstood the honorable Senator from Maryland. The amendment simply authorizes the board of commissioners to direct one of the clerks of the board, whenever the law agent or the assistant law agent cannot attend to the taking of depositions, to attend and take them. I believe there are five clerks of this board, and they are all gentlemen of the legal profession; they are all lawyers; they are all, I apprehend, competent to elicit the truth upon the examination of a witness. And, in order to guard against this loose manner of taking testimony, to which the Senator alluded, there is a provision that the interrogatories and cross-interrogatories shall be filed before the board of commissioners within a certain time.

Now, suppose that, upon the filing of these interrogatories and cross-interrogatories, the fact is discovered that the testimony of the witness is not very material; that it relates to the mere question whether the party occupied the premises at a particular date. In that case the board of commissioners would say at once, "It is unnecessary to send our law agent there; it is unnecessary to send either of these clerks there." But if, upon the filing of those interrogatories, it appears that the testimony about to be taken was material, and might affect seriously the interest of the Government, the board of commissioners, representing the Government, would take care that the law agent, or some competent person, should be dispatched to take that testimony.

I ask the gentleman what fraud can be practiced here? The board of commissioners are there for the purpose of watching the interests of this Government. There is the law agent; there is the assistant law agent. Whenever these interrogatories show upon their face—and they have to be filed forty days before the deposition is taken—that the testimony about to be introduced is material, is it not reasonable to suppose, that these commissioners, looking to the interests of the Government, will be careful to send an agent fully qualified to take the testimony? This is the objection which the gentleman urges; and I hold that there is no force in his argument, unless it be admitted that there is something peculiar about the imposition of an oath by a Federal judge, which does not apply to a State judge. If the testimony of a witness is to be taken in the county of Los Angeles, or in the county of San Diego, the materiality of the testimony will be shown to the board of commissioners by the filing of the interrogatories; and it is the duty of the agent of the Government to superintend the taking of the testimony, if he holds that the interests of the Government are about to be involved. What is the objection to that?

The section provides, that the board of commissioners "may authorize and direct" the clerks of the board to superintend the taking of the testimony—they "may" do it. I suppose they would exercise the discretion which is vested in them by this fifth section, whenever the interrogatories showed that the testimony was immaterial. Oftentimes testimony is introduced as a mere matter of form. A large mass of testimony will sometimes be introduced before the commissioners, which is not material in deciding upon the justice or the injustice of the claim. In all such cases, where the testimony is a mere matter of form, or where the fact to be elicited is immaterial, as a matter of course, an examination could as well be conducted by one of the clerks as by the law agent. If you have five clerks, and they professional men, and two law agents, and they learned in the law, and skilled in the Spanish language, as this act requires, I hold that the interests of this Government will be sufficiently guarded, and that there will be no danger of fraud being perpetrated by private claimants.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, by what particular practice known to California, my friend from California infers that these commissioners could ascertain the importance of testimony, before that testimony was taken, I leave it to the Senate to judge. The answer of the Senator to my argument is, that these commissioners will know, by the interrogatories filed, whether the testimony thus taken is or is not of importance; and, if they find by the interrogatories that the testimony is to be important, they will send the law agent to make the examination. Now, how on earth they are to ascertain, from the filing of the interrogatories, whether the testimony is or is not to be important, I frankly admit that I cannot conceive. Here would be the interrogatories: "Do you know such a tract of land?" "Have you any knowledge in reference to the title to that land?" These are interrogatories which will probably be put in every case. How could the commissioners understand, by the filing of such interrogatories, that the testimony would or would not be of importance?

There is another objection to the amendment, to which I desire the attention of the colleague [Mr. GWIN] of my worthy friend from California. Under the present law, these commissioners are obliged to go into the different sections of the State for the purpose of adjudicating these land titles. Now, I submit that, practically, this amendment will repeal that obligation. The commissioners sit now in San Francisco. If, then, they are to take testimony by interrogatories in different portions of the State, there will be no necessity for them to go into different portions of the State. If this provision is made, of course they will not go to the great inconvenience of traveling eight hundred or a thousand miles; because, if the amendment be adopted, there will be no necessity for it; but they will sit permanently in San Francisco, and have migratory clerks, magistrates, and so on, who are to settle and bind the United States as regards the title to this valuable territory in California. I do think that this proposition ought not to prevail.

Mr. DAWSON. I would suggest to the Senators from California whether it would not be better to postpone the further consideration of this subject, and allow time for the introduction of a clause into the bill—in lieu of the one proposing a change in the manner of taking testimony—so as to require of the board of commissioners to sit in various parts of the State.

Mr. PRATT. That is the law now.

Mr. WELLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is not the law now.

Mr. PRATT. I understood the gentleman's colleague to say that it was.

Mr. WELLER. No, sir; he said that an order had been given by the President to that effect.

Mr. GWIN. The President of the United States can order the commissioners wherever he pleases. When the original bill was under consideration, a Senator from Missouri [Mr. Benton] proposed that the commissioners should sit in certain districts, naming them. He proposed to make it imperative on them. I stated at the time that I was confident the President would order them to these points. In his amendment, Mr. Benton named the time and place of assembling the board, and I know great inconvenience might result from having the board sit at one place at a time when it might be proper to order it to another. But the commissioners determined to sit at San Francisco until provision was made to pay their expenses for traveling from place to place, and it was with great difficulty the California delegation could obtain an order for them to go from one part of the State to another.

Mr. DAWSON. My object is to introduce a provision satisfactory to the State of California, and that I think can be done only by dividing the State off into districts, and requiring the commissioners to go on circuit from place to place for so many days, or so many months, in order that the witnesses may all be brought before the commissioners. This mode of introducing testimony by way of interrogatories is an innovation upon the established rule. It is very often deceptive, and may lead us into error.

The reason why the section alluded to was introduced in the original bill two years since was this: California was settled by a population whose language we did not understand, and the character of whose people, before our race went there, we did not well know. Take such a tract of land as the Mariposa grant: Suppose the testimony upon which it should be decided in favor of a private claimant should be taken before an alcalde—a Mexican, who did not understand a word of the English language, who could not translate the Spanish language into English, so that it could be communicated to the board of commissioners. It was to avoid any misinterpretation by the person who should be appointed linguist, as well as that the facts might be fairly presented before the commissioners, that the Senate, at that time, settled down on this idea: The commission will be composed of competent gentlemen who will understand the Spanish language in some degree. Having the witnesses before them, they can soon see their character and ascertain the reliability to be placed upon them, and the Government will thus be protected against combinations.

My friend, the junior Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] hinted that there were various titles which might be manufactured there. We all know that is the case in every new country. All these titles have to be investigated, or they may be imposed upon the United States so as to supersede our just rights. This may be done by combinations of men; and when these titles are to be sustained, the combination will be ready with their witnesses; and unless we make proper provisions there will be no opportunity of discovering these transactions. I do not make any charge against California, but we know these things do occur, and the object we had in view when we passed the original bill was to prevent such things.

I go this far: I will appropriate any amount of money that may be necessary to authorize these commissioners to go from place to place, to make it convenient to the State of California. I am sure that the senior Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] from the suggestions that he made, is in favor of the position which I occupy. Make these commissioners travel over the State of California, increase their salary, and pay the cost of their transportation, if you will. Require them to go from point to point; to sit from time to time at different places, and see the men who are to testify against the rights of the United States. We should relax no rule by which testimony is to be obtained. We should endeavor to get at the truth. The plan proposed in this amendment seems to me to be a very lax one. I do not know that there is so loose a method of obtaining testimony in any State. There are no questions half so important to the Government as those which will arise in California. Millions of acres claimed under Spanish and Mexican grants will be submitted by claimants for adjudication before these commissioners. The better plan, I think, is to arrange the matter in such a way that there can be no imputation against the honesty of the parties, and where a decision shall be made satisfactory to all. I again repeat, that I think it would be better to postpone this bill until to-morrow. If it be postponed I shall be willing to vote to take it up at any moment, and agree to a section such as I have suggested to meet the views of the senior Senator from California.

Mr. WELLER. I cannot see what will be gained by postponing the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow. Nor can I see how the taking of testimony before one of the land commissioners is better calculated to elicit the truth than testimony taken before any other person. My friend from Georgia assumes (for it is a mere assumption) that these land commissioners understand the Spanish language. Why, sir, they know nothing of the Spanish language. I admit they ought to know it. I believe further, that none of the three land commissioners know anything of the civil law, unless they have picked up a little knowledge of it since their appointment as land commissioners. They were, all three of them, common-law lawyers. All of us know that those educated as common-law lawyers generally know very little of the civil law. These land commissioners are to pass upon these questions under the civil law with all the testimony, or a large portion of it, in the Spanish language, and all of the original papers in the Spanish language!

Now, sir, I grant you, that if these commissioners thoroughly understood the Spanish language, the bringing a witness to testify in that language before one of the commissioners would better enable him to get at the truth, than if that testimony were taken before some person entirely ignorant of that language; but in this particular case there is no force in the argument, for the reason that these land commissioners do not understand that language.

If it be the desire of any considerable portion of the Senate to postpone the consideration of the subject to some future day, or if there be any Senator who desires to examine this particular question before he is called upon to vote, I shall not hesitate to give my consent; but I do confess that I am oftentimes very much inclined to doubt the friendship of the Senator from Georgia, so far as California is concerned. I am very much inclined to doubt his liberality towards California, and I cannot consent to let the bill go over merely on his request.

Mr. DAWSON. I am very sorry that my friend from California should intimate that I have been illiberal to that State. No one is disposed to be more liberal than myself. I would like to know what the honorable Senator understands by liberality to his own State? Has he thought for a moment of the extent of the liberal grants to that State? She has possession of all of the public lands, and all of the gold mines, just as much as if we had said to her, "Take them, if you please." We have not limited her—we have not restricted her by any law of the United States. We have passed almost every bill which the Senators for that State have presented, and I have voted for a great many of them; but when you come and ask us to violate a principle which goes to consummate, as I believe, a great deprivation of the rights of the United States, I must interpose.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, I should be very sorry, at this late hour of the day, to enter into a discussion as to the liberality of Congress, or the Executive branch of the Government, towards California. If I should go into that subject, I might be able to demonstrate that there is no State in this Union which has been more shamefully neglected than the State of California. It is true there has been sometimes liberality upon the part of Congress; but whenever there has been liberality here, the conduct of the Executive Department of the Government has been such as to rob us of all the fruits of that liberality. Nearly two years ago Congress made a liberal appropriation for the construction of light-houses upon the Pacific coast. Not a dollar of it has been expended by the Executive Department of the Government. Some three or four weeks ago, for the first time, a contract was entered into for the construction of those light-houses; and yet the Senator from Georgia asserts that the Federal Government has been extremely liberal to the people of California! Why, sir, you have done nothing towards their custom-house. You are collecting more than three millions of revenue per annum there, and you have not yet taken the necessary steps to protect the commerce on that coast, or give to California even a custom-house or a marine hospital. You sent an agent out there, and he went about the country for a considerable time, and then came back; but nothing was done.

You have left the people of California to protect themselves against the Indians. You have had as many as eight men stationed at the mouth of the Gila, to afford protection to the great body of emigrants, and people on the frontier; and all this the Senator from Georgia considers is extreme liberality! Now, I confess that although my friend from Georgia has a great appearance of candor and liberality, so far as California is concerned, I have not yet found, when it came to acts, that that Senator backed his words. He has not at all times stood by us as I desired he should. I say this with all proper respect. I have no doubt the Senator from Georgia thinks he is doing what his duty to his constituents demands that he should do; but at the proper time I shall endeavor to demonstrate that there is no people now within the limits of the United States who have been more shamefully treated, not only by the legislative but by the executive branch of this Government, than the people of California. If I cannot demonstrate that, I will admit I have been laboring under a gross delusion.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, there is a legal question involved in this amendment, which I desire to state for the consideration of the Senate. I would ask the Senator what power has the Government of the United States to impose an obligation upon the State authorities to take testimony in cases in which the United States are interested?

Mr. WELLER. I grant you that the General Government cannot compel the State authorities to take testimony; but it may authorize them to do it; and if the State authorities take that testimony, I apprehend it would be legal. But I admit that the Federal Government has not power to order the State governments to take these depositions.

Mr. PRATT. Here, then, might be the result: Parties might go to a magistrate who may be in their favor, living in the locality. He may take testimony to-day favorable to the claimant, and if the United States come to-morrow with opposing testimony, the Senator admits they could not compel him to take that testimony. Now this is unexampled to me. There is no such provision in my own State, nor, so far as I know, in any State, providing that testimony to be used in the Federal courts shall be taken by State officers. I have always thought it was the practice to have Federal officers to take testimony which was to be used in the Federal courts. There are commissioners appointed for that purpose. I am not aware of any case in which testimony to be used in the Federal courts is taken before the local authorities. The result will be—the Senator admitting, as he must admit, that we cannot impose the obligation on the State authorities to take the testimony—that they may not take such testimony as may be offered by the United States, and therefore, in that aspect of it, it would be unquestionably deleterious to the interests of the Government.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have some difficulty in voting for the fifth section, which is the question now before the Senate, owing to what I consider its obscurity—though that may arise from my not understanding the entire object in view, which the honorable Senator from California may be able to explain to me. I refer to the mode of taking testimony which is to be substituted for that provided in the original act. The original act, as I understand from the Senator from Maryland, for I have not examined it, provides that testimony shall be in all cases taken before the commissioners. The proposition here is, in the first part of the fifth section, to authorize the clerks of the board, by the authority of the commissioners, to superintend the taking of depositions to be used before the board whenever the law agent or agents do not attend to the taking of them. I do not object to that portion. Then the section goes on to provide that commissions may be issued by the board to take depositions which it is provided may be taken upon written interrogatories, and commissions may be issued to "any officer authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths."

I do not know exactly, taking the whole scope of the section into consideration, whether it is intended that there shall be any questions put to witnesses under these commissions other than those contained in the written interrogatories. If it is not intended that any other question shall be put, then of course there could be no superintendence in taking the testimony at all, on the part of the clerks. But the commissioner alone is authorized to put the interrogatories according to his own judgment. No other person can interfere. Cross-interrogatories will be filed, I presume, by the law agents of the Government on the one side, or, where the commission was asked by the Government, by the private claimant on the other side.

If I understand the rule as to the taking of depositions on written interrogatories, the commissioner would have no authority to go beyond those interrogatories. He could ask no question beyond them. If so, there can be no superintendence. Then the difficulty arises of authorizing any man in the State of California, who, by the laws of California, may administer an oath, to take depositions under written interrogatories.

Sir, in my judgment and experience, it is no such easy thing; it requires a man conversant with these matters to take the answers of witnesses to written interrogatories, or the whole effect of the examination may be lost, as regards the cross-interrogatories particularly. If your commissioner is not a competent man, a witness may be made to speak precisely what the ignorance or incapacity of the commissioner makes him speak. No lawyer who has practiced in a court of chancery can doubt, that if your commissioner is not competent, or if he is wanting in good faith in taking the deposition of a witness, under written interrogatories, he may make that deposition precisely what he pleases.

I am, therefore, not willing to confer this power, unless the justices of the peace in California, and the notaries public in California have a higher degree of intelligence and capacity than my observation has shown exists, as regards such persons in other States of the Union, where I have known something about them. Unless the average there is higher, I am not willing to intrust to them the interests of the Government; nor do I think the interests of the claimants ought to be intrusted in such cases, to parties to take answers to written interrogatories, who, in nine cases out of ten, may be utterly incompetent to take them. I cannot vote for the section as it stands, because I think it will tend to establish a loose rule as to the taking of testimony; and a true decision on one side or the other must depend on the truth of the facts stated, which could not be relied upon by taking testimony in the mode proposed.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is an unnecessary alarm; for this provision does not appear to me to propose anything which, in its practical operation, will be found to put in jeopardy the rights either of the public, or of individuals who may be claimants. It has this certainly to recommend it: that there is an absolute necessity for some means of getting the testimony which both the claimant and the Government have in these cases, before the board of commissioners, in order to bring their adjudication to a termination sometime within the life of the present generation.

Now, sir, what is the provision of the old law in regard to the taking of depositions? That law is based upon the idea that the witnesses will be present; but it is not based upon the idea that the witnesses will, in all cases, testify before the commissioners acting as a board. On the contrary, it contemplates the using of depositions before the board, which may be taken at chambers before one of the commissioners. The law agent is required to be notified of the taking of depositions, in order that he may be present. A deposition, then, is presented before the board, and is used in the same manner as other depositions are, and as depositions taken under the proposed amendment are proposed to be used. Every guarantee which is had in regard to the solemnity of the taking of depositions, is had under the amendment which is proposed. It is only the tribunal that is changed, from one of the commissioners at chambers, to such persons as may be found competent among those who are authorized to take depositions to be used in the judicial tribunals of the State of California.

It seems to be supposed that there is a particular ability on the part of a commissioner at chambers. Why, sir, any other competent man may as well take, at chambers, depositions to be used before this tribunal, as one of the commissioners himself. And if it came from another man equally competent, the deposition would be as much in form and substance, and as reliable in every respect as if taken before one of the commissioners at chambers. It seems to be supposed that there may be incompetent officers appointed to take depositions in California, and that we ought not to adopt those officers as a competent tribunal to take these depositions. It is true that incompetent officers may be appointed; but what will be the case under this amendment? Why, the board themselves are to settle upon the application of the party. As I understand the operation of this amendment, if a deposition is proposed to be taken, which cannot be taken before the board, or any member of the board, then an application is made to the board of commissioners sitting as such, and they issue a commission—issue it to whom? Why, they are limited in their choice; in other words, they are authorized to select, from the persons in the State of California who are authorized to administer oaths, an individual, and a commission is to issue to him. The board of commissioners, knowing who are competent, and who are not competent, will issue a commission only to such persons as they think proper to select.

If I am correct in this matter, what is the position of the thing? Why, the commissioners themselves, acting as a board, knowing the competency of the men, and ability of the men, and the integrity of the men, will direct their commission to such a man, living in the neighborhood of the witness, as may receive their sanction as a proper man to take these depositions. And in that manner the testimony will come before the board. This I understand to be the operation of the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is entirely mistaken in his construction of the act. There can be no difficulty about it. I do aver that, on the face of the language used here, there is no authority on the part of the board to select a commissioner at all. The board may issue a commission. I think the word "may" would be construed as mandatory if a reasonable cause for asking for the taking of a deposition should be shown. If the commission issue, it issues to take depositions before any officer authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths. It would not be competent, under such circumstances, for the board to restrict the party to a particular officer of their own selection. The commission issues. It must be a general commission to any officer who is "authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths." That, I think, is the necessary construction of the language.

Mr. WELLER. The phraseology used here is, I think, precisely similar to that which is found in all laws authorizing the taking of depositions, on interrogatories, or cross-interrogatories. I have never known any case where a commission issued, in which the name of the officer before whom the depositions were to be taken was not designated, and that is the only fair and legitimate construction of the fifth section. Whenever application is made to the board of commissioners for the taking of testimony, on sufficient showing, the board directs a commission to issue to some officer of the State, who is named in that commission, to take this testimony. The phraseology of the bill is, that they "may direct a commission to issue, to take depositions before any officer authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths." Now, as a matter of course, when they come to issue this commission upon a proper application, it must be directed to some officer who, by the laws of the State of California, is authorized to administer oaths; but whether he is a proper person to intrust with this important business of taking testimony, is a question to be settled by the board of commissioners. This, I hold, is the only fair construction of the section. Any other construction would be a mere technical one, and not a legitimate one.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator's construction is different from what the practice has been under the laws of the United States. The honorable Senator is, I think, entirely mistaken as to the necessary effect of the language.

Mr. WELLER. I speak of the practice which has prevailed.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, a question is raised as to the construction of this section. Perhaps I speak more in reference to my own view of it, as reported by the committee, than in regard to any technical question which may be raised as to its construction; but I understand the construction which I have mentioned to be the true one, which is to be put upon the section. I do not know any authority by which the board of commissioners could be called upon to issue a commission to such a person as did not meet the approval of that board; but if I am wrong as to the construction, or if it admits of a doubt upon that point, I desire to have the section amended, so that it shall meet that proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. Suppose a commission is issued in the words of the act, directed to A B, or any other person "authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths," that commission would issue in the very words of the act.

Mr. FELCH. I do not suppose any commission would issue in that way. I have always supposed, so far as I have known the practice, that it has been to direct a particular individual, naming him, to take particular testimony. The commission requires testimony to be taken before him.

Mr. DAVIS. The case I have put is not unusual. In some of the States, commissions are directed in that way to A B, or C D, or any person of a certain rank, as a judge of a court of record.

Mr. PRATT. That is the practice in Maryland.

Mr. DAVIS. This section authorizes the commission to issue to any person who is "authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths."

Mr. WELLER. The objection is very easily obviated. It was certainly the intention of the act to provide that the commission should issue to a person to be designated in it; but I can very readily obviate the objection by an amendment, so that it shall read that the board "may direct a commission to issue to take depositions before any officer designated by the board, authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths." If that suits the tastes of gentlemen on the other side, I shall be willing to make that amendment. I offer that amendment, hoping that it will obviate the objection.

Upon the motion of Mr. JONES, of Iowa, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

TOWN OF BELLEVUE, IOWA.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill for the benefit of the town of Bellevue, in Iowa.

The original bill had been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which had reported it with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That there shall be and hereby is granted to the city of Bellevue, in Iowa, the land bordering on the Mississippi river in front of the said city, reserved by the act of 2d July, 1836, for a public highway and for other public purposes, together with the accretions which may have formed thereto, or in front thereof, to be disposed of in such manner as the corporate authorities of said city may direct. The grant made by this act shall operate as a relinquishment only of the right of the United States in and to the said premises, and shall in no manner affect the rights of third persons therein, or to the use thereof, but shall be subject to the same. On application by a duly authorized agent of the corporate authorities of said city to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a patent of relinquishment, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be issued therefor, as in other cases."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 20, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTELTON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAIL AND PLANK ROADS.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the bill giving the right of way to all rail and plank roads passing through the public lands belonging to the United States, upon which the previous question has been demanded.

On motion by Mr. HAMILTON, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Christopher Lambert, for the purpose of reference to one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. COBB. Yesterday I called the previous question on the bill under consideration. The morning hour having expired, I also entered a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, in order that it might come up this morning for consideration. I now withdraw the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and also the demand for the previous question. I would like to have the attention of the House, and I will detain it but a moment. I understand that there was some dissatisfaction on yesterday in relation to my calling the previous question, and refusing to give some gentlemen the floor for the purpose of making personal explanations. I did not know at the time that they desired the floor for this purpose, or I should have given it to them with pleasure. Whenever I refuse anything to gentlemen in this House, my object is to promote the progress of business, and not to evidence any disrespect to any member of the House. It is proper that I should state this, to satisfy those gentlemen who may have been displeased on account of my refusing to allow them the floor. I am about to make another proposition. Inasmuch as I reported this bill from the Committee on Public Lands, and some gentlemen here believe that they can perfect it still further, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, turn the bill loose upon the House, and let gentlemen do with it as they please.

Mr. POLK. Oh don't! Don't turn it loose! [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I do not feel at liberty to insist upon the previous question. Having withdrawn it, I do not intend to make a speech in advocacy of the passage of this bill. I believe it to be so plain a proposition, that it needs no discussion, and, therefore, I shall not discuss the measure, leaving it in the hands of the House to do with it as they please.

Mr. OLDS. I am afraid, if the gentleman turns that bill loose upon the House, that it might injure some of us very much, and therefore I call the previous question. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. OLDS. I think a sense of duty compels me to insist upon my motion.

Mr. PERKINS. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

Mr. JENKINS. As the friends of the bill refuse the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PERKINS,] I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. BISSELL. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GAYLORD. Will it be in order to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order, the previous question having been demanded, and a proposition having been made to lay upon the table.

Mr. BISSELL called for tellers upon his demand for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and Messrs. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, and POLK, were appointed; and on a count, there appeared, ayes 31.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. AVERETT. Being unable to hear from the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] I rise for the purpose of inquiring whether the friends of this bill have refused to strike out that clause which gives the unlimited right to take timber and stone, to keep the road in repair?

Mr. BISSELL. I would reply if I may have the privilege—

Mr. DEAN. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order, the question being to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. BISSELL. I do not propose to debate the bill. Will not the Chair hear what I design to say?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot do so without a direct violation of the rules, and he is called upon by half a dozen gentlemen to enforce them.

Mr. BISSELL. I wished to ask the Chair what was the question in order, and what was not in order?

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to state that which he has twice done; and he will repeat for the third time, if gentlemen will permit him: The motion pending is to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. BISSELL. I desire to ask permission of the House to answer the question of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. AVERETT.]

Mr. DEAN. I object, unless others can speak also.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] and a half a dozen others, called the gentleman to order when the proposition was first made.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I trust, if this be the case, that the proposition to lay the bill upon the table will be voted down.

Mr. SACKETT. I wish to propound a question to the Chair.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman raise a point of order?

Mr. SACKETT. I am not certain whether it is a question of order or not. I wish to ask a question of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not in order. By unanimous consent alone can the gentleman propound his interrogatory.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JENKINS's motion to lay the bill upon the table, and there were—yeas 68, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Bartlett, Beale, Bibbiana, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Breckinridge, George H. Brown, Buel, Burrows, Burt, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Dean, Dinwiddie, Edmundson, Faulkner, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thos. Y. How, Ives, Jenkins, D. T. Jones, Geo. G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McNair, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Peaslee, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Skelton, Smart, Stanly, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Thurston, Townshend, Venable, Washburn, and Wildrick—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Bell, Bissell, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Busby, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Churchwell, Chingman, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Duncan, Eastman, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gamble, Green, Grey, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howard, Hunter, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Meade, Miller, Milson, Molony, John Moore, Murphy, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Pennington, Phelps, Polk, Riddle, Robinson, Savage, Schermerhorn, Origen S. Seymour, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Stuart, Taylor, Tuck, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Woodward, and Yates—78.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The bill was read through, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the right of way shall be, and is hereby, granted to all rail and plank road companies that are now, or that may be chartered hereafter, over and through any of the public lands of the United States, over which any rail or plank road, authorized by an act of the General Assembly of the respective States in which public lands may be situated; and the said company or companies are hereby authorized to survey and work through the said public lands, to be held by them for the track of said road, one hundred feet in width; and, furthermore, an additional quantity of fifty feet in width on each side of said road or roads along the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said company or companies shall have the right to take from the public lands, in the vicinity of said road or roads, all such materials of earth, stone, or wood, as may be necessary or convenient from time to time, for the actual construction and repair of said road or roads, or any part thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be, and is hereby, granted to said company or companies all necessary sites for watering places, depots, and work-shops along the line of said road or roads, so far as the places convenient for the same may fall upon the public lands: Provided, That no one depot or watering place shall contain over five square acres, and that said sites shall not be nearer to each other than ten miles along the line or lines of said road or roads: Provided further, That the said grants herein contained, as well as of the use of the public lands as of the materials for the construction of said road or roads, shall cease and determine, unless the road or roads be begun within five years, and completed within fifteen years thereafter: And provided, moreover, That if any road, at any time after its completion, be discontinued or abandoned by said company or companies, the grants hereby made shall cease and determine, and said lands hereby granted revert back to the General Government.

Mr. OLDS. There seems to be much dissatisfaction at the call for the previous question; and, not wishing to exclude any amendment that may be proposed to the bill, I withdraw that call.

Mr. CARTTER. I move to strike out the second section of the bill, for I believe the bill is as valuable without it.

The SPEAKER. That amendment will not be in order until the amendment now before the body has been disposed of.

Mr. CARTTER. Well, I announce my purpose to make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. PERKINS. I have an amendment to offer, which, I think, will now come in at the proper place.

Mr. SACKETT. Is the first section of the bill under consideration?

The SPEAKER. It is. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PERKINS] propose an amendment to the first section?

Mr. PERKINS. I do, sir. I propose to amend the first section of the bill, as follows:

To strike out all after the word "width," line twelve, section one, to the end of the section, and add: Provided, That in case where deep excavation, or heavy embankment is required for the grade of such road, then at such places a greater width may be taken by such company, if necessary, not exceeding, in the whole, two hundred feet.

Mr. STUART. I desire, sir, to offer a substitute for that bill.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order; but the original bill will still be open to amendment.

Mr. STUART. I understand that; but I wish to propose the following substitute for the bill: to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

That whenever in any of the Territories or States in which the public lands are situated, the route of any railroad authorized by authority of said State or Territory, shall lead through any of the public lands of the United States remaining unsold, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and he is hereby, empowered to authorize the company constructing the same, to survey and mark for that purpose through such lands, the track of such railroad, with seventy-five feet of land in width on each side of the center thereof. And the route of such road shall be designated and marked on the ground by plain landmarks, and a copy of the notes of survey and a plat thereof, with a description of such landmarks, shall be returned to the office of the Secretary of the Interior within such time as he shall designate; and, upon the approval of the same by said Secretary, the land so designated shall be set apart and held for the use of such company for the route of such railroad and the fixtures appurtenant thereto; and the public land intersected by the same shall thereafter be sold subject to the rights granted by this act; and a copy of the survey and plat aforesaid shall also be filed in the proper local land office by such company, before any rights under this act shall vest in them.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the grants provided for in this act, and all rights and privileges secured thereby, shall cease and determine, unless the road in each case be begun within one year, and completed within ten years after the approval aforesaid; and if the said road or roads shall at any time before or after its completion be discontinued or abandoned by said company, the grants hereby made, and all rights and privileges hereby secured, shall cease and determine.

Mr. STUART. That substitute merely proposes to give the right of way through the Government lands, one hundred and fifty feet wide. It provides for surveys to be made, and returned to the office of the Secretary of the Interior; and when so returned, and acquiesced in by him, then these lands over which the road passes are to be withdrawn from sale, and the balance of the land is to be sold, subject to this right of way. It confers no right to take timber, materials, stone, or anything else; and whenever the company or State ceases to use the right of way for the purposes indicated by the grant, the land reverts to the General Government. Now, sir, that is all we ask; and if the House is disposed to adopt that, so far as I am concerned, I shall be abundantly satisfied.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me to say what I ask for?

Mr. STUART. Certainly, sir.

Mr. COBB. The bill which the Committee on Public Lands reported, and which has been amended to the satisfaction of almost every gentleman in this body, is such a bill as no Congress that I have been a member of, has ever refused to a State. We have precedent after precedent upon the books, where they have passed such bills granting exactly such privileges to the different States as is proposed to be granted by this bill; and now, if this House is not willing to give a general bill of a similar nature, I shall not ask for any bill. I shall vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.] It is no proposition at all. It is a burlesque upon us to grant simply a right of way. We have already a right of way through our State.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. I rose a moment ago, and made a motion to strike out the second section. The Speaker pronounced the motion out of order, for the reason that the bill might be perfected first. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] rises, and moves a substitute for the whole bill—a proposition which is still a subordinate one to the motion I made. I ask if the gentleman is in order?

The SPEAKER. That is very true. The proposition immediately before the body is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PERKINS.]

Mr. CARTTER. Then the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is proper to entertain his proposition; but it is also true that the bill may be perfected by amendment before the gentleman's substitute can come up as in order.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it not necessary that his motion should be in order to give him the privilege of the floor? That is the question I wish to raise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it has been the custom to allow gentlemen to state briefly the contents of a proposed substitute, but the question immediately before the body is the amendment proposed to the first section of the original bill.

Mr. STUART. I propose, sir, to modify the substitute I offered, so as to make it cover plank roads also.

The SPEAKER. That modification will be made.

Mr. WHITE, of Alabama. I wish to call the attention of the House, and the gentleman from Michigan, for a moment to the character of the amendment which he has proposed.

Mr. COBB. Will my colleague allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, in a moment. The only object which can be subserved by the first section of this amendment, it seems to me, is to secure the accomplishment of the road, so far at least as to have it surveyed. That I understand to be the object—agreeing that this survey should be made.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow the Clerk to report the first amendment in order?

The Clerk again read Mr. PERKINS's amendment, (as inserted above.)

Mr. STUART. I wish to understand of the Chair what is the condition of the substitute that I propose?

The SPEAKER. The substitute has been entered, and it will be taken up after the House has perfected the bill.

Mr. STUART. My view is this: It is in order to offer the substitute. The substitute is pending, but the House has a right to amend the original bill to suit itself.

The SPEAKER. And there is an amendment pending to the original bill, which the Chair decides is the first in order.

Mr. STUART. I made the inquiry for this purpose: a motion for the previous question being sustained, would not, I believe, cut off the substitute?

The SPEAKER. It would not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. COBB. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PERKINS.] It is enough for us.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the power of the gentleman from Alabama to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. COBB. I know that; but I am merely expressing my opinion about it.

Mr. CARTTER. I thought the gentleman from Alabama had let the bill loose upon the House.

Mr. COBB. Yes, so I did.

Mr. JENKINS. I call for the reading of the first section of the bill, as it will read if the proposed amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PERKINS] is agreed to.

The Clerk then read the first section of the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to suggest to the friends of this bill that I think it would be as well to insert after the words "plank roads" "macadamized turnpikes."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire accept that amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. JONES. Well, I offer that as an amendment to the amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 73, noes not counted.

Mr. GOODENOW. I move to insert after the words "macadamized roads," "public roads."

Mr. STUART. I hope, sir, that gentlemen in this House will not attempt to make a farce of this matter, and that they will not detain the House upon such propositions as these. Everybody knows that the States have a right to authorize the laying out of any roads through the public lands, or anywhere else, except roads of the character provided for in this bill; and it is even contended by many gentlemen that they possess that authority, and it is only for the purpose of saving dispute about jurisdiction that this bill to give a right of way to rail and plank roads through the public lands is asked for.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but for the purpose of asking a question. I wish to make an inquiry, whether it is necessary to pass a bill of this description, to give a State the right of way through the public domain? My opinion about that is this: I am not a lawyer, it is true, but there are some first principles, some general principles, that can be understood. I understand, for instance, that the right of eminent domain exists in the sovereignty. The State authority of a State is the sovereign power. A State has authority to incorporate a company with the privilege of making a road. Let me illustrate the point I wish to present. Here is an individual who owns the soil lying within the limits of a State, and who is a non-resident, and here is the Federal Government, who owns the soil lying within the limits of a State, and who is a non-resident. The question then arises, after the incorporation has been granted to a company to make a road, have not they the power to grant to the company a right of way through the soil where the fee resides in the Federal Government the same as they have where the fee resides in an individual?

Mr. SACKETT. Can they do that in the case of an individual, without compensation?

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly so; that is the very point I was going to speak to. In many of the constitutions of the States, and in the bills of rights, it is provided that property, real or personal, shall not be taken or appropriated to the public use without just compensation being made therefor. Then, usually in granting this act of incorporation, the mode of ascertaining the amount of damage is prescribed, and they have a right to set apart as much of individual property, paying compensation therefor, as the public interest requires. Then let us place individuals and the Federal Government upon precisely the same ground. If the Federal Government thinks proper to take the damages when assessed for the right of way through the public lands, let the Government receive it.

Mr. WASHBURN. I want to ask of the gentleman in whom is the right of eminent domain in the Territories?

Mr. JOHNSON. The right of eminent domain in the Territories would be in the Federal Government. If damage is done to the Government, of course compensation would not be asked for; but so far as the States are concerned, the question is clear. The right of eminent domain exists in the sovereignty; hence a State has as much a right to condemn and set apart for public use the public domain lying within the limits of the State, as it has that of an individual; and if compensation is to be made, the Federal Government is as much entitled to compensation for the land condemned and set apart for public use, as an individual is. Let individuals and the Federal Government be placed precisely upon the same footing. I think the bill is wholly unnecessary. I think it is supererogation. A State authority has this privilege already, and it is not necessary to anticipate State legislation, so far as I can perceive.

Mr. WHITE, of Alabama. If the State authority can grant the right to artificial persons, or to a corporation to trespass upon the public lands, why cannot it make the same grant to natural persons?

Mr. JOHNSON. The State authority has no authority to grant the privilege of committing trespass. That is a different affair.

Mr. WHITE. Is cutting down timber and treading upon the grass no trespass?

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it a trespass, for instance, to condemn and set apart so much of individual land to open up a public road? Is that a trespass? Not at all. The gentleman confounds two separate and distinct principles. One is the origin of law, and the other grows out of the sovereignty itself. Both growing out of the sovereignty itself, but one has its foundation in law, and the other has its existence in sovereignty. The fee is in one place and the right of eminent domain is in another. The principles are clear and distinct; and this bill is wholly unnecessary. It is not necessary to pass such a law. The States have the authority, and if the company want to use public lands—if they want timber and other materials, let them pay the Government for it upon the principle that they would have to pay individuals for it.

Mr. GOODENOW. I withdraw my amendment.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the amendment as amended, and being put it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it now in order to offer an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to amend the first section, it is in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move, then, to amend the first section by striking out the word "hereafter" in the fifth line, and inserting after the word "chartered," in the same line, the words "ten years hereafter," so as to make it read:

"That the right of way shall be and is hereby granted to all rail and plank road companies that are now or that may be chartered ten years hereafter," &c.

It seems to me, sir, that the House would be passing a very bold public measure without much consideration, if it was to agree to this first section as it now stands in the bill. The principle contained in this first section is, "that the right of way shall be and is hereby granted to all rail and plank road companies that are now or that may be hereafter chartered." When? Two hundred years hence? The time is not limited. All you have to do is, to give a company a charter for two hundred years, or for five thousand years. Suppose you do charter a company for five hundred years, or for a thousand years now, when you have public lands, and they locate their road now, but do not go into operation for two hundred years, I ask any lawyer in this House what the rights of that company are through the public lands?

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman whether this provision in the third section does not meet the difficulty, "that the said grants herein contained, as well as of the use of the public lands as of the materials for the construction of said road or roads, shall cease and determine, unless the road or roads be begun within five years and completed within fifteen years thereafter?"

Mr. SUTHERLAND. After what? After the charter?

Mr. DAVIS. Unless they be begun within five years, and completed within fifteen years from this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. From the date of this act?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had overlooked that provision. But, sir, it seems to me that it would be infinitely better to grant these rights of way, and grant them these privileges as each case arises.

Sir, in regard to these grants of land to railroads, and for other purposes, on certain conditions, I know that we have been making them, and that those who vote for them think it right to do so; but I say that, in the end, they will throw the land titles in these new States into inextricable confusion. I say, and I wish it to be noted, that within twenty years from this time these land States will most seriously and most solemnly regret every one of the conditions inserted in these bills. If they do not, I will never utter another sentence in public. If they will strike out every one of these conditions and convince me that the settlement of the country requires these railroads, I will vote for their bills; but I never will vote to grant lands to a State or a corporation, tying them up with conditions, and confining them in the use of the lands. I tell you, sir, I tell this House, that in the end, it will turn out to be the saddest business for the new States that they have ever gone into. I know it from experience. I know enough of the principles of the common law, and of the philosophy of the common law, to know that by this system of granting away lands on conditions and terms, and by tying them up, you are injuring yourselves, and that you will regret it forever hereafter.

If, however, by a subsequent section of the bill the time is limited, I do not insist on this amendment; but if the House thinks that it is not limited to five years after the passage of this act, or five years after the charter of the company, then I insist on my amendment. At all events, it would be safer to insert the words of my amendment. They can certainly do no harm.

Now one word more. I desire to illustrate the idea I intend to convey by this amendment, and the question of law which might arise as to what rights would attach to a company chartered, but not going into operation. It is perhaps a remnant of the feudal system; but in the manors in New York and in England at this day, it is quite common when a man leases a farm, to grant also to the tenant a right of common. Now, this question has been raised in New York, and carried to our highest courts. Here is a lease given forever, and granting the right of common; the tenant claims the right of common, and yet the landlord has no commons; the tenant claims the right to pasture his cattle, and to cut his wood, on the land that was common when his lease was granted. Now, a question of that sort might arise under this section of the bill. A company is chartered; a bill is passed giving them the right of way; the company does not go into operation; in the mean time the lands are sold. Now, has that chartered company a right of way through the land that has been sold subsequent to the passage of the act, and which may have been surveyed for the railroad track? It is a grave question of law, what rights this first section does give to a company which is chartered, and has not gone into operation.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection at all to the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from New York, so far as it proposes to extend the time to ten years from and after the passage of this bill. But I see that the morning hour has nearly expired, and with a view of keeping the bill before the House, I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands. I trust that the House will be prepared to vote upon the bill to-morrow morning, and dispose of it in one way or the other.

Mr. MEADE. I rise for the purpose of suggesting that this bill should be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill seems to involve questions of law, which should be considered more maturely than we are in the habit of considering bills that are sprung upon us in the House; and I therefore think that it should be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary. If it is in order, I will submit a motion for that purpose.

Mr. COBB. I cannot yield the floor for any motion. I have moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I desire to offer a resolution to terminate debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on House bill No. 87, "making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853."

The SPEAKER. That resolution is not in order, as the bill has not been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have drawn up the resolution in such a way as to make it, I think, legitimate and proper. My resolution is that the debate shall close after the discussion has been continued for a certain length of time.

The SPEAKER. The House has decided such a resolution to be out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, and allow us to go to the business on the Speaker's table for an hour or two. I have no objection to going into committee after that time; but let us, at least, devote one hour to-day to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. St. MARTIN. Is it in order to move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order to do so if the House votes down the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken on Mr. Houston's motion, and it was agreed to, on a division—ayes 86, noes not counted.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Phelps in the chair.)

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up House bill No. 87, "making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was taken up for consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no unusual appropriation in this bill. On the contrary, the Committee of Ways and Means have reduced some of the items. As I desire, if possible, to take up, to-day, the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, which is the important bill of the session, I hope the committee will allow this bill to be passed upon without any general debate, and let us take up the civil and diplomatic bill immediately.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. OLDS. Mr. Chairman, I expect to make upon this occasion what is called a political speech; but I do not propose to eulogize the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, nor to detract from the merits of the Whig candidate.

Mr. STANLY. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. OLDS. I hope this will not be taken out of my hour?

Mr. STANLY. I wish to know of the dominant party in this House whether, at this late period in the session, they are willing to allow this general debate upon the appropriation bills. I am willing to submit to whatever the committee may decide. If they decide to allow this irrelevant and rambling debate to go on, let the responsibility rest upon the party which has a large majority in this House.

I raise the question that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] is out of order, upon the ground that he is discussing the presidential question upon the Military Academy appropriation bill. I raise the question, and whatever the committee may decide, I will agree to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that in accordance with the general practice of the House, general discussion may be permitted to go on. He therefore overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from North Carolina, and decides that the gentleman from Ohio is in order.

Mr. STANLY. I take an appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that in accordance with the general practice of the House, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Ohio is in order in discussing the presidential question. From this decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] takes an appeal. The question is now, therefore, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the question is put, I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Ohio, inasmuch as he designs to publish that part of his speech which he does not speak, in the newspapers, not to speak any part of it, and publish it all in the newspapers.

Mr. OLDS. I am afraid it would not have the same effect upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it will have the same effect.

Mr. GOODENOW demanded tellers upon the appeal; which were ordered; and Messrs. STANLY and POLK were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 39; no quorum voting.

Mr. OLDS. I ask for a recount.

[Cries of "Call the roll!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. We find almost every day, that we do not have a quorum present by one o'clock. I ask that the roll may be called.

Mr. SMART. I hope we shall have the unanimous consent of the committee for a recount. I think a quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent, and the Chair hears objections on all sides.

The roll was then called.

Pending the call of the roll, Mr. BRIGGS stated that he was not within the bar when his name was called, but asked that his name might be recorded as present.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe, according to the practice of the House, it is permitted in a call of the House, for a member to record his name upon the Journal, whether he was in the House when his name was called or not; but as the rules have been universally administered, they have no such right in Committee of the Whole, upon a call of the roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The practice in committee, as the Chair understands it, has been different. The names of gentlemen have been recorded since the adoption of the rule when they have asked it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the Chair is misinformed in relation to this matter. I believe the first time the roll was ever called, under this rule, I was in the post office when my name was called, and came in here a moment after, and asked that my name should be recorded. The Speaker decided, however, that it could not be recorded.

The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. Phelps) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 87, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy, had found themselves without a quorum, and had directed him to report that fact to the House, with the names of the absentees.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon sustaining the decision of the Chair that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] was in order in discussing the presidential question upon an appropriation bill. The tellers, Messrs. STANLY and POLK, will resume their places.

The question was then again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 37.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained by the committee.

Mr. STANLY. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that only ten Whigs voted in the affirmative.

Mr. OLDS then proceeded with his remarks, and referred at length to the opinions of General Scott on Native Americanism. He also spoke of the various questions in issue between the Whig and Democratic parties. [His speech is published in the Appendix.]

Mr. BELL then obtained the floor, and addressed the committee an hour in reply to his colleague, [Mr. OLDS], in regard to the presidential candidates. He alluded to the great public services of General Scott, and commended his fitness for the Presidency. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am anxious to get through this bill to-day. I hope the committee will dispose of it without further debate. If they will not, I shall be under the necessity of moving that the committee rise, that we may pass a resolution in the House closing debate.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I suppose, from what has transpired in committee this morning, that there will be little, if any, debate upon the bill itself. Nothing has been said in reference to the merits of the bill as yet; and as there are other important bills upon the table—one in particular, the bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors—which I desire to take up, I hope that the committee will consent that this bill be reported, so that the other may be taken up and discussed.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are some two or three amendments which I wish to offer to the bill now under consideration. I will proceed to offer them now, relying upon the suggestion that there will be no more general debate upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read in detail, and each clause will be considered as a section.

The following section was then read by the Clerk:

"For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians, $91,272: Provided, That hereafter, in lieu of the pay proper, rations of every description, forage, servants, and all other emoluments or allowances whatever, heretofore received, the professors of engineers, philosophy, mathematics, ethics, and chemistry, and the commandant of the corps of cadets, shall be entitled to receive $2,000 each per annum, and the professors of drawing and French, $1,500 each per annum."

Mr. HOUSTON. I offer the following amendment to the section just read: strike out "$91,272," and insert in lieu thereof "$80,409." That will make it conform to the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. The proviso in this section was inserted by the Committee of Ways and Means, in amendment to a law of the last Congress. Upon conferring, however, with some of the professors who were here, the committee became satisfied that the law of the last Congress ought to stand, and they have therefore instructed me to ask the House to strike out all from the word "provided" to the end of the section.

Mr. CARTTER. What is the law?

Mr. HOUSTON. There is a law which changes the compensation of the professors, giving

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

all but two $2,000, and those two $1,500 each. It cuts off all their extra allowance except their longevity ration, fuel, and quarters. The proviso in this bill, as you will discover, cuts off their longevity rations. The committee are satisfied that this is too great a reduction, and they have instructed me to ask the committee to strike out this proviso so that the present law will stand, giving to all the professors except two, $2,000 with their longevity rations, and to those two, the professor of French and drawing, $1,500.

Mr. CARTTER. I am opposed to this amendment, and if it is true that the amount of these salaries are low, I would prefer giving them higher, so that we can comprehend them. In the last Congress we made an effort to strip these professors of a list of fictitious allowances in the way of provisions for servants, forage for horses, longevity rations, &c., and rendering their salaries in plain English, so that we could comprehend the amount when they appealed to us for pay, instead of following this old fiction of rations, which meant nothing more nor less, when inquired into, than so much more money. If there is anything in this bill in the way of reformation, that commends itself to my judgment and approbation, it is the simplifying these salaries and talking in English about them; and I will suggest to the Committee of Ways and Means and its chairman, that if these salaries are not enough, to make an increase, so that we will comprehend what we are paying. What are your longevity rations? What do you mean by them? What are the public to understand by "longevity" rations?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. By the action of the last Congress in fixing these salaries at $2,000 it was not intended to cut off longevity rations, nor their quarters.

But these professors are occupying public houses at the Academy belonging to the Government. They say that if they are prohibited from their quarters, then other officers who are stationed at the Academy will come up and claim those Government houses which they now occupy, and they will have either to build or to rent houses. It was not the intention, as I understand it, either of the Committee of Ways and Means or of the former Congress or of this House to deprive the professors of the public houses which they now occupy.

With regard to the longevity ration, I will merely say that it is an extra ration given to each officer of the Army for each five years that he may be in service. When he has been five years in service he gets one additional ration, when he has been ten years, he gets two additional rations; when he has been fifteen years, he gets three additional rations, and so on.

Mr. CARTTER. I thought there was some absurdity about it. The principle is this, that the older a man grows the more he eats. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. I believe the principle of it is, that the older a man grows the more children he has.

Mr. CARTTER. It is this indirect mode of payment that I protest against. The appetite does not grow any larger, or the capacity of the stomach to digest any greater as a man advances in age. I protest against perpetuating disguises by which money is drawn out of the Treasury without the people or the House knowing it. I supposed that we had struck a blow at this description of legislation in the last Congress, but I find the Committee of Ways and Means, who are retrenchers, coming in here, after reporting a reformation which ought to be made, and endeavoring to strike it out. Now, unless these officers want an increase of food every five years, do not strike out the proviso.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman from Ohio has referred to the legislation of the last Congress. I had the impression that the gentleman from Ohio has, except that I thought we cut off these extras and fixed the salaries at $2,000 for all the professors except two, and then we thought we were doing nobly. Will the gentleman inform us how much these extras amount to? We ought to know.

Mr. CARTTER. I do not recollect. I undertook to measure their stomachs in the last Congress. I could not find any rule to be governed by, and I could only judge by experience.

Mr. SACKETT. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means a question. I wish to know what the salaries of these various officers were, aside from the rations, before the act of last year was passed, which fixes them at $2,000?

Mr. HOUSTON. Some of them who were not attached to the Army got salaries, and those who were attached to the Army received their pay. I will explain that, if I can get the floor when the gentleman from Ohio has concluded his remarks.

Mr. CARTTER. All I have to say is this: Whatever may be the occasion for extra rations in actual service, a set of scientific professors in permanent positions do not require them. And, sir, let us talk English when we make an appropriation, and not go through the miserable rigmale of "longevity rations." [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Ohio is a little unfortunate, for he has shown the committee very plainly either that he did not understand last year what he was doing, or that if he did, he has forgotten it. I will read the law, which will satisfy the gentleman that either one or the other of these is absolutely true. Here is the proviso:

"Provided, That hereafter, in lieu of the pay proper, ordinary rations, forage, and servants, heretofore received under the provisions of the act of April 12th, 1812, the professors of engineers, philosophy, mathematics, ethics, and chemistry, shall be entitled to receive $2,000 each per annum, and the professors of drawing and French $1,500," &c.

So that you see the law itself, of which the gentleman speaks, was a reformation, and I am willing to admit that it expressly, by its terms, leaves the professors their extra rations.

Mr. CARTTER. That was not designed.

Mr. HOUSTON. The law was intended to leave to them their extra rations.

Mr. CARTTER. The gentleman is mistaken; it was not so intended.

Mr. HOUSTON. The law certainly leaves it so. We are not restoring anything at all. The Committee of Ways and Means, believing as the gentleman believes, that the law ought to have gone on and cut off the balance of the rations, proposed in this bill that the longevity rations should also be cut off. But here is a very long and candid communication from one of the present professors, who proves satisfactorily that it is impossible for the professors to live as they ought to live, if we take away their service-rations, as they are called.

Mr. MILLSON. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] in regard to the amount of the rations. I will state that this longevity ration—which seems to me to be a very reasonable additional allowance—is granted first, because it is desirable to retain in the public service useful and competent men; because, too, the professors at West Point have not the same opportunities of promotion that are open to those who commence their career in the Army with them; and because this slight additional compensation is necessary to provide for the continual increase of their families.

And now I will state the amount which is added to the compensation of the professors by retaining to them this longevity ration. Supposing that a professor has served thirty-five years, the increase of his compensation, at the expiration of that time, is only $500. That is the sole increase for a faithful and continuous service of thirty-five years.

Mr. FOWLER. Am I to understand that that is the whole amount that he will ever receive?

Mr. MILLSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I want to know how much these rations, forage, servants, and other emoluments will all amount to in any one year?

Mr. MILLSON. I am now speaking to the question of the longevity ration, that being the only point before the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. But I want to know how much all these perquisites for any one year amount to?

Mr. MILLSON. I can give the gentleman no information on that subject. I wish now to state to the committee what would be the whole expense to the Government, supposing the six professors at West Point received longevity rations after a service of thirty-five years. The whole additional expense for the six professors would be something like $3,000. I think that a very reasonable addition, and I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. There was another reply I intended to make to the gentleman from Ohio, and I am sure it is one he will appreciate. If the gentleman proposes a reformation in the Army, why does he not call to account the Committee on Military Affairs of this House? The Committee of Ways and Means have attempted to reform this error, as we considered it at the time, to which he has called the attention of the committee. We thought the longevity ration ought to be cut off, but upon a reexamination of the subject we found our opinions changed, and the committee have instructed me to ask the House to strike out the provision of the bill which would deprive the professors of it. But the gentleman will remember that these longevity rations are allowed by law, and that all the other officers of the Army get them. Why does he not call for a reformation, to change the law upon this subject? Why does he not call upon the Committee on Military Affairs to so modify the law as to deprive all officers of these rations, if the professors are to be deprived of them who are already deprived of the opportunities of promotion which other officers have? The Committee of Ways and Means thought that the professors ought to be allowed them.

Mr. CARTTER. Here is the provision that was adopted at the last Congress: "That hereafter in lieu of the pay proper, ordinary rations," which I unsophisticatedly supposed at that time, meant the rations they ordinarily received, "forage and servants heretofore received under the act of April 12th, 1812," and so forth. Well, the committee reported in this bill that they should receive salaries of $2,000, and exclude all rations. Now I do not know whether that is enough or not. If it is not, make it larger, although I think it is ample. But render it so that we can understand it, and do not attempt to keep up the fable that the older the officer grows the more he wants to eat, for the purpose of getting the money.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the law now. Why do you not propose to repeal it?

Mr. CARTTER. I understand that. You proposed to do it by this bill, but now you are going back in this amendment.

Mr. DUNCAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to make a suggestion to him, which will perhaps remove his difficulty?

Mr. CARTTER. Certainly.

Mr. DUNCAN. If the officer himself does not eat any more as he grows older, it is highly probable that as he grows in years his family will increase, he will have more to feed and the rations will all be consumed.

Mr. CARTTER. Then increase his salary, or change the title of your longevity ration, and call it shortevity ration. [Laughter.] If it is to feed children, say so, and let us understand it.

The question was then taken on Mr. Houston's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee of Ways and Means have instructed me to offer the following amendment: After the word "subsistence," in line eighteen, strike out "$438," and insert "$2,263" in lieu thereof, so as to make it read: For commutation of subsistence, $2,263.

That is to make appropriation for what the committee has just done.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 70, noes not counted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment. It merely appropriates $30 for clothes for the commandant's servant. I will merely remark that the commandant of the cadets is entitled to a servant.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For clothing of officer's servant, $30.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to strike out, in the twenty-second line, the words "and improvements for," so that instead of "for repairs and improvements, for fuel and apparatus therefor," it shall read "for repairs, fuel, and apparatus therefor," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move that the bill be reported to the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have an amendment which I desire to offer at the end of the bill.

Mr. HENN. I have an amendment which I want to offer to one of the sections of the bill. I move to strike out the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth lines, which are as follow:

"For expenses of the board of visitors, $3,000."

I look upon this board of visitors as a perfect humbug. It gives these gentlemen an opportunity of making a pleasant summer excursion, but it has never done any good in the least. I hope these lines will be stricken out.

The question was put, and decided in the negative.

The last two sections of the bill were then read as follows:

"For the purchase of thirty artillery and cavalry horses, $3,000.

"For forage of ninety artillery and cavalry horses, $6,480."

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to explain this new appropriation. I think we have nothing similar in any previous appropriation bills.

Mr. HOUSTON. The sections explain themselves. They have artillery and cavalry horses there for the purpose of exercising the students, and learning them to ride. They have some sixty or seventy horses there, but some half a dozen or probably eight or ten of them are reported as being unfit for use. They wish to increase the number to ninety, so that so much labor need not be imposed upon the same horses, and in order to make them last longer.

Several MEMBERS. That's enough.

Mr. DUNCAN. I merely rose for information, because I saw it was an appropriation which was not contained in former appropriation bills. I am satisfied with the explanation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I now offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, That the Superintendent of the Academy at West Point may be selected by the President of the United States from any corps of the Army of the United States, from those officers whose rank is not less than lieutenant colonel lineally, or by brevet.

It is probably known to the House that, in the present condition of the Military Academy at West Point, the Superintendent of that institution is always selected from the Corps of Engineers, and that the rank of the Superintendent for several years back has been only that of captain. Your artillery corps, your ordnance, your infantry, dragoons, and the various corps of the Army, in the present condition of the law, are precluded from the position of Superintendent of that Academy. No matter what is the character of the gentleman of the Army you may bring—no matter what gallantry he may have exhibited in front of the batteries of the enemy—no matter how high a personal character or position he may have, he is precluded from the position of Superintendent at West Point, for no other reason in the world than because he does not belong to a Corps of Engineers. It is the general wish of the Army that this change should be made in the law. The position is one of high responsibility. The Superintendent of the Academy at West Point ought to be a man to whom the youth of the country will look up to with pride. In that position there should be an example of the soldier; and without saying anything against the Corps of Engineers, I may be permitted to observe that the merit of the Army is not confined to that corps.

The President of the United States, under the change of law which I propose, will have the opportunity of exercising his discretion and his judgment. I have put it in the proviso that he shall not be of less rank than lieutenant colonel, lineal or by brevet, because that when taken from this Engineer Corps it will be found that the Superintendent is of no higher rank than that of captain. When I was at West Point, a very distinguished gentleman from the Corps of Engineers, holding the rank of colonel, was Superintendent, and the late General Worth, then lieutenant colonel, was commandant of the corps. When this Superintendent left, another was appointed of lower rank. This involved the necessity of a change in many of the subordinate officers, because they would not be assigned a duty at West Point under the charge of an officer not equal to themselves in rank, and so it dwindled down. This is always the way. When the Superintendent decreases in rank, the subordinate officers will also proportionably decrease or diminish in rank, except the professors who do not hold rank in the Army at all. All the officers of the Army of a higher rank will refuse to serve as subordinates, when the rank of the Superintendent goes down. I submitted this proposition at the last Congress, and it met the concurrence of the whole Army. I do not wish to do injustice to the Engineer Corps of the Army at all. But this but does justice to the balance of the corps of the Army. It will not affect the pay of the Superintendent at all. I believe you now have a captain of the engineers there, and he is receiving the pay of a lieutenant colonel.

I am requested by a gentleman at my left, to speak of the duties of a Superintendent of that Academy. He is not connected with the corps at all. His duties are ornamental rather than useful. The commandant of the corps has the military command of the corps of cadets and instructs them in military tactics. The Superintendent of the Academy receives the reports from the academic professors and the commandant. He superintends the disbursements; receives visitors; communicates with your Department; and so far as I know, has general control over the Academy. But there is no reason on earth why he should be an engineer officer. There was no reason why General Hitchcock, for instance, who was the commandant there for years, and who was acceptable as a governor and instructor of youth at West Point, should not have been promoted to the office of Superintendent of that Academy, except for that clause in the law which says he must be a member of the Engineer Corps. I do not wish to detain the committee, but I think this amendment ought to pass.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to know of the gentleman from Kentucky, what would be the objection to so framing his amendment as to permit the President to take the Superintendent from the civil or military department?

Mr. MARSHALL. It is a military affair. I do not know that there would be any particular objection to it, except that it had better be kept in the military line.

The question was then put, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. Phelps) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 87, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point, for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1853, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments thereto.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the previous question upon the passage of the bill; and if there be no objection, I ask that the amendments may all be included in one vote.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. KING, of Rhode Island. I ask that a separate vote may be had upon the last amendment, which provides that the Superintendent of the Academy at West Point may be taken from any corps in the Army.

The question was then taken, and the House agreed to concur in all the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union except the last.

Mr. KING. I demand the yeas and nays upon concurring in the last amendment. I understand that the effect of this amendment will be to displace the present Superintendent, and for that reason I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to know whether that will be the effect or not?

Mr. DUNCAN. I, too, desire to know what will be the effect of this amendment upon the present Superintendent. I understand the amendment to limit the discretion of the President to a choice from the officers not less in rank than lieutenant colonel. I understand the present Superintendent only holds the rank of captain, and at the same time I suppose he discharges his duties very well. I desire to know whether the amendment will displace him?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. By the indulgence of the House I will remark that I am perfectly willing to modify the amendment so as to allow the President the right to select the Superintendent from any corps of the Army, and not have anything whatever said about rank. All I want is to throw it open to the whole Army.

The SPEAKER. That modification can be made by unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and the modification suggested by Mr. MARSHALL was made.

Mr. KING, of New York. I ask for the reading of the amendment as amended.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will remark that I understand that the gentleman who is now Superintendent of West Point Academy, Mr. Robert E. Lee, (who is very acceptable to me,) has the rank of lieutenant colonel.

The amendment, as modified, was then read, as follows:

Provided, That the Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point may be selected by the President of the United States from any corps in the Army of the United States.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken upon the bill, and it was passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. With a view to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the river and harbor bill, in which there is a deep interest felt throughout the country, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. As there is a motion made which takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] I will ask the gentleman if he had not better make that bill a special order? This whole question of the improvement of the rivers and harbors has been sunk through the whole session, and we ought to do something now, if ever we do it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Everything else has been sunk with it.

Mr. SEYMOUR. We can accomplish the object of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] if we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take this business up at once.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the Chair will state both motions.

The SPEAKER. A motion is submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. HENN. Has the gentleman from Maryland the right to the floor, to submit that motion? The SPEAKER. The motion is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Whig party will vote against this which they call their charter doctrine, the House can adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope the House will go into the Committee of the Whole, and take up this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will not a motion to take up one of the appropriation bills take precedence in the committee of a motion to take up the river and harbor bill?

The SPEAKER. That is a question to be determined by the chairman of the committee, whoever he may be.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. That cannot be so, it having been decided by precedent heretofore. Sir, if you refer that question to the chairman of the committee, we have no show at all, for any man may be chairman there. The river and harbor bill is a general appropriation bill, and it has been so decided by the Speaker heretofore.

Mr. MEADE. It was so decided, confessedly against the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question is upon the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MEADE. I ask for a division of the House upon that question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Those who vote here against this bill are Virginians, and she has neither rivers or harbors.

Mr. MEADE. I ask for tellers upon the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. FOWLER and MORONY appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 67; no quorum voting.

Mr. MEADE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. No quorum is necessary to determine the question of adjournment either way. The rule is as good upon one side as upon the other.

The SPEAKER. The question just submitted, and upon which the House was divided, was upon a motion to adjourn; and no business having been transacted since, another motion is not now in order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. SMART. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. KING, of New York. This question can be decided to-morrow, just as well as to-day. When we go into the Committee of the Whole to-morrow, this motion can be made, and it will be for a majority of the committee to decide it, and as we have no quorum present, I move that this House adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There can be nothing effected by going into the Committee of the Whole to-day, and taking up that bill, because, if that should be done, it would be tantamount to making it a special order, and gentlemen must see that we can effect nothing by going into the Committee of the Whole, now, without a quorum.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. My object in making the motion now is to get into the committee upon this bill, with the understanding that this being the unfinished business, it would come up first before the committee to-morrow. I ask the Chair if that would not be the result if we go into the committee to-day, and take up this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. The pending motion is, that there be a call of the House, which should be first disposed of. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. KING,] however, submitted a motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KING. I withdraw that motion that my colleague [Mr. SEYMOUR] may give notice that he will submit the motion to-morrow to take up this bill. I think it unnecessary to have a call of the House now.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I give notice that to-morrow I shall move to take up one of the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then, sir, I ask whether the last motion submitted and acted upon, was not a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will further ask, for the information of the House upon this subject, whether it was not decided during the preceding Congress that an appropriation bill for rivers and harbors was a general appropriation bill, and whether that decision is not a precedent here?

The SPEAKER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The Chair trusts that the House will indulge him in a statement. Whatever may have been the experience of Congress upon this subject is as well known to the House as to the Chair. The Chair has a well-ascertained opinion of his own upon this subject, but he is acting temporarily in the chair, and even if he were acting permanently, he would not undertake to decide that question. It is to be decided by the chairman of the committee, after the House shall have resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, what shall be the order of business before the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the chairman can settle it which ever way he pleases.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. KING, of New York. I ask for a division of the House upon that question, that we may determine whether a quorum is present or not.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and upon a division there were—ayes 42, noes 60. No quorum voting.

There being no quorum in the House, On motion by Mr. CARTER, the House then adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

MEMORIALS.

The following memorials were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CHANDLER: The memorial of George C. Read and other citizens of the United States, asking Congress to employ Mr. William A. K. Martin to paint a picture representing an American naval victory, to be placed in the Capitol.

Also, the memorial of numerous citizens of Philadelphia asking Congress to construct a canal around the Sault Ste. Marie.

Also, the memorial of Carson & Newbold, of Philadelphia, asking compensation for merchandise destroyed while in the public stores (port custom-house) in the city of Philadelphia.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 21, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. CHASE presented three petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEWARD presented a memorial of inhabitants of Joe Daviess county, Illinois, praying that the transportation of the mails on Sunday may be prohibited by law; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS presented two memorials of steam engineers, residing on the northern lakes and the rivers, bays, and gulfs of the Atlantic coast, praying the enactment of a law for the correction of the existing evils in the management of steam vessels; which were ordered to be laid on the table.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Russell & Jones, surviving partners of Brown, Russell & Co., praying remuneration for services, and indemnifications for losses incurred in transporting stores for the troops in New Mexico, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of Israel Rogers, representing that he has been defrauded of the bounty land to which he was entitled for services during the late war with Mexico, and praying other land, submitted an adverse report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to protect actual settlers upon the land on the line of the Central Railroad and branches, by granting preemption rights thereto, reported it back with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the improvement and the establishment of a line of settlements along the route to California and Oregon; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Shreveport to the Mississippi river, in said State;

An act for the relief of the town of Bellevue, in Iowa; and

An act to provide additional security for the lives and property of persons navigating the western waters.

FOREIGN POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate copies of any correspondence not heretofore communicated to Congress, between the Department of State and the diplomatic agents of the United States abroad with regard to foreign postal arrangements, and especially cheap ocean postage, so far as the same can be done without detriment to the public interests.

DEPUTY NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the propriety of placing the compensation of the deputy naval officers and deputy surveyors, for the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans, on an equality with deputy collectors at said ports.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Mr. CLARKE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the reasons for the recall of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham from his position as chief astronomer of the Boundary Commission, employed in determining the line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico; together with all the papers connected with his appointment, the revocation of that appointment, and the instructions given to him. Also, that the Secretary of the Interior be further directed to report to the Senate any instructions given or sent to Andrew B. Gray, relating to the initial point upon the Rio Grande, agreed upon by the Commission, and the reasons for the removal of the said Andrew B. Gray from his position as surveyor upon the part of the United States upon the said Boundary Commission.

THE TAUNTON RIVER.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the survey of Taunton river with reference to the obstacles impeding navigation therein.

INDIGENT INSANE.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to ask permission of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 188.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will give way for a moment, until I suggest the taking up of the resolution which was postponed until to-morrow, in regard to the day of adjournment. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SOULE] conceives it to be his duty to be present when that resolution is voted upon. It is well known to the Senate, that he is in very bad health, and it is probably dangerous for him to be in the Senate at all. I hope that, by general consent, that resolution will be taken up this morning and acted upon.

Mr. SHIELDS. I presume that the bill which I desire to take up will provoke no discussion, and I am under some obligation to make an effort to call it up this morning. If it gives rise to any debate, I will agree to lay it aside, and take up the resolution referred to by the Senator from California, which I presume will excite some discussion. I would state to the honorable Senator from Louisiana, that the moment the bill to which I refer is through, I will call up that resolution. It is a bill that passed the Senate at the last session, after full discussion, and I hope that it will provoke no discussion now. I call it up for the purpose of having it passed, if there be sufficient strength here to pass it; if not, let it be rejected. I wish to have a decision of the subject. It is what is known as "Miss Dix's bill," for the relief of the indigent insane; and I will throw myself not only on the courtesy, but upon the gallantry of the Senate, to take it up and dispose of it now, one way or the other. I take it for granted, that although Senators may be inclined to vote against it, and feel it to be their duty to do so, no one will be disposed to assail or attack it, and that it will provoke no discussion. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill making a grant of lands to the several States of the Union for the relief and support of indigent insane persons.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will not press that motion. The bill to which he alludes is one to which I am opposed. If we can distribute lands among the States for that purpose, we can do it for any other purpose. I hope it will not be taken up.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Illinois is mistaken if he thinks the bill will not lead to discussion.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then if it does give rise to discussion, and any Senator indicates a wish to debate it, I will not press it to-day. But I was in hopes that, as it was so fully discussed before, it would be settled one way or the other now without discussion. I take no other interest in it, except to do what I consider to be my duty as chairman of the committee which reported it.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope that bill will be taken up and disposed of.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 22.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I now move to take up the resolution of the House in regard to the adjournment of Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, (with the concurrence of the Senate,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives close the present session of Congress by an adjournment of their respective Houses on Monday, the 16th day of August next, at the hour of twelve o'clock, meridian.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have called up this resolution for the accommodation of my honorable friend from Louisiana, whose health is such that he will be obliged to leave the city. He wishes to have some action on it before he leaves. But I am still of opinion that it would be indiscreet and improper for us to act upon it for some time to come. I shall vote against concurring in the resolution, although I have called it up.

Mr. SOULE. I do not wish to be understood as indulging a personal desire or feeling of my own, when I express my preference for an adjournment on the 16th of August. That preference I would unhesitatingly surrender, if I could but be persuaded that the interest of the country, or the business of the session could be promoted and advanced by it. But my impressions, Mr. President, are decidedly the other way. I verily believe that we hold the House under a solemn and binding obligation—a bond which I am unwilling to cancel—that it shall so dispose of the bills which await its action, as to send them hither in season to enable us to bestow upon their merits our most serious and most considerate attention. We need not fear that by concurring in the resolution upon our table we will be exposed to a renewal of the mortifying scenes which were exhibited here at the last session, in the hurry with which we had to act upon most important and momentous measures. The House will feel the weight of responsibility that rests upon its shoulders, and is not likely to overlook the duties which that responsibility imposes. Should we not concur in the resolution as we have it on our desks, the friends of the amendment postponing the adjournment to the 30th of August, may find it at least difficult to bring the House to assent to it; and then we are again thrown at its mercy, and with no better prospect of ending our labors than we had three months ago. It seems to be an object, on all hands, that the session should speedily be brought to a close. The country, I apprehend, is rather more anxious lest, in what remains of it, we should do too much, than that we should do too little. By fixing the adjournment for the 16th of August, we have still twenty-six days left for winding up and closing our labors. I would wish honorable Senators to distrust neither the House nor themselves, and they will soon discover that there is ample time in those twenty-six days for perfecting leisurely what may be incomplete, and for doing up without precipitancy what may remain undone. The postponement insisted upon, we all know, will advance none of the objects sought to be attained through it. We will be, on the 31st of August, precisely where we would have been on the 16th. The longer we postpone the adjournment, the greater will the tendency be to crowd the Journal in both Houses with new schemes of legislation, that will come and press upon us at the last hour, to the detriment of the legitimate business which should take precedence upon them, and which will only be attended to in earnest, when it shall be ascertained that there is a fatal day, and a fatal hour, beyond which they cannot be expected to reach. Such being the view which I have taken of the question, my vote shall be on this, as it was on a former occasion, for adjourning on the 16th.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say again, that I really can see nothing to be accomplished, nothing to be gained, by acting upon the resolution at this time. I must say, that so far as I can judge, I cannot see that the business of the session is in such a condition as to allow us to fix a day of adjournment. Take, for instance, the deficiency bill—a bill that ought to have been passed almost the first week of the session, which we only passed the other day, and then with great difficulty. That being the case, I am unwilling, while the question is in our own power, to let that power depart from us. I would rather let the resolution lie on the table; and when we think the proper time has come for adjourning, we can designate the time, and send the resolution to the House.

Mr. SMITH. I move to amend the resolution in conformity with the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] the other day, to strike out the "16th," and insert the "30th," which is the last Monday in August. I suppose it is in order to do that now, notwithstanding the vote of the Senate the other day, by which the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair considers it to be in order. The subject comes up at a subsequent day. It does not prevent the Senate from deciding now that they will do what they then decided they would not do. This resolution is not like a bill.

Mr. SMITH. I hope that the vote will be taken upon this subject without any very protracted discussion. It is hardly worth while to spend another day in debating it. I cannot, however, but feel some degree of surprise, after the experience we have had on this subject, that an honorable member of this body should suppose that the business of the session can be brought to a close without fixing a day of adjournment; or that he should suppose that we can, until we do fix that day, make any very considerable progress with the public business. I care not how long we remain here; we may go along, with the day undetermined, from now until the middle of September, and we shall be, substantially, in the same condition that we now are. It may be very deplorable that it should be so; it may be very deplorable that the appropriation bills are to be sent into this Chamber from the House of Representatives, within some six, or eight, or ten days of the adjournment; it may be very deplorable that we should be obliged to hand over those bills to the Committee on Finance, and that they should be reported to us, and we be compelled to act upon them, as we have been heretofore, without an opportunity to give them hardly a moment's consideration. Such has been our past experience, and such, I venture to predict, will be our experience at the present session of Congress; and, therefore, I venture to make an appeal to my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. HUNTER], to take this business into his own hands—and I hope he will do it next session of Congress—and prepare the bills, and report them to the Senate, to the end that we may take them up, and give them some consideration.

I repeat, sir, until we fix the day; until it becomes certain that Congress will adjourn within some short period, no considerable progress will be made with the public business. What is the condition of bills that have passed the Senate and been sent to the House of Representatives? I do not know that it is in order for me to refer to it, but I believe that if we could ascertain the truth, if we could have the facts before us, we should ascertain that a vast number of them now lie accumulated on the table of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which have not received even a reference to the proper committees of that body.

I trust, therefore, without dwelling upon the subject, that we shall now fix the day of adjournment. I know we shall be involved in difficulty, and serious difficulty, too; but it is inevitable. I hope we will now fix the day for adjournment; and I am in favor of the last Monday in August. I cannot concur with the opinion of my honorable friend from Louisiana upon this subject. That honorable Senator says, that the House of Representatives have taken the responsibility of fixing the 16th day of August. When did they assume that responsibility? Several weeks ago; and it was on the assumption that we would then agree to it. But the state of things is now entirely altered. We have a totally different state of things. If we agree to the resolution, it will be passed; and the House will have no opportunity to review the question, whether, in the present condition of the public business, they will be in a condition to adjourn on the day they originally named. The House, therefore, cannot properly be said, under the existing circumstances of the case, to have assumed the responsibility of deciding now, that we can adjourn on the day named by them; but by amending the resolution, as I now propose, we can send it back to the House, and they will have an opportunity to review the subject and to decide anew, whether they will be prepared to adjourn, either on the day named in the amendment, or on that named in their resolution. If they say now, that they can be prepared to adjourn on the day originally named by them, I shall, for one, be prepared to agree in it. But I think that they ought to have an opportunity to review the question, inasmuch as we did not act on it with any great degree of promptitude, which opportunity they will have, if the amendment prevails.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will take occasion to state to the Senate, that, after reflecting for a moment upon the subject, he is now under the impression that the question having been once decided by the body on the yeas and nays, a motion to fix the same day which was once moved and rejected by a vote of the Senate cannot be made. The Chair will read the parliamentary law on the subject:

"A question once carried cannot be questioned again at the same session; but must stand as the judgment of the house."

Mr. BRODHEAD. I presume that the amendment can be received by unanimous consent, and that we can take a vote upon it.

Mr. ADAMS. I beg leave to suggest that it was in reference to that very rule of the Senate that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. NORRIS] moved a reconsideration of the vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] with a view of bringing it up again.

Mr. SMITH. To relieve the Chair and the Senate from any difficulty on the subject, I will move to insert "Tuesday the 31st." It cannot make any essential difference whether we adjourn on Tuesday or Monday. I move to strike out "Monday the 16th," and insert "Tuesday the 31st."

The PRESIDENT. That will be in order.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I accord with what has been said by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS.] So far as respects myself, there is no member of the Senate more desirous than I am of returning to my family, and not one who has fewer personal motives to remain here than I have. But there are considerations higher than those. There is a change going on in the legislative organization of this Government such as would work great changes in other Governments under other circumstances. Under the Constitution we are a coordinate branch of the Government. By the Constitution we have the right to originate any bills except money bills—except bills raising taxes on the people. Those we cannot originate. The initiatory step in regard to such bills must be taken by the House of Representatives. We can originate any appropriation bill as well as the House of Representatives; but the practice has been that they originate in the other House, and I suppose the Senate would be unwilling to depart from that practice, except under extreme circumstances. Practically, we are reduced to a legislative cipher in regard to appropriation bills, and there is not a member on this floor who does not know it. The time has come when a practical remedy should be applied. Bills are forced upon us at the last moment of the session; and you know, Mr. President, and all of us know, that they have been passed by the Senate without our knowing one word that was in them. We have been driven to this extremity: either to stop the financial operations of the Government, or to pass hastily bills that we have never seen, and know not what they contain.

Mr. President, that is not the power given to us by the Constitution. We owe it to our position, we owe it to our duty, as one of the great depositories of the legislative power of this country, and we owe it to the Constitution itself, that we should have time to look into those bills, and act upon them on our own responsibility.

Gentlemen talk about a joint rule to prevent bills coming to us within a few days before the close of the session. What good will it do? We all know that such rules are suspended at the very last moment of a session. They are practically so much waste paper. They have never prevented any single bill from either House going to the President. To my own personal knowledge, a President has had sometimes to sign bills at the last moment of the session without even reading them through.

Now, I insist that we have come to such a pass that there should be some practical check put to this great legislative evil. We cannot discharge our duties to the country under this state of things. We are becoming a mere court of registry; and worse than that, a court of registry without being able to read what we are called upon to register, without being able to exercise any rational control. We have to pass upon certain items in appropriation bills; and we ought to consider whether they are necessary—whether the public interest demands them; but every member knows we do not do it. I ask whether the personal convenience of any member, or any consideration stronger than that should stand in the way of our doing fearlessly our duty? I think the resolution should lie upon the table for the present. I believe that to be the only practicable remedy that is within our power. I believe it is a question between that and the actual surrender of the legislative power of this body to the House of Representatives. For my own part, I shall vote to lay the resolution upon the table until such a time as I think the Senate can act understandingly upon it, and know what bills they are called upon to pass, so that they can fulfill their duty. We are as much the Representatives of the American people as are the members of the House of Representatives. They are elected by the people. We represent the State sovereignties, which are as dear to the people of this country as any portion of our institutions. We are as responsible to them, and that responsibility I, for one, want to meet and discharge properly.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not enter into this discussion with any view of affecting the question before us, but with a view to make some general remarks which have been suggested by the observations of the honorable Senator from Michigan. The course of legislative proceedings at this session has made two pregnant indications, in my opinion; and they are, that measures of the greatest importance have been passed without discussion, and discussions have taken place upon matters that were not properly before the body. Yes, sir, we are departing from the proper mode of proceeding as a legislative body, to register the rescripts of another coordinate branch of the Legislature—I suppose I may speak of it from newspaper reports—which is taking up its time in discussing the present merits of the presidential can-cesses. The proceedings of the two separate bodies composing the Legislature, provided by the Constitution of the United States, must necessarily be conducted with comity, and that is the only rule. I speak of comity in the highest sense; not as mere idle courtesy, but that kind of comity which should require of one certain duties which essential justice dictates. Why are not the appropriation bills here? Am I to be told that by laying this resolution upon the table and taking time before we act upon it, we shall correct the evil which the honorable Senator from Michigan has so strongly pointed out; and which is but an omen to the times that this Government is changing its character entirely, and that Congress has lost the respect in the public mind which has heretofore been awarded to it, because it has become a mere public body, to speak as one would at a hustings? I believe that more bills have been passed by this body at this session than were ever passed at any session of Congress since I have been a member of the Senate; and there has been more discussion on matters that do not legitimately belong to the body which has taken jurisdiction of them.

Now, sir, I do not, upon this question, agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan—and I have a very great respect for his opinions; I would defer to them upon most matters, but upon this, if he intends to correct this evil, I think it should be done by leaving the subject, and agreeing to adjourn upon the 16th of August, the time proposed by the House of Representatives. Will it be said that by so doing we shall leave the wants of the country unprovided for—that we shall deny the money necessary to carry on this Government? Allow me to say—and I say it with great deference—that if Congress were not to meet for five years, or ten or twenty years, the Government of this country could exist and survive it. I have contemplated this subject well, and I believe if Congress were not to meet in ten years, it would be just as well for the interests and true liberties of the country. I am not one of those who believe that everything is to be done by the guardianship of Congress. I believe that one of the very best things that could occur, so far as regards the practical evil which we experience, would be to deny the supplies which might be exacted of us, not from an intelligent judgment, but which might be exacted from us, perhaps, by a combination—though I do not think it has ever occurred by a political combination—between the President and the House of Representatives. Such a thing might exist; there could be such a combination to withhold the appropriation bills, until such time that we would be bound merely to register their edicts. I do not believe any such thing has ever occurred. I believe the evils which have been complained of, occur entirely from the vicious tendencies of these bodies at Washington to discuss matters that do not belong to them. That is my opinion. I am willing to agree to adjourn on the 16th of August, and let the consequences fall where they may.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that if Senators were to consult their own private individual feelings, the earliest possible day named would meet the concurrence of the Senate, and I certainly should vote for the very earliest day. But there are public considerations which rise superior to individual wishes. I concur most cheerfully in every word, syllable, and letter, that fell from the Senator from Michigan. There are obligations, in my humble judgment, which rest upon us, and as one Senator here, I am disposed to concur with the Senator from Michigan, in meeting those obligations manfully.

The appropriation bills have been sent to us from the other branch of Congress heretofore on the last day, or last two days of the session—appropriating tens and twenties of millions of dollars. We are made responsible for those bills when they undergo what here is worse than the mockery of legislation. Why, sir, legislation presupposes that there is to be investigation and deliberation, and every Senator knows that that is a violent presumption, at least when applied to these bills. We have sent to the House a joint resolution, proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. NORRIS], to amend the joint rules so that the appropriation bills shall be sent to this branch of Congress at least ten days before its adjournment. I wish it had comported with the sense of the other House to have concurred with the Senate in the adoption of that resolution. If they had done so, I should have voted most cheerfully for any day they fixed, allowing us ten days to act on the appropriation bills. But the House of Representatives, in its wisdom, has not seen fit yet to concur with the Senate, and until it shall do so, or until we shall see some progress made, I intend to vote for no hour, no day of adjournment, no time which shall crowd those appropriation bills upon us in the last hours of the session.

Within the last few years I have seen an appropriation bill, appropriating $10,000,000, sent here, and Senators have been implored to desist from either excluding what was in the bill or including what it was believed by our committees should go into it. Senators here were deterred from offering any amendment, because we were admonished by the hands of the clock that a delay of a few minutes would defeat the bill.

I do not regard the defeat of the appropriation bills as a matter of so slight importance as the Senator from South Carolina does. I concur with him very fully in the belief that if we had but one session for some years, and made our appropriations to cover that period of time, we should have very little trouble. We are oppressed with an excess rather than a want of legislation; but while our appropriations are required to be made annually, I would hold it to be an evil if they were not annually made.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, if, like the Senator from South Carolina, I represented one of the old States, I should be indifferent about the time when Congress adjourns, because no local legislation is needed in his State which can even, as he supposes, go on independently of this Government; but it is entirely different with the State which I represent. We have a great deal of local legislation indispensably necessary to be passed by Congress, and hence the time of adjournment is of very great importance to the State of California.

I agree with the Senator from Michigan, and the Senator from Maine, that we never should determine on the day of adjournment until the appropriation bills are sent to us from the House of Representatives. A few days ago we discussed the question of adjournment, and we refused then to pass or amend the House resolution. Immediately afterwards we passed a resolution proposing to amend the joint rules by which no day of adjournment was to be fixed until ten days after the appropriation bills were sent to us. How has the House met that proposition? This morning, instead of taking it up, what have they done? They have set aside this proposition to amend the rules and all the appropriation bills, and taken up the river and harbor bill, so as to send it to us as they sent it last year, to destroy the whole legislation of the country, or force us to pass it.

I am not willing to submit to any such coercion. I am not willing to see appropriation bills amounting to $40,000,000 pass in three or four hours, at the close of the session, as we were forced to pass them at the last session, owing to the fact that the river and harbor bill was brought up to block legislation, or to compel us to pass it. I am utterly opposed to fixing any day of adjournment, until we get the appropriation bills here so that we may examine and discuss them. I hope the Senate will never again put it in the power of the House of Representatives to coerce us as we were at the last session of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of giving any advice to the House of Representatives, nor for the purpose of administering any rebuke to them. They have responsibilities of their own which I believe they perfectly well understand. They comprehend their own duties and are responsible to those who sent them here. I would rather look here, and inquire what, under the circumstances, we ourselves ought to do to take care of our own appropriate sphere of action. If the House do not go forward as rapidly as we desire, I would leave them to choose their own time, and take their own action, to execute the duties which are imposed upon them. I have very little faith in any of these means of forcing legislation by agreeing upon a day of adjournment, or by any other mode. I would shun the difficulty which has been pointed out by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS], and perhaps it will require a little patience on our part to do it.

I believe it is agreed in the Senate, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Finance so said to us the other day, that it is impossible to get through with the business by the day of adjournment proposed by the House. It will leave us no time for deliberation here. What is the proposition now under consideration? It is to extend that time to a future day. Do gentlemen imagine that they are to force the House of Representatives by such a process? Suppose we amend the resolution in the form proposed, and send it to the House, we then place it in the hands of the House to dispose of it as they please. We shall have lost all our power over it. We shall have lost, what now lies in our hands, the control of this measure, which by many gentlemen is esteemed a matter of very great consideration under the circumstances which exist. Now, would it be wise, if they are right in the view which they take of the subject, to extend the time named by the House to a future day by the amendment and throw the matter back into the House of Representatives again? I think it would not. I wish, as I said the other day, to see my way clear through this matter before I undertake to fix a day of adjournment. I wish to see that we have proper time to act upon the important measures which shall be sent to us, and which must be sent to us from that body. I would reserve the fixing of a day of adjournment until we see daylight. With these views, I shall vote against all these propositions.

Mr. MASON. When this resolution was before the Senate a few days ago, I voted for the amendment of my colleague to postpone the time of adjournment till the 30th of August. I did it because I concurred in the opinion of that honorable gentleman, and others, that we should not have sufficient time, judging from the probable course of action of the coordinate branch of the Legislature, to perfect the appropriation bills within that time. I shall now change my vote. I believe that, between now and the 16th of August, we shall have sufficient time to perfect the appropriation bills, provided they are immediately acted upon in the House, where they originate. But, if other legislation is to take precedence of them, I am for concurring at once in the proposition of the House, in order to induce them, if practicable, to confine their deliberations, till the close of the session, to the appropriation bills. I do not believe that requiring the appropriation bills to be sent here in ten days, or fourteen days, or twenty-four days, before the adjournment, will expedite the action of the House upon those bills. If it be expedited at all, it will be from our prompt action on the determination of the House to adjourn on the 16th of August.

I agree with the Senator from Michigan, that all deliberation has practically been taken from us on the most important questions belonging to this Government—the appropriation of the money of the people. If there be any mode of correcting the evil which he has pointed out, I will go with gentlemen in devising that mode. It may be by originating these bills here. I see no objection to originating the bills here, except a proper regard for the practice of the country. But, if the Senate is to be driven to it, I shall go with gentlemen in doing it. But I shall change my vote now on this subject. I will vote for the day of adjournment named by the House, and I will do it with the belief that the House will conform its action to its own act in fixing that day; with the belief that it will bring to the notice of the country the fact that, if the appropriation bills are lost, it will be by the habitual action—I will not say of which House. If they are put off till the last days of the session, so that we have no time for deliberation, I wish to let the country see who is responsible for it. I will take the responsibility, for one, of now fixing the day. I am willing to vote for the earliest day—that which was suggested by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BELL. I do not rise to notice any suggestion thrown out to remedy the mischief of having appropriation bills sent here during the few last days of the session, as they have heretofore been to the great embarrassment of the Senate, because they could not be considered maturely by us. From my experience of the legislation of Congress for many years, I never expect to see the time when many of the most important bills will not have to be acted upon by one House or the other in the very closing hours of the session. It results from the constitution of Congress, and from the freedom of discussion and debate, and the freedom of action of the members, and from the general disposition to throw off the most important matters that come before us for consideration until the close of our services here at each session.

With regard to the particular proposition now before the Senate, it occurs to me that the resolution was in the most effective position when it was lying on the table for the present. We had some very appropriate discussion the other day, which was calculated to have a proper effect on the country, and on the Senate and House of Representatives. I think it had some effect. I think that the postponement of the question at that time was very properly made; and I may say that I think some Senators are rather unjust to the House in saying or supposing that under the pressure of that debate they would not expedite the business in the House. Let me enumerate some things that they have done since the discussion of the other day. They have closed up the deficiency bill with very little trouble, and without loss of time, and have passed the Indian appropriation bill in a reasonable time. They took up also and passed the Military Academy bill, a subject which has often occupied days and days of discussion; and now they have taken up the river and harbor bill, and will probably dispose of it in a few days. But the objection now made is, that the river and harbor bill is interposed between the appropriation bills, and this industry and dispatch which has been manifested in the House within the last few days does not content the Senate. They would have been content, perhaps, if the river and harbor bill had not been interposed.

But that bill is one of those very measures which require the most mature consideration; it is one which is usually composed of many items which deserve the consideration of both bodies. It relates to a branch of public policy which has been considered of great importance by several Administrations, though there have been intermissions in that policy, and it may be said that the public mind is not fully settled as to the question whether it is a proper policy or not. I think the House of Representatives have taken the proper steps by taking up that question in advance of some of the appropriation bills, in order that it may be acted upon and sent to the Senate, so that it may meet with due consideration here, before the other appropriation bills are thrown in pell-mell at the close of the session. The probability is, that unless we get at the consideration of that great measure soon, it will have to be passed without consideration, or be condemned with as little. Whatever may be the opinion of the majority of the people of the United States, it is a question which excites deep interest in a large portion of the Union, particularly in the Northwest, and in some degree in the Southwest. It is a proper subject to be taken up, as a measure of importance, and which ought to be dispatched by the House and given to the Senate in due time for their deliberation; and whatever may be the final decision upon the question, it should be maturely considered. I presume it was taken up by the House with a view to giving it due consideration there in the first place, and, secondly, to give the Senate an opportunity to discuss and consider the policy of that measure. It is in some sense an appropriation bill. Bills of that nature heretofore have contained appropriations to an amount of some two or three millions of dollars. And it does not lose the character of a most important measure, and at the same time of an appropriation bill, because its policy has sometimes been favored by one Administration, and again condemned by another.

I rose, however, for the purpose of saying that the debate here, the other day, has had a salutary effect on the House, as I think, and that they have done well since that discussion, and if we think proper to let it lie on the table another week it will still have a salutary effect. I think that the House are now under some obligations to send the appropriation bills here before the 16th of August. Members of that House must feel the force of that obligation. This is a mode of giving activity and energy to their movements, and I would suggest, though I will not move it, that the resolution had better lie on the table another week. I am myself ready to adjourn on the 16th of August, if we can have the most important appropriation bills sent to us. I voted, the other day, for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] because, having the control as he does, of the most important bills before either House of Congress, I thought his opinion was entitled to some deference. I think it possible now, that we may get through by the 30th, and if the House of Representatives will send the appropriation bills here by the sixteenth, we can do it. But, as I suggested before, I hope the Senate will agree to let the resolution lie on the table for a few days longer, so that we may see if it will not quicken the movements of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PRATT. I concur entirely in what has been said by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] I believe that the self-respect and the preservation of the purity, the independence at least, of this body, as one of the branches of the National Legislature, depend on our prompt and decisive action on this question.

The House of Representatives, a month ago or more, passed a resolution, stating that they would be ready to adjourn on the 16th of August; they have not asked us to send that resolution back; they have not made any motion to reconsider that vote; therefore they say, in effect, to the country that they are now prepared to adjourn on the 16th of August! That is what the country must understand, and can only understand, by the action of the House of Representatives. Well, now we are asked to say that we cannot adjourn on the 16th of August, because, it is said, the appropriation bills will not be sent here in sufficient time to admit of due consideration by the Senate! The only mode of correcting this evil is, by bringing public opinion to bear on it; and the only mode by which you can bring public opinion to bear, is to reject the appropriation bills sent here at the close of a session, unless they come in time to enable us to consider them—and to consider them with proper deliberation. There can be no doubt as to what should be our course with respect to this question, in my opinion. Let the amount of evil caused by the rejection of the appropriation bills be what it may, it is nothing comparable to the mischief produced by one branch of the Legislature forcing the other to act without really knowing what they act upon.

The House of Representatives have said, and now say, to the country, that they are ready to adjourn on the 16th of August. Let us adopt the resolution they have sent here, and if they do not enable us to receive the appropriation bills in sufficient time before the 16th to consider them deliberately, let us reject the bills; then the public will see where the evil lies and correct it. But if you postpone the day of adjournment; if no such consequence grows out of it, public opinion will not be drawn to the subject, and the evil will last forever. Suppose that the appropriation bills are not passed, and we adjourn at the day appointed by the House resolution, we meet again on the 1st December, and I want to know where is the great and overwhelming hardship to the country, if they are not passed? I am unable to see it.

I think this resolution affords us an opportunity upon which I am anxious to seize to procure a decision by which the attention of the public will be drawn to the question; and I do hope, if the House of Representatives do not send us the appropriation bills in time to enable us to consider them maturely, that we will adjourn without acting upon them. I am desirous that such an event should occur, in order that the public may see the evil and correct it, as it can only be corrected by the sound action of public opinion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It occurs to me that if we occupy the whole time between this and the 16th of August in discussing this question of fixing a day for adjournment, we shall not be very likely to get through the business by that day. If, however, we would postpone all unnecessary discussions, possibly we might get through by that time. If we continue to debate this matter for two weeks, I do not think that the opinion of any one will be changed. I therefore hope that the question will be taken.

Mr. GWIN. When the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] was passing a eulogy upon the House of Representatives for taking up the river and harbor bill, I wish at the same time he had told the Senate why it was not taken up four or five months ago, so that we might have had an ample opportunity for discussing it in the Senate. Instead of adopting this course dictated by an obvious sense of duty, they have passed it over until the seventh or eighth month of the session, and that, too, after passing a resolution that they will adjourn on a given day.

The House commences the discussion of this important measure when there is scarcely time to pass the necessary appropriation bills, and will send it here to impede the passage of these bills as it did before. I am prepared to take up and give a deliberate discussion to the river and harbor bill when there is time for such discussion; but I am opposed to giving it precedence of the whole important business of the country. I am by no means willing, Mr. President, to see the experiment which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PRATT] seems to court. This Government has been in existence under the Constitution for upwards of sixty years, and the appropriation bills have never yet been lost. I do not wish to see such an experiment tried.

Mr. CLEMENS. I agree with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that we had better go to voting, and for that purpose I shall make a motion; but before I do so I wish to answer one or two suggestions which have been made by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT.] That Senator says that the House of Representatives yet say that they are ready to adjourn. He is mistaken, however, for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says that they cannot be ready by the 16th of August. His opinion is, that if this resolution had been adopted when it first came here, the House would have worked up to it; but that now it is altogether impossible to get through the business by that time.

Another thing: the Senator from Maryland said he would be quite willing to adjourn without passing any appropriation bills. I have no doubt that the Whigs generally, both in this and the other House, would be perfectly willing to adjourn without passing any appropriation bills, and then, when they had an opportunity of going before the country, amuse themselves by laying all the blame upon the Democrats. I move to lay the whole subject upon the table; and upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I will ask if that motion should prevail, whether it will not be perfectly in order to move to take up the resolution at any time?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly the subject can be taken up at any time upon motion to take it up.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted—yeas 19, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aitchison, Bell, Brooke, Cass, Clemens, Davis, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Felch, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Shields, Stockton, and Sumner—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Butler, Charlton, Chase, Clarke, Dawson, Douglas, Fish, Foth, Houston, Hunter, James, King, Mason, Meriwether, Miller, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Toucey, Upham, Wade, and Weller—32.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question now occurs on postponing the further consideration of the resolution until this day week.

Mr. BELL. If the Senate will allow me, I will withdraw that motion. I see that it is the sense of the Senate to fix a day.

No objection being made the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. CHASE. When this question was under the consideration of the Senate a few days since, I voted against the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. HUNTER,] to strike out the "16th August," and insert instead the "30th August," as the day of adjournment; but it now appears, by the information received from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, [Mr. HOUSTON,] that it will be impossible to get through the business by the 16th August; I shall therefore reverse my former vote, and now vote for the proposed amendment.

It is very well known, by those who are acquainted with the early history of this Government, that, almost at the outset, a proposition was made to divide the business between the Senate and the House of Representatives. That proposition did not prevail, and then grew up the practice, which has ever since prevailed, of originating all the appropriation bills in the House of Representatives, and then sending them to the Senate. There is nothing, however, in the Constitution requiring this course of action, and before we complain of the House of Representatives for negligence in the performance of its duties, it seems to me that it belongs to us to ascertain the extent of our powers, and then, if the appropriation bills are not sent to us soon enough by the House of Representatives to enable this body to act on them, we should originate those bills here, and send them down to the House.

I do not concur in one observation which was made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] He seems to think that this Government would get along very well without any sessions of this body or of the House of Representatives; that if Congress were not to sit for twenty years—I believe that was the period he named—Government would proceed quite as well as if we had our regular annual sessions. I concur rather in the remark of a distinguished French civilian, that "every departure from annual legislative sessions is an approach to despotism;" and I believe that if that event should take place, which the Senator seems to contemplate with favor, the suspension of the sessions of Congress for a period of ten or twenty years, the result would necessarily be either the consolidation of the Government and the establishment of a despotism, or the dissolution of the Union. Neither of these events could I contemplate without pain and dismay.

Upon the whole, I am in favor of action upon this subject now—in favor of fixing that time which the chairman of the Committee on Finance here, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, indicate as the time within which the business of Congress can be accomplished. I shall therefore vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] to the resolution as it now stands.

Mr. DAWSON. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLEMENS] took occasion to say, a few moments ago, that every Whig on this floor would be willing to adjourn without passing the appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. CHASE] has made allusion to my remarks, and I wish to correct myself if the Senator from Georgia will allow me.

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I have stated, Mr. President, that I wished to correct myself, and in doing so I shall take the liberty of making a few remarks applicable to the Senator from Ohio, as he has gone out of his way to attribute to me language which I did not employ. I believe I did say, sir, that this Government would go on without a meeting of Congress for three or four, or perhaps even for ten years; and in making that remark, my view was to show its stability. I am not one of those who believe so entirely in the supremacy of Federal legislation. I am one of a class of politicians that believe that if there were less influence exerted through the Federal head, and more honor in the different parts of the Confederacy, we should have the elements of an honorable Union—a Union unlike that which is now almost torn asunder by the agitating speeches of Jacobins in this Hall.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is sorry to interrupt the Senator, but he must remind him that the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed to the resolution in regard to adjournment. The Senator, therefore, must be aware that he is not speaking in order.

Mr. BUTLER. When I say that subjects have been agitated in this Hall having a Jacobin tendency, am I out of order? Can I not refer to such speeches?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly, in a general way.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, then, let those make the application of the remark who have introduced the elements of discord into this House. I am willing to take my share of it, sir, if any applies to me. But, sir, allow me to say that I believe there are elements of perpetuity in American and Saxon institutions independent of the annual agency of Congress; and if I did not believe it I should have but a poor opinion of, and very little confidence in, republican institutions. Yes, sir, my confidence in the perpetuity of republican institutions would die the moment I could suppose it depended upon the wisdom of men who choose to claim, for the Federal Government, powers which were never conceded to it. Sir, what has this Government become? A mere agency to collect and distribute money, or to meet and generate discussions of the most injurious kind—discussions calculated to throw apart the different members of this Union, bound together by a common league. When I used the remark to which allusion has been made I did so with no view of introducing the topic which the gentleman from Ohio has introduced, let him disguise it as he may. I did not introduce it with any such view; but I do say that I do not think I shall submit to any species of legislation in the other House which is unconstitutional and offensive. That was my object; and I thought the sooner we come to the issue—the practical question—the better, if you must have a practical Government.

Before I close, allow me to make a remark in regard to what was said by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] He has introduced another topic here, which does not belong to this occasion. Sir, if we had assented to the proposition of the House of Representatives fixing the 16th of August as the day of adjournment, would the river and harbor bill have been taken up in the House? No, sir; not at all. And that very fact shows that, by taking up any given topic for discussion, they can force this body to adopt their measures; and I suppose that, in that way, the river and harbor bill will be forced upon us. No doubt they have counted the votes, and intend that it shall be passed without discussion. I know that those who have the power can distribute the public money, or the public lands of this country; but I am not to be satisfied, as the Senator from Tennessee would be, by taking a silent vote, without raising my voice upon the subject. But, sir, that fact shows the importance of our coming to some conclusion. Fix a time for adjournment. Let it be the time which the House itself has fixed—the 16th of August; and I will warrant you that it will at once take up and dispose of all the appropriation bills necessary to carry on the Government. I never have said that appropriations for objects within the legitimate and constitutional sphere of this Government should not pass. I have never said that appropriations for the support of the Army and Navy, and other constitutional purposes, should not be made. No such thing, sir; and more, so long as I have anything to do with the Government, I shall not fail to do my duty in these respects. If such appropriations are defeated, it will not be by my agency. It is not our fault, but the fault of the times, that measures are brought here which are not within the sphere of our constitutional duties, and with which we have no right to meddle.

Neither am I to be told, Mr. President, by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] that the State of South Carolina is not interested in appropriations of this Government. I made no allusions to California which were not perfectly respectful. It is true that I was opposed to her admission into the Union, for reasons which I urged at the time, and which I still think were good. But I have ceased to make war upon California; and since she has been admitted I am as ready to do justice to her as I am to any other State, notwithstanding I had some objection to her coming into the Union. All I said was, and I say it again, that from her position she will be an ally to the doctrine of free trade, and will, at the same time, uphold the constitutional rights of the minority. But, sir, I did not rise to go into these questions, but simply to say, that when gentlemen rise to make allusions which are not called for, they should remember the proverb which says, "Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones."

Mr. GWIN. Only one word. The Senator from South Carolina must have misunderstood me. I simply stated that South Carolina was not so deeply interested in local legislation as California.

Mr. DAWSON. As I was going on to observe, sir, when interrupted by the Senator from South Carolina, a friend of mine [Mr. CLEMENS] has said that he had no doubt every Whig on this floor was desirous that Congress should adjourn without passing the appropriation bills. So far as I am concerned, I disclaim that imputation. I do not desire that Congress should adjourn without passing the appropriation bills, nor do I wish the impression to go abroad to the country that either branch of Congress is governed by such a determination. If any one desired to discuss this question, so as to make that appeal, the proposition should have been started at an earlier day. Why are we delayed now, and constrained to continue this session of Congress down to the 31st of August? Is it from the want of the appropriation bills? Is that the fault of the Senate? Not at all. The Constitution requires that all appropriation bills shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Several SENATORS. No! No! No!

Mr. CASS. Tax bills only.

Mr. DAWSON. Well! All bills for the purpose of raising revenue; and we have adopted the principle that all bills of this nature should originate in the House of Representatives, so that it has acquired the force of a constitutional provision. That is what I wished to say, and what I wish to be understood. Now, these appropriation bills have not reached us; the fault is not ours; nor, perhaps, is it that of the House of Representatives. But, supposing that the House of Representatives had been determined to force these measures through, and to force an early adjournment of Congress, had they not the power to do so? Are parties so equally divided in the House of Representatives that it is with difficulty that you can get an appropriation bill presented? I presume not. The majorities are tremendous in both branches of Congress. Why, then, insinuate the remark that the Whigs are desirous of adjourning without passing the appropriation bills? Why insinuate that one party is desirous of preventing their passage? Such an insinuation has not operated on either party. The delay has grown out of the peculiar character of the present Congress, and out of the exciting circumstances connected with it. We find ourselves subjected to the influence of these circumstances, and we cannot avoid it. We must adjourn, and we must pass the appropriation bills, and the question is: What is the best plan to adopt for the accomplishment of that object?

The other day, I voted for the motion to adjourn on the 16th of the ensuing month; and I did so under the conviction, at that time, that the House of Representatives would be enabled to send the appropriation bills to us sufficiently early to act on them before that day; as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] stated that we would be able to pass them all in ten days, I had no difficulty in voting for that resolution. But it seems now that the House cannot send the bills soon enough to adjourn at that date, and the only difficulty I have in changing my vote is this: it will appear, by the record, that the House of Representatives asked us to adjourn on the 16th of next month, and that we refuse to do so. Is that a position which we ought to occupy? My friend, the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS,] informs us that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives says, that it will be impossible to adjourn before the last day of August. Well, perhaps that statement by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will change the aspect of things; but why has not the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means caused an intimation to be sent to this body, of the impracticability, or impossibility, of adjournment on the 16th? That House is composed, immediately, of the representatives of the people; for the discharge of their duty they are directly answerable to the people; our Government is a representative Government, and as, in accordance with its forms, that House is an emanation from the people, and is answerable to them, it must alone bear the blame of the delay; let us, therefore, adopt any resolution relative to the adjournment that the representatives of the people may send, and leave them to make the necessary explanations, and bear the responsibility.

I prefer, like the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] that we should run the risk of passing these bills, rather than accept the position that we now occupy, for it seems probable that the question—who is to blame for the delay in the business of this Congress? will become a matter of discussion. It appears to be made a question before the country; and I desire that the representatives of the States should stand correctly before the public, and that the immediate representatives of the people should assume their own responsibilities. If these bills had been reported to us as early as the month of June—and seven months should have been sufficient to prepare them—we should have passed them, and would be ready to adjourn to-day, but we have not yet seen them. Nevertheless, the business of the Senate is now as far advanced as it ever has advanced during a long session of Congress; perhaps more bills have been passed now than ever was passed during any long session heretofore held.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I think more.

Mr. DAWSON. And yet the imputation which seems to rest on us is that we have failed to discharge our duty. Why should that imputation be permitted to rest on us?

I beg to say that Congress has the power to change the day of adjournment, even after it has been fixed by a concurrent resolution. If we concur in this resolution, and the House of Representatives find it out of their power to get through with their business at the time fixed, let them send us another. That will place us in a proper attitude before the country. I say nothing on this question which I desire should go to the country for the purpose of influencing the public mind. All I desire is that the Senate may be placed fairly on this question, and occupy the position before the country which it really does occupy. These are my views, and therefore I urge that we should adopt the resolution sent to us by the House, and let the House send us back another, asking an extension of the time, if they desire it. We know what committees have to report last: The chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House. Can any one say that the chairman of the Committee on Finance here has not discharged his duty? Certainly not. He has brought everything before us for our action, which belongs to his committee; and if in the other branch of Congress everything has not come up, in consequence of the great amount of business to be acted upon, and on account of the great number of members of the House, who in consequence cannot act with so much facility as we do—perhaps they are not to blame, because their machinery is such as to cause more delay necessarily—that is not our fault. Let them say to us, if they find that they cannot get through with their business on the 16th, "We were mistaken when we passed the resolution." Hence I urge that we should adopt the resolution. One Senator has said that if we had concurred in the resolution when it first came here, they would have been ready to adjourn on the 16th of August, but because we did not concur in it, and hold them up to industrious habits, they have fallen back in the business. That is not so, I think. Let us take the resolution as it is, and adopt it, and then if they are not ready to adjourn we shall not be to blame.

Mr. CLEMENS. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] has asked why the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has not communicated the information to this body, that they cannot get through with the business in the House, so as to adjourn on the 16th of August? That is a very singular question. I do not know any means which he has of communicating officially with this body. It happened that he was standing by my seat while this discussion was going on, and I asked him the question: Can you get through with the business of the House by the 16th? He said, "No, we cannot; but I believe if you had adopted the resolution when it was first sent, the House would have been induced to work up to it; now it is too late, it is impracticable." That is the way in which it was communicated to me, and that is the only manner in which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means can communicate to this body, that is, through the individual members of it.

As the Senator from Georgia has chosen to refer to a playful remark made by me, that I had no idea that there was a Whig member of this body who would not like to see the appropriation bills fail, so that they might charge their failure upon the Democrats of this body, I must say, and say it seriously, too, that I see and know what must be the result. There are questions pending here for the revision of the tariff, and it may very well be, that that tariff should be amended, and I may be in favor of some amendments; but if the bills are lost for want of time, what will be the result? Every Whig speaker in Pennsylvania will tell the people that the Democrats prevented their getting the tariff. There are improvements which may be made in rivers and harbors which may be needed; but I do not intend to vote for the bill blindly. Suppose that bill is lost, as it was before, and as it shall be again, if I can defeat it under the same circumstances, every Whig speaker in the Northwest will tell his people that this Congress have refused to do justice to the Northwest, and thus claim the election of the Whig candidate for the Presidency. Gentlemen know these things will happen. I do not intend to place myself, nor the party with which I act, in such a position. I intend that the appropriation bills shall take their regular course. If they do not come here within the three days of the end of the session, as the rule requires, I will take the responsibility of killing them. So with regard to the river and harbor bill. I shall vote for the earliest day for adjournment, and then I will kill their bills, if they do not come here in due time.

Mr. RUSK. I do not think that the question whether the House or the Senate is to blame, nor which of them is entitled to the most credit, nor do I believe that any question respecting the dissolution of the Union, or want of respect by this body toward the other, is involved in this subject. I think the only question legitimately before us is, whether or not we can pass the bills upon which we are to act before the 16th of August. Gentlemen say we have not time to do it. One gentleman says we have not time to discuss them properly. I suppose that if we could discuss them until we were satisfied, we should not adjourn this year. Another gentleman says that he is informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, that it is impossible to get through those bills by the time they had fixed. I have great respect for the opinion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; but I have another opinion myself, and I believe that when pressed into the service he can do a great deal more business than he supposes. We have now more than three weeks to go upon before the 16th of August, and the question is, whether the two Houses can pass the regular appropriation bills by that time. It is a longer time, according to my recollection of what has happened in the past, than we have ever devoted to them. You may fix the day of adjournment at the 30th of August, or the 30th of September, and these appropriation bills will be passed in the same hurly-burly fashion, as if you fix the day at the 16th of August. They will be acted upon in precisely the same manner, because the moment you fix the time, and extend it, other matters will come up, and presidential speeches will be made, and all the time we shall have to pass the appropriation bills will be the very last days of the session. The time of adjournment is approaching, and there is much anxiety on the subject, and a desire that we should have as much information as possible with regard to important measures which must be passed; but my own opinion is that we have ample time, and that we shall give as much time to the appropriation bills if we determine to adjourn on the 16th of August, as we shall have if we extend the time to the 31st. Under these circumstances, I intend to vote for concurring in the resolution as sent here by the House.

The business that may remain unfinished at the end of the session will come up at the next session without a re-reference to committees, and I think that on the whole it will be better for us, and better for the country, that we should have the appropriation bills passed on the 16th than on the 31st of August. I have been two or three times dreadfully alarmed for fear that the appropriation bills would be lost, but I never intend to be alarmed again. I saw the clock pointing to near the last moments of the session, and I begged gentlemen for God's sake to pass these bills. My friend from Missouri [Mr. ARCHISON] asked me not to beg gentlemen so earnestly, and said there was no danger that the appropriation bills would be lost. And after that we had ample time, for we did pass them, and had half an hour to spare.

Mr. STOCKTON. Being one of the humblest members of this august body of the representatives of the Federal Republic, I have been slow to participate in this discussion, and certainly should have said nothing on the subject if it had been confined to the mere question of agreeing to a day of adjournment. But a question has been connected with this discussion which seems to render it my imperative duty, as a representative of the State of New Jersey, to say a few words in relation thereto. In the first place, however, I must say that I do not concur in the reproaches which have been cast upon the other branch of Congress on account of any supposed delay in their business. If any delay has occurred, the reason is to be found in the great amount of business which Congress has had to consider and to act upon. Nor am I disposed to find fault with any of the discussions which have taken place on the subject of presidential candidates. They have been mostly interesting, and I do not know that they have interfered with the business of Congress. The business of Congress requires reflection and information, which is not to be attained in this Chamber alone. So far as I am concerned, sir, my mind has been more devoted to the consideration of the public business in my own than in the Senate Chamber. Therefore, so far as my voice goes, I am ready to acquit both Houses of Congress of any neglect of their appropriate duties. The delay, if any, has been caused by the amount and the importance of the business we have had before us. Though I am as desirous of returning to the bosom of my family as any member of this body can be, I would prefer that the resolution should lie on the table for the present; and until I can see more clearly the probable time when we may hope to finish the public business in a satisfactory manner to our constituents, well as ourselves.

Mr. President, I had no disposition to discuss this question, and but for the exciting speech made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] I should have remained silent. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] spoke of the importance of the harbor and river bill; and another Senator spoke of the importance of the tariff bill. With regard to the first I have but little to say at present, except to concur in its importance. With regard to the tariff, I must be permitted to say that I regard it of more consequence to my constituents than any other bill which has been, during the session, or is now pending before Congress. The tariff—ay, sir, the tariff—the mere mention of which startles gentlemen from their propriety, and drives them headlong into the question of the dissolution of the Union—I have to tell such gentlemen, let them come from where they will, or represent whom they may, that there are two sides to the question of the tariff; and, Democrat as I am, I intend that, on all proper occasions, my voice shall be raised in the Senate, and out of the Senate, in behalf of the poor laborer of the North; and he who represents the slave labor of the South may raise his voice as potential as he sees fit, he will not alarm, but find me prepared, to the best of my poor ability, to defend the interest of the free laborer of the North. But, sir, do not misunderstand me. I repudiate the doctrine of a tariff for the purpose of protecting one interest more than another interest, one section more than another section. We are not to consider the interests of fragments, but of the whole people; not of States, but of the nation. Sir, we must seek for some sound, well-settled principle upon which to rebuild this theory of the tariff.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must remind the Senator from New Jersey that the question is not upon the tariff, or upon any other bill.

Mr. STOCKTON. I am aware of that, sir.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator can allude to the subject of the tariff generally; but it will not be in order, upon the present question, to go into the merits or demerits of any tariff.

Mr. STOCKTON. What I mean to say is this: that the tariff bill is a matter of so much consequence, that it behooves Congress not to adjourn without modifying it; and I give that as a reason why we cannot now fix a day for adjournment. Besides, sir, the tariff bill to which I allude, is not for protection of manufacturers; it is not to be a tariff exclusively for revenue; but it is intended to protect millions of our fellow-citizens, who earn their bread by the toil of their own hands. I can tell the Senator from South Carolina that their interests are not much longer to be disregarded. Sir, this Government may survive the effects of the most disastrous battles; we may regain lost territory; but I tell him and others to be warned in time—that we may not be able to resist the importunate remonstrances of a free, but impoverished and degraded people.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New Jersey is under a great mistake. I made not the least allusion to the tariff. However, I suppose he may as well hang his speech on what I said, as on what was said by any other Senator. I certainly made no allusion to the tariff—not in the least.

Mr. STOCKTON. What I meant to say is this: that the tariff belongs to the business of Congress, and is entitled to as much of our time as any other matter. If the Senator from South Carolina did not speak of "free trade"—if he did not make use of that expression which naturally leads to the consideration of the whole subject of a tariff—then I stand before the Senate corrected.

Several SENATORS. He did. He did.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to correct the gentleman. I believe that if he chose to take the remark which I made in that view, he might have used it for the purpose of dilating upon the subject. I think, however, that the subject of the tariff was freely spoken of by the Senator from Alabama; and the remarks of that Senator, it appears to me, might have afforded the Senator from New Jersey a better text than my remark in regard to "free trade." The connection in which I spoke of free trade—and I hope the Senator from New Jersey, while he is in favor of the tariff, will not undertake to controvert the great doctrines of free trade—was in relation to California. Though that, as far as I know, does not involve the tariff, yet in candor to the Senator I must admit that I did speak of California as a probable ally against one which might be a proscriptive and protective tariff. My remark may allow that interpretation, but I used it at the time with no such purpose. I did not wish to introduce into this debate any topic which did not properly and legitimately relate to the subject. I did, perhaps, manifest some little temper, because I thought that some topics had been introduced here which ought not to be introduced, I will not say deliberately, but perhaps inadvertently. I think the Senator from New Jersey is at liberty to make his remarks both in regard to what was said by the Senator from Alabama and myself, for I believe we both, in some measure, said something in relation to the question of a tariff—though all that I said was a mere allusion, in the most casual way, to the subject of free trade.

Mr. STOCKTON. All that was necessary to fill the measure of my surprise on hearing the Senator's explanation, was for him to have added, that what he did say, was said in the most amiable and unexcitable and courteous manner. He put some interrogatory in regard to free trade. I do not remember its precise purport. But, sir, I am willing to confess my homage to the sublime and simple truths of Adam Smith, and the disciples of that school of political economists. I will go further, and say that I believe all the efforts that have been urged against his leading doctrines, and those of Ricardo on rent, have failed; but their application to this country, in its present condition, in relation to the rest of the world, and in reference to the commercial policy of other nations, is an entirely different question—the great question. It does appear to me, (not designing anything offensive), the most absurd thing in the world to be wrangling and quarreling about the abstract theories of free trade, when we have staring us in the face the necessity of raising fifty millions of annual revenue, which has, since the origin of Government, and must continue to be, almost entirely obtained from duties on imports. Now, sir, what I claim is the right, as a representative of New Jersey, interested as she is in the development of her iron, not to allow any reproach as to its importance, any insinuation as to its unconstitutionality, or any sneer at efforts made to modify the tariff without remarks from me. I hope before the session is over that gentlemen will have to face the music on that same question of the tariff. We mean, if we can, to get it up before the Senate, and we intend to explain to the Senate, and to the people, our objects, views, and motives in doing it. New Jersey means to insist that you shall unlock the hoards of treasure which slumber in the mountains that traverse her territory, as well as that of a sister State. She means to insist that by doing so you will not violate the Constitution; that you will only be fulfilling your obligations to further other interests besides those of commerce and agriculture; and I say this to show the importance of sitting two months longer, rather than avoid this great question.

Mr. HUNTER. I am constrained to ask if it is in order to debate the tariff on this resolution?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly not; but the Chair was unwilling to interrupt the honorable Senator.

Mr. STOCKTON. I am very much obliged to the Senator; but if he had taken the same trouble to arrest the extraordinary excitement of his own friend, he would not have had occasion to interfere in my behalf. [Laughter.] I did not intend to say a word about the day of adjournment. But, sir, you may expect to wake up New Jersey whenever the tariff is agitated; you may then look out for her. [Laughter.] I will now relieve you, Mr. President, by no longer persisting in this debate.

Mr. BORLAND. I shall not enter into the general considerations which have been presented at such length on this subject; but shall confine myself to the simple question before the Senate, and state, in as few words as I can, the reasons which control my vote. They are not personal to myself, so far as convenience or comfort are concerned—although I have as strong reasons, perhaps, in this respect, to induce me to adjourn at an early day, and go home, as any other Senator. Nor is it a question with me as to whether the Senate or House is to blame for delay. It is a practical question, however, with me, whether there be time allowed—reasonable time—for the passage of the important bills which are before the two Houses of Congress. Feeling as much concern, I apprehend, as other Senators, for the passage of bills which are general in their character, and which affect the interests of the whole Union, I have, at the same time, a particular interest for that region of country in which I reside, and for bills relating to it which are now at stake before the two Houses. Without undertaking to give the reasons, I express my conviction, that there is not time, between this and the 16th of August, for the passage of those bills; and I deem it to be of a great deal more importance to the country generally, and especially to my constituents, that we should sit here, at least until the last of August, or the last of September, if necessary, and take time for the passage of those bills, than that we should gain any other advantage, personal or otherwise, by an early adjournment. For that reason, and believing, from what I learn of the condition of things in the other House, that there may be time for the passage of these bills by the last of August, I shall vote for the substitution of the "31st" for the "16th" of August.

Before I conclude my remarks, without going into a general discussion, I wish to make a single statement of fact to the Senator from New Jersey. In intimating the importance of bills before the two Houses of Congress, as a consideration for prolonging or curtailing the session, I can say to him that the bill to which he alluded, and attached so much importance, so far as it affects the interests of the different States of this Union, affects the interests of my constituents, I apprehend, far more than his; for I think I can state as a fact, which cannot be controverted, that so far as iron is concerned, we have more of it in Arkansas at this time than would make the whole of New Jersey a solid mass of iron, and then as much copper besides.

Mr. DOWNS. Mr. President, as I voted to lay the resolution on the table, I shall vote for the latest day of adjournment proposed. I think there is no necessity for us to get up, at this late period of the session, after nearly eight months' sitting, a desire for a hasty adjournment—that, all at once an inspiration should come upon us that we are violating our duties if we do not, pell-mell, right or not right, fix an early day of adjournment, and go home whether the business be done or not. For one, I can see no reason for it. We came here to do the important and necessary business of the country. It is true, we have been here a great while. We have done much; but we have much yet to do—much which we may do in the course of the next month or six weeks; and I think it is more important to the country that we should take a reasonable time for the disposing of the business before us, than that we should, all at once, get up this fever, and rush home, whether the business before us is through or not.

I cannot see the consistency with which gentlemen, some of whom voted last week for the 30th of August as a proper day of adjournment, now say they will vote for the 16th. Why is this? They seem to have worked themselves into a sort of passion against the House of Representatives, because they have not sent bills here. I shall not enter into any crimination or recrimination with the House. I think it much more important to the Senate to be sure that we do our own duty before arraigning the conduct of others. They have their own responsibility. Let them meet it; I will not arraign them here.

This resolution came to us more than a month ago, I believe, and we took no action upon it then. On the contrary, when a member of the Senate who holds a most responsible position, and whose voice should have weight on the subject, suggested, at the time it came, that it ought to be postponed until the appropriation bills were sent to us, in order that we might know what time we should have, it was postponed. And now, after a month or six weeks, with the exception of two unimportant appropriation bills, which will not take up much time, we have not received any of those bills. When the time intervening between now and the day designated by the House is much shorter than if we had fixed the day of adjournment then, I cannot see the consistency or propriety of voting for the shortest period. There is a great deal of business that is now matured in both Houses; we have our minds made up on it; we have formed our opinions; we have discussed it, and reported upon it; it is now fresh in our minds; we can dispose of it now more satisfactorily to the country than we shall be able to do at any other time, when the discussions would all have to be renewed. Shall we break up under these circumstances, and go home without doing this business?

Gentlemen have referred to the appropriation bills, as if they were the only things before Congress. Why, Mr. President, they must have forgotten that there is a great deal of other very important business. The appropriation bills, I agree, will necessarily pass. They always do. And they will pass, if you should not take them up until the last day of the session. But there is something else before Congress besides them. What have we been discussing all the session? Where are the important railroad bills—some thirty or forty, I believe—which passed the Senate, and are not yet disposed of by the House? Where is that important bill about the homestead rights, which we have received from the House of Representatives, in favor of which you have so many memorials presented from so many quarters, and which has not yet been reported back from the Committee on Public Lands? Are we to get up and run home without acting on these measures? Where is that important bill, sent to us from the House, on the subject of granting public lands for railroads, upon which there is so strong a feeling in many States?

Although that bill contemplates a measure which was once rejected by the Senate, on an elaborate discussion; yet, perhaps, in the earnestness of the new States to do something on this important subject, those who opposed it before may finally, as a compromise, think it better to take that bill, with some modifications, rather than go home, after the urgent wish expressed in so many quarters in the new States to have these appropriations made, without getting anything.

Now, I, for one, anxious as I am to get away—and I am as anxious as any one—I am not willing to fix an unreasonably short period and go home; and when I am called upon by my constituents, to say why these measures were not disposed of, tell them it was because we had not time. I think it much better to take a month more, and have a reasonable time to dispose of these matters, than hasten off suddenly and leave them undisposed of.

Besides, if there is any blame—and I do not attach any blame to the House or Senate in this matter—after having delayed so long the proposition of the House to adjourn, to take it up at this time and concur in it, would be taking them by surprise. If there is any want of performance of duty on their part, by passing the resolution we shall relieve them from that responsibility, and take it upon ourselves. But, as was well observed, if we had fixed the time a month ago, when the resolution was sent here, it would have given a reasonable time to dispose of the important measures before Congress; whereas, if we take it up now and agree to it, we shall take them by surprise, and compel hasty and improvident action upon those measures. I hope, then, Mr. President, that the proposition to postpone the day of adjournment until the 31st of August, will be adopted. That will give us reasonable time. It will not allow time enough for long discussions; I presume no one wants to have them; but it will allow reasonable time to dispose of the appropriation, and other important bills in which the country feel a great interest. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to strike out "Monday the 16th," and insert "Tuesday the 31st."

Mr. BRODHEAD asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Cass, Chase, Clarke, Clemens, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Downs, Felch, Foot, Geyer, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, Meriwether, Miller, Pearce, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Upham, and Weller—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Butler, Charlton, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fish, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, King, Mason, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Soule, Sumner, Toucey, and Wade—23.

So the amendment was agreed to; and the question recurred upon the resolution as amended.

Mr. GWIN. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until this day week; and upon that motion ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Cass, Clemens, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Shields, Sumner, and Wade—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Charlton, Chase, Clarke, Dawson, De Saussure, Douglas, Downs, Fish, Foot, Houston, Hunter, James, King, Mason, Meriwether, Miller, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Stockton, Toucey, Upham, and Weller—36.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then concurred in by the Senate.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by the hands of Mr. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion by Mr. WELLER, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill "to authorize the payment by the surveyor general of California of any claims which have been, or may be presented to the board of land commissioners for adjudication under the act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1851, to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California."

The bill was under consideration yesterday as in Committee of the Whole, when various amendments were made. The bill was reported to the Senate, and some of those amendments were concurred in. The question was on concurrence in the following amendment:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the board of commissioners for the ascertaining and settling the said private land claims may authorize and direct the clerks of the said board to superintend the taking of depositions to be used before the said board whenever the law agent, or assistant agent, cannot attend the taking thereof. The said board, upon the application of any claimant, or of the law agent, under this act and the act of which this is amendatory, may direct a commission to issue to take depositions before any officer authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths; in all which cases written interrogatories shall be filed before said board at least forty days before the time fixed for taking said depositions; and cross-interrogatories, if desired, shall be filed before said board within twenty days after the filing of the aforesaid interrogatories. The depositions thus taken shall be carefully sealed up, and transmitted by the officer taking the same, to the secretary of the said board."

Mr. WELLER moved to amend it by inserting between the words "officer" and "authorized" the words "designated by the board;" which was the pending question at the adjournment. I have been shown to-day an amendment which has been drawn up by my friend from Maryland, which I think carries out the object intended to be accomplished by the fifth section as it was drawn up. I shall, as a matter of course, interpose no objection to his amendment. My only object was to facilitate the transaction of business before the board of commissioners. My judgment has been that to accomplish that object power should be conferred on some other persons than the members of the board to take testimony. As the amendment of the Senator from Maryland will answer the purpose, I withdraw the amendment which I offered yesterday.

Mr. PRATT. I propose to amend the amendment, as adopted in Committee of the Whole, by striking out the words "direct a commission to issue," and inserting "issue at their discretion a commission to some person known to them to be competent." I propose also to insert after the word "depositions," the words "at such time and place as they may designate," and to insert after the last amendment "who shall be and hereby is authorized to administer oaths to all witnesses who may depose before them." I propose further to strike out the following words:

"Before any officer authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths; in all which cases written interrogatories shall be filed before said board at least forty days before the time fixed for taking said depositions; and cross-interrogatories shall be filed before said board within twenty days after the filing of the aforesaid interrogatories."

If the Senate agree to the amendments which I have proposed, the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole will read:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the board of commissioners for the ascertaining and settling the said private land claims may authorize and direct the clerks of the said board to superintend the taking of depositions to be used before the said board whenever the law agent or assistant agent cannot attend the taking thereof. The said board, upon the application of any claimant, or of the law agent, under this act, and the act of which this is amendatory, may issue, at their discretion, a commission to some person known to them to be competent, at such time and place as they may designate, who shall be and hereby is authorized to administer oaths to all witnesses who may depose before them. The deposition thus taken shall be carefully sealed up and transmitted by the officer taking the same, to the secretary of the board.

These amendments have been shown to the Committee on Public Lands, who reported this bill, and they concur in them. The Senators from California are willing to accede to them.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I propose the following proviso, to come in at the end of the fifth section:

Provided, That the board shall hold sessions at Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and Monterey, at such times, after giving due notice, as the President of the United States may direct, and that the actual expenses incurred in traveling and holding such sessions of the board shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The board of commissioners give as a reason why they do not hold their sessions at various portions of the State, that it is impossible for them to do so without expending a large portion of their salaries. It is perfectly proper, as I contended when the act which the bill under consideration proposes to amend passed, that their actual expenses for traveling should be paid. I looked upon it as of the greatest possible importance that the board should go where the claims were. The reason why they have not done so—the reason why the President has not ordered them to do so—is, that the expense of their traveling would absorb their salaries, so that it would be impossible to get competent men to fill the office.

Mr. FELCH. I desire to inquire what the salary of each commissioner is?

Mr. GWIN. It is $6,000 per annum. The Senator has before his committee various communications, addressed to me by the board, in which they say that it absorbs a large portion of their salaries to meet the ordinary expenses there now; and if you add to them the expenses of traveling and opening the board at other places, it will absorb the whole. That is what they state.

Mr. ATCHISON. I would suggest to the Senator from California the propriety of adding, as an additional proviso, the following:

Provided, That such traveling expenses shall not exceed the full amount of their salaries now allowed by law.

I think, without such a proviso, the amendment of the Senator from California will be about doubling their salaries in the end. With my proviso, I am willing to take it.

Mr. GWIN. I would be willing to put in a provision that these expenses shall not exceed $2,000, but my colleague suggests that if we specify any sum, the expenses will amount to that and nothing else.

Mr. WELLER. That is the objection to fixing the limit. They would be sure to put their traveling expenses precisely at that amount. I prefer the words of my colleague's amendment, so as to pay them their necessary and actual traveling expenses. If you say that the expenses shall not exceed $2,000, they will be sure to make them exactly $2,000, and I think, as a matter of economy, we had better not limit them in the bill to any specific amount, but use such phraseology as shall confine the expenses to what are absolutely necessary, and they will not be very great. I suppose the transportation from San Francisco upon steamers, to the lowest point in the State, would be some $40 or $50, and the expenses of living at Los Angeles or Monterey would be much lower than at San Francisco, where the board now are.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted; That for the purpose of expediting the ascertaining and settling private land claims in California, the President of the United States shall appoint an assistant agent, learned in the law and skilled in the Spanish and English languages, whose duty it shall be to aid and assist in the discharge of all the duties imposed on the agent by the act of which this amendment, and his compensation shall not exceed $6,000 per annum.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in this amendment.

Mr. FELCH. That section, as reported from the Committee on Public Lands, made the compensation of the assistant agent $4,000. On the motion of the Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out four and inserted six. So that I am opposed, and now move to amend the amendment, by striking out "six" and inserting "four," which will restore the section to the form in which it came from the Committee on Public Lands.

I see by the law under which the agent himself is appointed that his salary is not fixed. It is left to the President to determine what amount, per annum, should be paid him, and I understand it has been fixed by him at $6,000.

Mr. GWIN. I will state to the Senator that there is another act in regard to that. By the original law, there was no limitation; but in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of last year, there was a limitation made. That bill, in appropriating $50,000 for the expenses of the board of commissioners, provided that the salary of the law agent should not exceed $6,000.

Mr. FELCH. I was not aware of that. The provision of the law prescribes the duties of the law agent. He is required to be skilled in the Spanish and French languages; and of course is supposed to be competent for the performance of all the duties devolving upon him. Now, the qualifications of the assistant agent are to be precisely the same. The question, then, is, whether the salary ought also to be the same. I rise now more for the purpose of making an inquiry than for anything else. It has been reported that the law agent, who has been appointed, instead of having the qualifications which are required by the law, is neither a Spanish nor a French scholar, and therefore is not competent to perform his duties so far as the translation and the investigation of the records are concerned.

Mr. WELLER. He is required to understand the Spanish and English languages, but not the French. I have no personal acquaintance with the law agent who has been appointed; my information, however, is, that he does not understand the Spanish language—that he does not pretend to be a Spanish scholar. He is a very respectable stump speaker, but as to the Spanish language, I believe he knows nothing about it.

Mr. FELCH. I only wanted to inquire whether we are called upon to appoint an assistant agent, because the agent has not the qualifications prescribed by the statute? If that is so, I do not feel at liberty, in the first place, to go for appointing a man to do his duty; and in the next place, to give an exorbitant salary to the man who is to do that duty. It seemed to the committee, as this individual is to be merely an agent—although we admit the great importance of the duties to be performed, and the high qualifications which are required—looking at the enormous expenditure that this board is to cost, in any event, to the Government, and upon the supposition that the discretion of the President was properly exercised in selecting a man having the qualifications provided in the statute, it might not be necessary to pay such a high salary to a person who is to act in his place. I admit at once, if we are to make the substitute the principal instead of the agent, who may not be competent for the discharge of his duties, we should provide for him. I am willing to give as high a salary as may be necessary, but it seems to me, upon the supposition that the appointment of the law agent is such as it should be—and if it is not, it should be changed—if we give $4,000, as provided in the section as it came from the committee, we would be giving an amount amply sufficient to secure the services of a man competent to fill the office.

Mr. WELLER. The services to be performed by the assistant law agent are precisely similar to those which are to be performed by the law agent. It requires as much legal ability, and just as profound a knowledge of the Spanish language to discharge the duties of the post of assistant law agent, as for the other post. Hence I think it necessary and proper that the pay of the assistant law agent should be precisely the same as that which is fixed for the law agent.

Now, whether the law agent be competent fully to discharge the duties of the station or not, I am not prepared to say; but if he is not, I know of no way by which he can be got rid of. He has been appointed by the President of the United States, who was authorized by law to appoint him, and I know of no way by which the legislative department of this Government can now displace him. That he does not understand the Spanish language—and I speak of that, of course, from information which I have received from others—is, in my judgment, a very great defect. It is of the greatest importance that the person who is appointed to examine these claims before the board of commissioners should be thoroughly acquainted with the Spanish language, and be able to read the original grants; and nearly all the original grants were in the Spanish language. It is therefore absolutely important that the law agent should be able to read them in that language, in order that he may discharge understandingly the duties imposed upon him by the law.

But I believe these appointments have been very unfortunate. I believe the law agent is a common-law lawyer, who has been sent out to that country to investigate cases which are to be decided under the civil law, that having been the law of the territory when we acquired it. The commissioners, as I stated yesterday, are all common-law lawyers. The President of the United States should have selected a law agent not only acquainted with the civil law, but the commissioners who are to adjudge these claims under the civil law should be familiar with the science of the civil law. In the exercise of his discretion, the President of the United States has seen fit to appoint the persons whom he has appointed; and now I hold that it is important, in order to the proper discharge of the duties under the law, that an assistant agent should be appointed.

The law agent himself has asked the Department of the Interior for the appointment of three additional agents, and he asks for an increase in the number of clerks, as well as the number of agents who are to try these causes. The delegation of the State of California, looking to the interests of that State—desiring, of course, that the business should be facilitated, in order that the rights of parties in that State may be decided at once—have agreed to recommend the appointment of one assistant agent, instead of three assistant agents as asked for by the law agent. That the appointment of this person is necessary, I have not the slightest doubt. In my judgment, it will be almost impossible to execute the law of 1851, within a reasonable time, unless there be assistant counsel employed to represent the Government of the United States.

It is for that reason that I have advocated the proposition to appoint one assistant law agent, and not three, as was asked for, not only by the law agent, but, I believe, also by the board. I am willing to give them one additional law agent; and one will, I think, be amply sufficient to enable the Government to be properly represented in conducting these cases. I propose to fix the compensation of the assistant law agent at $6,000, because that is the compensation which is already allowed by law to a person who performs similar services.

Mr. FELCH. I do not object to the appointment of this one law agent, for it may be necessary to make the appointment. Nor would I have Senators understand that I object to a fair and liberal compensation—much more liberal than would be given for any like service on this side of the continent. But let us look for a moment at the salaries which are provided. They are very liberal. The commissioners receive $6,000 each, and it is proposed to give the same salary to the assistant law agent. The law agent, I understand, also receives $6,000; but there are other officers appointed who have important duties in connection with the action of the board. Among them is the secretary, whose qualifications are precisely the same as those required of the law agent and assistant law agent.

Mr. WELLER. I think the law does not require that the secretary should be a lawyer. The act of 1851 requires that the law agent shall be by profession a lawyer.

Mr. FELCH. He is to be "learned in the law."

Mr. WELLER. I imagine he could not well be "learned in the law" except he were a lawyer by profession; but there is no such qualification necessary for the secretary.

Mr. FELCH. I do not refer to the qualification in that particular point, but to the qualification of which I was speaking, to wit: the knowledge of the Spanish and English languages—those qualifications which will enable him to perform the duties in connection with the old records and documents, and with the settlement of the claims. The qualifications of the secretary are the same in that respect, and his salary is fixed at $4,000. There are also five clerks in connection with the board. Their qualifications are not defined, but the salary paid them is $1,500 each. I do not think we ought to make the salary of the assistant law agent higher than that of the secretary of the board. I do not think we ought to make it equal with that of the commissioners. I do not think the qualifications required of him, and the duties which he has to perform, would require that exorbitant compensation. All of these salaries, in any event, are very high, such as we have not given elsewhere; and although I have always voted with my friends from California for paying liberal salaries to our officers in that State, I think they ought in this case to be content with the $4,000 proposed by the committee.

Mr. WELLER. I am satisfied that it would be utterly impossible to obtain the services of a competent assistant law agent for $4,000. If gentlemen desire to defeat the bill entirely; if they are opposed to the appointment of an assistant law agent; if they believe such an officer is wholly unnecessary, then with great propriety they can defeat the object entirely by striking out $6,000 and inserting $4,000. But I am satisfied it will not be within the power of the President to secure the services of a competent person, skilled in the Spanish and English languages—such a one as he ought to appoint, acquainted with the civil law—at a compensation of $4,000 per annum. It may seem extravagant to gentlemen who are not acquainted with the condition of things in California. The expenses of living in that country have been so often alluded to, that it is not necessary now that I should refer to them. What may seem extravagant to gentlemen here, on account of the comparatively cheap expenses of living on this side of the Rocky Mountains, would be certainly considered to be very liberal and fair on the other side.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I can well understand that, in California, less than $6,000 would not command the services of a proper agent, or assistant agent, or additional agent, whatever you may choose to call him, under the sixth section of this bill. In my judgment, the law officers of the Government are the sole protection of the Government in these cases. If they are proper individuals, and perform their duties properly, they will constitute the great protection of the Government against spurious and unauthorized claims. The greatest security the Government can have must be in the efficiency of these officers. If you expect, by peddling upon the subject of salaries, to obtain a proper man, of professional character, with the accomplishments which the law requires, for less than $6,000, I think you will be mistaken. If you go upon that ground, then you had better not think about an additional agent at all, but throw all the labor upon the present agent.

As I understand the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands, it is to appoint another agent, because the present agent is not able to perform all the duties that will be thrown upon him, owing to the multiplicity of business. And, in fact, the agent recommended, whom they call an "assistant agent," stands in the light of an associate counsel, or associate agent, having precisely the same character of duties, standing professionally on the same level, and having the same requirements made of him as of the original agent. In the profession, a mere sense of personal pride would, under such circumstances, prevent any competent man from accepting the office at a less sum than the compensation allowed to the agent. Professional feeling alone would deter a man of character in the profession from accepting the office at a less salary.

Mr. WELLER. I can state, from my own personal knowledge of the business which is already before the board of commissioners, and that which will be presented to them, that it will require the whole time, not only of the law agent, but of the assistant law agent, to attend to it. It is utterly impossible to secure the whole time of any man who is learned in the law, and skilled in the Spanish and English languages, for a less compensation than $6,000 a year; more especially will it be impossible to obtain the services of a proper person for a compensation $2,000 less than that of the counsel with whom you have associated him, thus placing the assistant agent in a degrading position.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. FELCH to amend the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, by striking out "six" and inserting "four," no quorum voted;

And, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 21, 1862.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BOWIE stated that he had received a communication from his colleague, Mr. COTTMAN, stating that he was detained at home on account of the illness of his child.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is a motion to recommit to the Committee on Public Lands, House bill No. 284, "granting the right of way to all plank and railroad companies through the public lands of the United States."

CESSION OF CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. There is a bill pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, of considerable importance to the State of Ohio, to which I apprehend no gentleman can possibly object. It will be impossible to reach it during the session unless the House will consent to take it up and pass it now. I hope I may have the unanimous consent for that purpose. It is a bill to cede to the State of Ohio the unfinished portion of the Cumberland road. For that road we have made no appropriation for the last twelve or fourteen years. The State of Ohio desires the cession of the road that she may complete it. The portion that has been constructed is going to dilapidation. Similar bills have been passed for Indiana and Illinois, and this is a precise copy of the bill passed in those cases.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to the proposition, provided it does not come out of the morning hour. If it does I will object.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to decide whether or not it shall be taken out of the morning hour.

Objection was made.

Mr. STANTON. I should be glad that the gentleman objecting would state his objections, that they may appear upon the record.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution, to which no objection can be made after it has been read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, if not deemed incompatible with the public good, report to this House the number of officers belonging to the Army and Navy, remaining in and about Washington city; and also the duties performed by them connected with the public interest.

Mr. WALSH objected.

Mr. OLDS. I call for the regular order of business.

RIGHT OF WAY TO PLANK AND RAILROADS.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw my motion to recommit the bill granting the right of way to all plank and railroad companies through the public lands of the United States, to the Committee on Public Lands, and also my call for the previous question. I think there will be no difficulty in passing the bill this morning, after I shall have made a brief statement. Many members have been opposing the bill on the ground that it granted to plank and railroad companies the use of stone, timber, &c., in perpetuity. By agreement with the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] who was opposed to the measure upon that ground, I shall make the motion that the grant of the use of timber, stone, &c., shall be limited to the completion of the road. I trust there will be no objection to this restriction on the part of the friends of the bill. That is all they desire, and relying upon being sustained, if the amendment shall be incorporated in the bill by unanimous consent, I shall call for the previous question.

Mr. CARTER. I hope the amendment may be adopted. It limits the grant to the material necessary to construct the road in the first instance.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. There is an amendment proposed by myself, which is by common consent pending.

Mr. COBB. The amendment I have just suggested comes in after yours, which will make it much stronger.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] leaving out the second section, is a proper bill. The second section is a bad one, but the first is an excellent one. I shall go for that.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I will say, having looked at the bill the gentleman from Alabama proposes now to pass, that the amendment which he suggests strikes me to be the very one which should be adopted, and I hope the House will consent to it. Let these roads which are built through the public land have the benefit of the timber and stone they need for the construction of the road in the first instance; but not to entail upon the road any perpetuity of right in after years. That is the object, I understand, of the gentleman from Alabama, and I think with that modification that the bill is a good one. I hope the assent of the House will be accorded to the modification.

Mr. SMART obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, with the permission of the gentleman, that he understands the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama to be to strike out from the second section the words "and repairs." The grant then will be "of such materials of earth, stone, or wood as may be necessary or convenient from time to time for the actual construction of the said road or roads, or any part thereof."

Mr. SMART. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama whether he is willing to accept the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART?]

Mr. COBB. I have submitted the matter for the determination of the House, by which I am willing to abide. I do not expect to obtain the vote of the gentleman from Maine under any circumstances.

Mr. SMART. I wish to make a single remark in relation to this subject. I think gentlemen of the West are making a bill which in reality is in opposition to their own interests. I understand that they wish to retain in the bill the clause authorizing the taking of timber from the land. They say now, in the first instance; but, sir, it occurs to me—

Mr. COBB. I cannot yield to the gentleman to make an argument. I will only reply, that so far as Western gentlemen are concerned, they will take care of their own interests.

Mr. SMART. I wish simply to state the effect of the provision, if the gentleman will indulge me for a moment. I say, under that provision you take all stone—

Mr. COBB. I cannot yield for discussion. The amendments have been made to conform to the wishes of the opponents of the bill. I have yielded for the submission of every amendment suggested since the bill has been before the House for consideration.

Mr. SMART. I object to the gentleman's amendment, as he is not willing to allow me a single statement.

Mr. COBB. Very well. The matter is with the House for its decision. I call for the previous question.

Mr. FOWLER. I think, to make the language of the second section consistent, the words "from time to time" should be stricken out, provided it is only proposed to grant the use of material in the construction of the road in the first instance.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to that. Gentlemen may offer whatever amendments they may deem proper, so that the bill is kept alive. If anybody else wants to make an amendment, I will not call for the previous question.

Mr. ROBBINS. If the call for the previous question be sustained, will not the question recur upon the adoption of the amendments?

The SPEAKER. That will be the case; but the Chair understands the gentleman from Maine to object to the pending amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was then put upon seconding the call for the previous question, and there were, upon a division—ayes 42.

Mr. FICKLIN demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. KING. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being then put upon the motion for a call of the House, it was disagreed to—yeas 65, nays 78. So a call of the House was refused.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and on that question tellers have been ordered.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I wish to inquire whether the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] who reported this bill, limiting the use of timber, stone, &c., to the original construction of the road, has been accepted, and whether it can be considered by the House?

The SPEAKER. It was objected to by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] and therefore not entertained.

The question was then taken, (Messrs. FOWLER and CHASTAIN acting as tellers,) and there were—ayes 85, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was then ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first upon the pending amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] which is to strike out the word "hereafter" in the fifth line of the first section, and insert after the word "charter," the words "within ten years hereafter."

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that there were several amendments which were permitted to be offered by the unanimous consent of the House. If such is the fact, of course they will be read. The following amendment was offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUNTER] to the third section:

Provided further, That when a location for either of said railroads or plank roads, macadamized turnpikes, or sites for depots, on the line of such road or roads, shall be selected, the proper officers on such road or roads shall transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a correct plat of the survey of said road or roads, together with the survey of sites for depots, before such selection shall become operative.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] proposes to amend this amendment by adding the following:

Provided further, That none of the foregoing provisions of this act shall apply to, or authorize any rights in any lands of the United States other than such as are held for private entry and sale, and such as are unsurveyed, and not held for public use by erections or improvements thereon.

The amendment to the amendment, and the amendment as amended, were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moves to amend the second section of the bill, by adding at the end thereof the words, "through said land."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] proposes as an additional section, the following amendment, which will be now reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

That the right of way through the public land of the United States, lying in Black Rock, in the county of Erie, and State of New York, be, and the same is hereby, granted to the Lockport and Buffalo Railroad Company: Provided, That in the opinion of the President of the United States, such grant be not injurious to the public interests, and that the location shall be approved by the President as to the position and width of said railroad: And provided further, That, if the said railroad shall not be completed within two years, or if at any time after its completion, said railroad be discontinued or abandoned, the grant shall cease and determine.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SACKETT. Is it in order to move an amendment to the first section?

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order, the previous question having been ordered. The question now before the House is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.]

Mr. CARTTER. The amendment suggested this morning was not entertained I believe by reason of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] objected.

Mr. CARTTER. I ask the gentleman from Maine and the unanimous consent of the House to place a limitation upon the right to appropriate material.

Mr. SMART. If gentlemen will permit me to say a few words—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine can only proceed by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. SMART. I am willing to go for the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.] which I believe is the appropriate bill. I still continue the objection I have already made.

Mr. CARTTER. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to insert at the close of the second section a limitation upon the appropriation of material to the first construction of the road. The amendment I make is to strike out the words "and repair."

Mr. SMART. I object.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it in order to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered, with a view of availing myself of an opportunity to move the amendment I have suggested?

Mr. DUNCAN. I rise merely to say that the bill, as amended, meets my approbation, although I should prefer the amendment.

Mr. COBB. The friends of the bill have no objection to it.

Mr. DUNCAN. I was about to ask that the original bill may be read, so that the substitute may be offered.

Mr. SMART. At the suggestion of friends around me, I will withdraw the objection I made.

Mr. WHITE. I renew the objection.

Mr. CARTTER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put, in order to make the amendment I have indicated.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CARTTER. I now move the amendment which I have already suggested, and upon it call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I ask for the reading of the second section as it stands amended.

The section was read by the Clerk.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the word "actual" be stricken out, and the word "first" inserted in lieu thereof; so that it may read "for the first construction of said roads."

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. CARTTER's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.]

Mr. STUART. I wish to suggest a mere verbal amendment, which is this: Where the words "General Assembly" are employed it would be better to say "Legislatures." That would cover all the legislative authorities of all the States.

There being no objection, the bill was so amended.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to strike out the word "over," in the sixth line of the third section and to substitute the word "upon" in lieu thereof. It is bad sense as it now stands. It will then read "upon which railways may be situated."

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I object to that amendment. It amounts to nothing at all.

Mr. HUNTER. An amendment was adopted yesterday, inserting the words "macadamized turnpikes" after the words "plank roads," where they occur in the first section. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that those words may be inserted wherever it is necessary, to make the whole bill conform to the amendment as adopted yesterday.

There being no objection it was so ordered.

Mr. HENN. There is one other incongruity. The words "ten years" are used in the first section, and "five years" in the third section. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the third section may be made to correspond with the first.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. DUNCAN. I call for the reading of the original bill as amended.

It was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of way shall be, and is hereby, granted to all rail and plank road or macadamized turnpike companies that are now, or may be chartered within ten years hereafter, over and through any of the public lands of the United States, over which any rail or plank road or macadamized turnpikes, authorized by an act of the Legislature of the respective States in which public lands may be situated; and the said company or companies are hereby authorized to survey and mark through the said public lands, to be held by them for the track of said road, one hundred feet in width: Provided, That in case where deep excavation or heavy embankment is required for the grade of such road, then at such places a greater width may be taken by such company, if necessary, not exceeding in the whole two hundred feet.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said company or companies shall have the right to take from the public lands in the vicinity of said road or roads all such materials of earth, stone, or wood as may be necessary or convenient, from time to time, for the first construction of said road or roads, or any part thereof through said lands.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be, and is hereby, granted to said company or companies all necessary sites for watering places, depots, and work-shops along the line of said road or roads, so far as the places convenient for the same may fall upon the public lands: Provided, That no one depot or watering place shall contain over one square acre, and that said sites shall not be nearer to each other than ten miles along the line or lines of said road or roads: Provided further, That the said grants herein contained, as well as of the use of the public lands, as of the materials for the construction of said road or roads, shall cease and determine, unless the road or roads be begun within five years from and after the passage of this act, and completed within fifteen years thereafter: And provided, moreover, That if any road, at any time after its completion, be discontinued or abandoned by said company or companies, the grants hereby made shall cease and determine, and said lands hereby granted revert back to the General Government: Provided further, That when a location for either of said railroads or plank roads, macadamized turnpikes, or sites for depots on the line of such road or roads shall be selected, the proper officers of such road or roads shall transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a correct plat of the survey of said road or roads, together with the survey of sites for depots, before such selection shall become operative: Provided further, That none of the foregoing provisions of the act shall apply to or authorize any rights in any lands of the United States other than such as are held for private entry and sale, and such as are unsurveyed and not held for public use by erection or improvement thereon.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the right of way through the public lands of the United States lying in Black Rock, in the county of Erie, and State of New York, be, and the same is hereby granted to the Lockport and Buffalo Railroad Company: Provided, That, in the opinion of the President of the United States, such grant be not injurious to the public interest, and that the location shall be approved by the President as to the position and width of the said railroad: And provided further, That if the said railroad shall not be completed within two years, or if at any time after its completion, the said railroad be discontinued or abandoned, the grant shall cease and determine.

The substitute of Mr. STUART [published yesterday] was also read.

Mr. MANN. I wish to inquire whether this bill does not include California, so that a road, as soon as the public lands are surveyed there, can be laid out twelve rods wide, and an acre taken for a depot anywhere?

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. I understand that this substitute of the honorable member from Michigan [Mr. STUART] is the Senate bill now pending in the House; and the question of order I wish to make is, whether one bill can be made as a substitute for another.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it is not identically the same. The substitute was entertained yesterday by the House, and under the circumstances the Chair does not feel justified in ruling it out of order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House to make an amendment, to obviate the difficulty which I see has struck the mind of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. MANN.] It is this: At the end of the first section of the substitute I propose to insert these words:

Provided, That said company shall have no interest in the minerals on the lands thus granted.

Otherwise they will take up half the California gold lands.

Mr. CARTTER. I do not see the necessity for that amendment, and I object to it. The bill purports simply to grant the right of way and occupancy—a usufruct-right such as highways have in all cases of that kind, and it is well understood that they have no other right than the right to occupy, for the purpose of passing over.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Is not the previous question in force?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I object to this discussion.

Mr. CARTTER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. I then move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to know if I had the unanimous consent of the House to offer my amendment, and whether it is now pending?

The SPEAKER. It was objected to.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the objection was withdrawn.

HOSTILITIES ON THE RIO GRANDE.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable me to make a statement to the House. I wish to get up a bill that will take but a few moments to dispose of. It relates to the difficulties upon the Rio Grande, and the hostilities that are going on there. It is a House bill, which the Senate have passed with amendments.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no doubt that the committee will come into the House this evening time enough for the gentleman to make that motion. If I yield now, I shall have to yield to a dozen other gentlemen who are wishing me to do so.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman from Alabama knew the facts, he certainly would not object. We have by the last mail received news that two villages upon the banks of the Rio Grande have been burned, and that steamboats have been brought in from the New Mexico side. There is a bill which has passed the Senate authorizing the President, if he deems it necessary, to call for a sufficient force to repress those hostilities, and to preserve peace upon the borders. If this matter is delayed much longer, it will lead to serious consequences; and I hope, therefore, as it will not take five minutes to concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill which has already passed this House, that the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If the motion is withdrawn, is not the bill upon which we were acting when the motion was made to go into Committee of the Whole again before us?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] to ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion.

to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that he may ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up a bill which he will designate.

Mr. HOWARD. It will not take five minutes. I have no doubt the House will concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand there is objection, and unless there is unanimous consent, of course it is of no use for me to withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOWARD. Who objected?

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe there was objection made just now.

Mr. HOWARD. Nobody objects. At all events, if any objection is made, I will renew the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table House bill No. 259, to provide for the protection of the Territories, which has been returned from the Senate with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we had better go on to-day with the other bill. I do not believe that one night can make any difference about these Indians.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I renew my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were suspended, and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up bill No. 196, which is the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move that the committee proceed to the consideration of bill No. 282, being "a bill for making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors."

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR.] The bill he calls for is behind almost all the appropriation bills.

Mr. STUART. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] moves to take up House bill No. 196, which is the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] moves to take up House bill No. 282, for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order, which is this: In the first place, there can be but one motion pending at the same time; and then I do not want the Chair to state that motion, so as to preclude the point of order which I will raise afterwards, which is—that that bill cannot be taken up, unless by a formal vote of the committee setting aside every other bill upon the Calendar that is before it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the point of order. He supposes, as a matter of course, that the vote must be first taken upon the motion first made. All appropriation bills are privileged bills, and the question will first be taken upon the motion which was first made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I submitted the motion which I made, because I supposed that the bill to which it refers was also a general appropriation bill, and I ask the Chair, as a question of order, whether it is not competent, if the committee should refuse to take up—

Mr. BURT. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I am propounding a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order. The Chair has already stated that the question will first be put upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Before the question is put, is it not naturally in order, and in conformity with the practice of the committee, to move to set aside one bill in order to take up another bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Not an appropriation bill. All general appropriations are excepted by the rule.

Mr. STUART demanded tellers upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I desire to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, if the Chair decides that it is not in order to take up the river and harbor bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not so decided. The Chair will again state his point. The appropriation bills are all privileged bills, and the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to take up House bill No. 196 being first made, it must be first voted upon. If it is not carried, then it will be in order to take up the other bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If a motion is made to lay aside that bill before the question is put upon taking it up, is it not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. A motion is not necessary to lay aside the other bills on the Calendar, because the appropriation bills are privileged bills.

MESSRS. CLINGMAN, and STEVENS of Pennsylvania, were appointed tellers.

The question was then taken on Mr. HOUSTON's motion, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 47, noes 92.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I now move to take up House bill No. 282, being a bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. MEADE. I rise to a question of order. I should like to have the rule read in reference to appropriation bills. It will be said that this question was decided by the last Congress. I have only to state to the committee that I was in the chair at the time, and I decided that the motion to take up the river and harbor bill was out of order. I was overruled by the committee. Many of the Whigs who voted to reverse my decision stated that they did it knowing that I had decided correctly, but that they were determined to override the rules and take up the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will think himself constrained to decide in accordance with the decision of the last Congress, that it is in order to take up the bill.

Mr. MEADE. The question is whether the Democrats will do as the Whigs did then. [Laughter.] Do I understand the Chair decides against me?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Chair decides in accordance with the ruling of the last Congress, that it is in order to take up the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MEADE. Then from that decision I take an appeal.

Mr. BURT. I ask that the Chair will have the rule read to the committee which designates the general appropriation bills, and I feel myself very anxious to know upon what grounds the Chair has decided.

The Clerk then read the rule, No. 135, as follows:

"In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the bills shall be taken up and disposed of in their order on the Calendar; but when objection is made to the consideration of a bill, a majority of the committee shall decide, without debate, whether it shall be taken up and disposed of, or laid aside; provided, that general appropriation bills, and, in time of war, bills for raising men or money, and bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills at the discretion of the committee, and when demanded by any member, the question shall first be put in regard to them."

Mr. DUNCAN. I ask for the reading of the 80th rule.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"80. General appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any other bills of a public nature, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House."

The question then being, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and MESSRS. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, and JOHNSON, of Arkansas, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 93, noes 24.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

The bill having been read through by the Clerk, the first clause was reported for amendment.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. In introducing to the committee the subject of river and harbor improvements, as they are particularly considered in this bill, permit me to say that the Committee on Commerce of this House, at an early period in the session, had their attention drawn to this great question of the improvement of harbors and rivers, and a discussion was had to some extent, upon the consideration of the President's message, in reference to this subject; but the principles or views upon which the committee would act in framing a bill, were not then determined. Shortly after that time, however, petitions came in to a very large number from all quarters of the country, praying for these appropriations for the improvement of our large and navigable rivers, and for the improvement of our harbors both upon the sea-coast and upon the northern lakes. Petitions also came in in reference to our great western rivers in such numbers, and presenting such pressing exigencies upon this subject, that the committee, before any decision had been had in reference to the President's message, referring this subject specifically to our consideration, and the reference which the House saw fit to make of those various petitions, proceeded to the consideration of this very important, and, I will add, as it has proved, very embarrassing subject. In addition to these petitions, I ought to state to the committee, that from many of the large cities deputations of gentlemen of the highest respectability connected with our commerce, and practical navigators—men who have been long engaged in navigation both in our foreign and domestic commerce—have appeared before that committee, pressing upon their consideration subjects of very great importance to the localities where they resided. I allude particularly to very respectable delegations sent here by the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans.

Sir, we found when we approached this subject that it was full of embarrassments. On looking back upon the history of this country for the last fourteen years, we found that no appropriations had been made—not even to keep in repair public works which had been through a long period, under previous appropriations, erected by the Government and were out of repair. We found, in some cases, that the channels of streams and the approaches to harbors were rendered even worse than they were in their natural state by the obstructions occasioned by the lack of appropriations to keep in repair these old works of the Government. We found, also, that very large and extensive territories have been added to this Government during the fourteen years which have elapsed since, with one exception, and that limited in its character, any general appropriation bill of this character has passed. In that period the State of Texas, with a sea-coast of six hundred miles, and watered by numerous very large rivers, where there are harbors adequate to a very large trade, if they shall but receive small appropriations for the purpose of removing the sand bars at their mouths, has been opened to the commerce and enterprise of the country. Besides this, the march of population to the West, during that long period has been settling the wilderness and developing the resources of one of the richest and most fertile countries on the face of the globe. New States have been added to the Union—States which have received no consideration by appropriations of this character since they have been admitted into the Union; States where large towns, great commercial centers, are now growing up, where there are large harbors to be improved, and where commerce is concentrating; States in which rivers of great magnitude, needing but small appropriations to remove the obstructions of nature, will in a short time bring from the improved and fertile regions of the interior a vast amount of commerce to the lake coast.

Under these considerations, and in view of a subject so embarrassing as this is, the committee addressed themselves to the preparation of this bill, and I will say, in behalf of the committee, that they have devoted more time to the preparation of this bill than to any other bill—indeed, I may add, than to all the other bills before them—although the subjects referred to them are very numerous, and concern the whole commerce of the country, both foreign and domestic.

Sir, the majority of the committee were opposed to entering upon anything like a general system of internal improvements. They wished to frame such a bill as would meet the good sense of this House and of the country—one that should not embrace so large an amount, and located at such various points of the country as would not be amenable to the objection that it was reviving the old policy of a general system of internal improvements, but which would, at the same time, satisfy the imperious demands of commerce. The great difficulty has been to define and settle upon a bill which, at the same time that it should meet the wants of commerce, would suit the wishes and gratify the expectations of the various localities concerned. That, sir, is a very difficult matter. It is one that has occasioned great embarrassment to the committee. Many gentlemen appeared before the committee, expecting that, because appropriations were contained in a former bill which passed this House, a bill embracing very large appropriations, made at numerous points, and, I may say, apparently much at random, and without that regard to localities and the interests of commerce, the same appropriations should be adopted by the committee, and reported to the House in this bill.

But the committee have prescribed another rule for their conduct. They have supposed—and that is the ground upon which they have framed this bill—that it was their duty to provide for the general wants of the commerce of the country at those localities, those great commercial depôts, where it had already concentrated. They did not suppose that it was within their province to go into those parts of the country just rising into importance, where the commerce had hardly yet defined its localities, where you would not know if you appropriated to-day ten or twenty thousand dollars for the improvement of a harbor, whether ten years hence there would be any trade or commerce to be benefited by it. They preferred rather to confine the appropriations to the wants of the general commerce of the country, by locating them at the great centers of commerce, where it already exists, and where it will be benefited.

But, sir, were we to confine ourselves to these points, there would be another sort of protection for commerce, that would be wanting. While our trade is passing from one of these great centers to another, either upon the lakes or the ocean coasts, it will need harbors of refuge, to which it can repair in case of distress; and appropriations for such harbors, in the view of the committee, are not merely local in their character, but protect and subserve the interests of the general commerce of the country. For instance, in framing this bill, we have located a harbor of refuge between the mouth of the Niagara river, on Lake Ontario, and the port of Rochester, at the mouth of the Genesee river. Between those points, a distance of some eighty or ninety miles, there were many harbors which had been projected, and some of which, I believe, received the favorable consideration of the Government, and had received appropriations. But the committee did not think it proper, they did not think it fell within the rule which they had prescribed for their action, to recommend appropriations for any of these small ports, simply because they had received them before.

But inasmuch as the general commerce on that lake, in its transit from the mouth of the Niagara river to the harbor of Rochester, in case of stress of weather would need a harbor for shelter, the committee determined to locate one, and only one, between those two points. And let me say here, that they located that harbor, as they have all others of this character, without reference to any speculative interest that gentlemen living there may have, but simply from the consideration that Oak Orchard creek is midway between the two points to which I have alluded, and will afford a harbor where all shipping, in case of necessity, will find a shelter and protection from storms. The case which I have stated to the committee illustrates the principle upon which the committee have proceeded in framing the whole of this bill. They have not intended in any instance to depart from that rule, and when they provide for the general wants of commerce by making improvements in harbors where that commerce has already concentrated, and then provide for such harbors of refuge as will be needed in its transit from one of those points to another, they regard the appropriations such as will subserve the general interests of the commerce of the country. Surely a bill so framed should not meet with the objection which has often been raised—and too many times with the very best of reasons—that the appropriations are designed to subserve the interests of some particular locality rather than the country at large. I would not be willing to give my vote for a bill that should be framed upon a different principle.

I believe that the principles which we have deemed proper to adopt in framing this bill, are strictly within the constitutional power of Congress; within the line of policy prescribed by the fathers of our Republic; within the doctrines laid down by General Jackson in his messages, and followed by his immediate successor. They conform to the doctrines of Mr. Calhoun, presented in his able report relative to the proceedings and objects of the Memphis Convention. They are, too, in accordance with the opinions formerly expressed by a citizen of my own State, whose opinions upon this, as upon every subject of public concern, ever received the highest consideration and the fullest confidence, by the entire population of that State. I refer to the lamented Silas Wright, who coincided with the views I have expressed upon this subject. He held that it was legitimately within the power of Congress to appropriate for the improvement of harbors and rivers, confining their appropriations, as is done in this bill, to the wants of a great national commerce—for its protection in our great commercial centers, and its transit from one point to another.

Mr. Chairman, I have not the vanity to believe that this bill may be entirely perfect. There were a great many embarrassments in framing such a bill, arising out of the want of that information which, had the system of making these improvements for our large harbors and rivers been kept up for the last fourteen or fifteen years, we should have been supplied with. We have had to look back to the data of former years. We have been obliged to refer, continually, to the Topographical Bureau for further estimates. In some instances we have obtained them, and in others we have been compelled to rely upon such information as we could get from various reports which have heretofore been made upon this subject, and we present appropriations based upon them as the best information we could obtain.

When we consider the amount which it is proposed to appropriate by this bill, it seems perfectly apparent that it would be better to adopt it with its limited appropriations, than, by imposing various amendments which may be proposed so to enlarge the amount as to subject the bill to the objections which have been made against other bills of this nature. The amount provided for in this bill is a little over $1,500,000; and that amount is small when we consider the extent of our country, the number of our rivers and harbors which have, for a long time, needed improvement, and which still need it, and the value of the commerce exposed to the dangers against which this bill is intended to guard. I do not intend to go into a statistical detail of these disasters, which have been attended with loss of property and of life, to a most alarming extent upon our Western waters, and our Northwestern lakes. Yet I will here say to this House and to the country, that the Committee on Commerce have had before them statistical information upon this subject, showing that, in one year—the year 1851—the amount of property lost upon our Northwestern lakes, in consequence of a lack of proper harbors of refuge, has been far greater than the whole amount appropriated in this bill for the whole country. Yes, sir; upwards of $2,000,000, as we learn from the statistical information before us, have been lost during the last year upon our Northwestern lakes, mainly for the want of those very works of improvement which this bill seeks to construct.

It would be impossible for me, upon this occasion, to give any adequate view of the magnitude of the commerce which is to be subserved by these appropriations. Since the last appropriations to these objects, it has largely increased beyond any calculation we have at the present time. In the year 1847, a convention was held at Chicago, where much valuable and authentic statistical information bearing upon these points, was collected. Since that time, I am not aware that there has been any regular and properly-authenticated information communicated to Congress upon this subject. We have been obliged to glean what information we could from the newspapers of the day, and from the various periodical publications which have treated of our commercial interests. But we may safely assume that this commerce, so great fourteen years ago as to astonish the country by its magnitude, if we are to be guided in our estimate of its present volume by the authentic information given to the public by the Chicago convention in 1847, has, within this period, increased threefold.

Why, sir, when we look at the improvements that are going on under the guidance of individual enterprise, and by the aid of private capital, in the construction of railroads throughout the country, for the increase and accommodation of its internal trade, we cannot fail to see its vast extent and the almost incalculable surplus products by which it is sustained. There is not a State in the Union which is not now aroused upon this subject and diligently constructing her railroads upon which to transport the products of the illimitable and fertile West to the harbors and ports of the East for domestic consumption or transshipment abroad. Look at New York, spanned by three parallel railroads, connecting the commerce of the western lakes with the populous marts of the East, besides the main artery of her inland trade, the Erie canal—and sustained by the demands for transportation. I was surprised by the statements of a very respectable committee which came before the Committee on Commerce, from the State of North Carolina—a State which, until recently, had not imbibed the spirit of improvement, nor entered with much zeal upon the development of her own resources by the construction of railroads, and other works of internal improvement. But, sir, that State is now directing its energies with as much ardor and efficiency as any other State in this Union, towards this great object, by the construction of railroads and other improvements. And she, too, seeks by these means not only to lay open her own agricultural and mineral wealth, but also to reach the trade and commerce of the great western valley through the neighboring State of Tennessee. The bill under consideration seeks to aid her enterprise by the improvement of those harbors on her coast to which this trade is being directed.

Sir, you find the State of South Carolina, too, very deeply interested at the present time in the subject of railroads, connecting with similar lines of communication in the Western States, and provision has been made in this bill for the improvement of the harbor of Charleston, the point towards which those lines of railroads are directed. The general design should be so to reach the trade and commerce of the West that it may find an easy transit to all those points on the seaboard, north and south, where it will meet our foreign trade. The spirit of enterprise beginning with the northern and central parts of this Union has extended to every portion of the Union. The railroads to the Western States have poured incalculable wealth into the Eastern States, and so they are destined to do for a long period to come.

Now, I invite gentlemen who have hitherto entertained prejudices against this system, to look at this bill as it has been drawn, limited, and carefully guarded as it is in every point, within the constitutional authority to which I have alluded, and see whether it be not better to join with the rest of their fellow-citizens in this work, restricted within constitutional limits, and thus to develop our own resources by the improvement of our rivers and harbors. By so doing, while we are developing the great and ever-growing West, we shall also add wealth to the seaports of the East. I know there are difficulties; I know there are dangers attending this as well as every other subject of legislation. It has been said that this system leads to corruption and extravagance; and that it will bankrupt the Treasury. Sir, what subject of legislation which comes before this House is not obnoxious to the same objection? Will not the Navy, and the Army, if you vote profuse and extravagant expenditures, in the spirit which has been charged upon the friends of the improvement of rivers and harbors, lead to corruption? Would not those systems lead to extravagance? Would they not be apt also to bankrupt the Treasury of the country? Why are they not objected to, because they may lead to that result? It is because we all trust in the good sense of Congress, and in the good sense of the people who sent us here to make such appropriations as we ought to make, and no other. I know that we might go into a general scramble, and make up a bill, as some, I believe, have been made up in former days, for the very purpose of dividing out the public funds. I would deprecate such a course. It is not necessary. The interests of the country do not demand it. It should be repudiated by every honest legislator, to whatever party he may belong. Such a policy will find no favor with me. Sir, I believe upon this subject, as upon all other subjects within the pale of the Constitution, that the Congress of the United States have the purity, integrity, honesty, and firmness to meet questions of this character upon principle, and to decide them upon their merits. When the day comes, if it ever does, that the Congress of the United States cannot be trusted with the exercise of this power, it will be a dark day for our Republic. Such an insinuation goes to impeach the moral honesty of the community; it impeaches the integrity and the patriotism of those who come up from every part of the country to legislate for this great people. It would be the knell of our liberties if it were to be known and understood that this Congress, assembled here, was so corrupt, so dishonest, so regardless of constitutional duty, and so devoid of patriotism, that they could not decide questions of this character with honesty, and are not, therefore, to be trusted with them. I am not one of those who believe that there is not intelligence enough among the people to understand these subjects, and to appreciate our conduct as Representatives. And although many gentlemen who agree with me politically may differ with me upon this subject, yet I never entertained a doubt that we had the constitutional power and our bounden duty to make such appropriations of this character as the wants of the commerce of the country demanded.

Sir, this bill is designed, and in the main does justice to all parts of the country. I respectfully submit that it should not meet with any serious opposition. That amendments may be offered I have no doubt. Gentlemen will feel called upon to offer them, and I hope they will receive a proper consideration from the committee. But it would be most unfortunate if, under the guise of perfecting this bill, a course of emendation should be adopted upon it that would so load it down with matters foreign to the subject to which the committee have limited their action, that it would not receive the approval of those who desire to give fair and reasonable protection to this great national interest.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, there are two items of appropriation in this bill to be expended in Louisiana, of which I think it my duty to say something, in order that the objects may be well understood by the committee.

The first is the appropriation for opening a ship-channel through the most convenient pass leading from the Mississippi river into the Gulf of Mexico. I give notice that, at the proper time, I shall offer an amendment to increase the appropriation from $75,000 to $150,000. This is, as I contend, to all intents and purposes, a national work. The Mississippi is the natural outlet for ten States of this Union, and parts of five other States. The population of the valley of the Mississippi in 1850, excluding Virginia and Pennsylvania, amounted to near ten millions; adding the portions of those two States in that valley, the population exceeded ten millions. Besides this, the whole shipping interest of the Atlantic States may be taken into the account, so that nearly or quite half the population of this Union may be said to have a direct interest in this work. The exports through that channel to foreign countries, for the year ending June 30, 1851, amounted to $54,000,000, and the exports, coast-wise, may safely be put down at a like amount.

Louisiana, the outlet of that great valley, is the second State in the Union for exports of domestic productions, and the fourth in point of imports from foreign countries. The annual loss occasioned by detention and injuries to vessels by reason of the obstructions proposed to be removed, is estimated by the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans at $500,000, and the increased price in the freight and insurance is estimated at five million six hundred thousand dollars. This immense loss falls almost entirely upon the producers of that great valley, and the shipping interest of the Atlantic States. I therefore call upon the Representatives whose constituents are interested, to give their support to the amendment that I propose to the bill.

The other appropriation to which I allude is for the removal of the raft in Red river. In the report of the Secretary of War, accompanying the President's message, "the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of Red river is recommended as a means of reducing the expenses of supplying many of the posts in Texas and New Mexico."

The Secretary says, that "the amount that the Government would save by means of this improvement, in two or three years, would defray the cost of the work." I shall endeavor to show that the estimate is not only within bounds, but that the General Government will be the gainer to a much larger extent, in that respect, and also in other respects.

I had the honor to introduce a bill at the commencement of this session, providing for the removal of this obstruction, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I understand that a favorable report has been ready to be made for several months past—without any opportunity to make it.

By a report of the Quartermaster General, now before that committee, dated December 20, 1851, General Jesup says:

"The saving to the Government which would be made by the removal of the raft (in Red river) may be estimated at about $45,000 annually, provided a regiment of troops is to be maintained on the line of the frontier, [of Texas,] and in proportion."

In another part of the report he says:

"But if that river should be effectually cleared, so as to render its navigation certain during high stages of water, it is believed that at least two other of the present posts in Texas, now occupied by other troops, could be more economically supplied than at present; added to which, it is but fair to presume that as the posts on the new line be pushed forward toward the Rio Grande, it will be found that that route will be cheaper and more certain for supplying the posts in the vicinity of El Paso, in New Mexico, than the present route via Indianola and Fort Leavenworth."

This estimate comes from a highly-meritorious officer, whose position, experience, and intimate knowledge of the country enable him to form more correct estimates than any other living man. I had previously conversed with a highly-intelligent officer of the Army, who has been three years stationed on the northern frontier of Texas, whose opinions coincided with those of General Jesup, and who pointed out other advantages.

General Jesup based his estimate upon the presumption that the freight to Preston, on Red river, would be the same as now charged to Fort Smith, on the Arkansas river. I have the assurance, that if the raft was removed, it would be much lower, which, taken in connection with the two other posts mentioned by General Jesup, would increase the saving to about $75,000 per annum; this would be still further increased if supplies to New Mexico were transported through that channel. The road is well known to be far superior to any other. Captain Marey, in his report of that route, (Ex. Doc., 31st Cong. 1st sess., Senate, No. 64,) says:

"We found a smooth road, over a gently undulating country of prairie and timber, and abounding with numerous clear spring branches." * * * "Our road is as firm and smooth as a turnpike, with no streams of any magnitude or other obstructions, through the entire distance." * * * "I conceive this to be decidedly the best overland wagon route to California for several reasons. It can be traveled at any time," &c., &c. * * * "It would form a direct line of communication with Cook's road from the United States to the Pacific, shorter by several hundred miles than any other."—pp. 224 and 225.

"The grass remains green during the entire winter, and the climate is salubrious and healthy; it possesses all the requisites that can be desired for a fine agricultural country."

I know that while that river was partially clear of obstructions in 1839, a quantity of bullion was brought from New Mexico through that channel to New Orleans.

I have said that the Government will be the gainer in other respects. In order to explain this, it will be necessary to give a short history of the original work. The appropriations from year to year, from 1828 to 1838, inclusive, amounted to something about $326,000. The raft then extended about one hundred and sixty miles from its present location downwards, the greater portion of which had doubtless been there more than half a century. A portion of this appropriation was expended in making examinations and surveys.

The whole of that immense raft was removed under the efficient superintendence of Captain Shreve in about five years. In 1838 the navigation of that river was opened for seven hundred and fifty miles from the foot of the former raft. A slight additional expenditure for two or three years, judiciously applied, as recommended by Captain Shreve, would have made the navigation free forever. This is fully explained in his report, made in March, 1839. Speaking of the necessity of further appropriation and expenditure, he says:

"The advantages to be derived from that operation are various and important in their character."

"1. The water flowing out through the bayous, on the southwest, &c., falls into the river through two outlets at Shreveport, which backs up the river above for fifteen miles, diminishes the current so much that it has not sufficient power to open the original bed.

"2. The bayous on the northeast require stopping also."

Speaking of the commencement of the work by him in 1833, he says:

"At that time there was no settlement on the river from forty miles below the raft to Fort Towson, except a few at the Caddo Agency, and a few in Arkansas and Texas, from the foot of the original raft to Fort Towson, seven hundred and fifty miles by the meanders of the river."

His estimate then was $85,000, to make it effectual. About the time that this Herculean work was completed, a treaty was made with the Caddo Indians, who resided west of the river along the raft to remove them; and a land office was established at Natchitoches, with a land district embracing the land on both sides of the river, the greater part of which was previously entirely shut out by that obstruction.

The first sales of land in 1838 in that district amounted to $411,870. (See Ex. Doc. No. 38, H. R., 26th Cong., 2d sess.) The year following the sales were $79,527. (Ex. Doc. No. 24, H. R., 27th Cong., 2d sess.) The sales since then to the second quarter of the year 1849 were in all about $742,497; and there remained about three million acres to be disposed of.

The sales of land in the Washington district, Arkansas, similarly situated, to 1847, inclusive, amounted to $630,855. (Ex. Doc. No. 12, H. R., 30th Cong., 2d sess.) And there remained in that district in 1834, 420,989 acres that had been in market twenty-five years, so that the sales of the public lands brought into market by this gigantic improvement amounted to $1,373,352—four times its original cost.

In 1841, the raft had again formed to a limited extent, and another appropriation of $75,000 was made; but from some cause the work was abandoned before any good result was obtained.

I have shown by official documents that the General Government has been the gainer by the original removal of that obstruction, and I feel satisfied that a like result will be obtained by its removal at the present time, exclusive of the immense advantages in military operations, in the increased celerity and certainty in the transportation of troops and their supplies—an object of great importance—and facility of communicating with New Mexico.

This improvement will contribute to the defense of the country, too, in another and much more pleasing, efficient, and cheap manner, by facilitating and inviting the settlement of the northern frontier of Texas by that extraordinary class of men of the West and Southwest known as backwoods and frontiersmen. I will venture to assert, without fear of contradiction, that a more patriotic and efficient set of men cannot be found in any country. Give them a foothold, and fairly organized and acquainted with each other, you may then dispense with your standing army along that frontier; they have no superiors in Indian warfare; they can out hunt and out shoot any Indian, and can trail quite equal to any Indian. I have lived many long years among them, and know them well.

According to the principles laid down by the late John C. Calhoun in his Memphis speech, and speeches on the Cumberland-dam question, this improvement may fairly be classed as a national work. I am not the advocate of any indiscriminate system of internal improvement by the General Government; but I hold, with the late Mr. Calhoun, a strict constructionist, that there are works that of necessity are national, "and that if you set up too narrow a construction, and do not give the power originally intended, there is great danger that there will be no limitation upon it

NEW SERIES....No. 118.

“whatever.” But I do not wish to put this work on those grounds alone. I say that it is necessary and proper, and that it is required for the defense of the country, for the transportation of, and supplies for troops; that it will produce an immense saving in the Quartermaster's Department; that it will open a better and shorter road, for military purposes, to New Mexico and territory of the United States west; that it will bring into market a large body of public land, and in these points of view becomes essentially a national work. General Jackson must have so considered it, because I find that appropriations were made for that object almost every year during his Administration, both before and after his veto of the Maysville road bill; and the late President Polk, while a member of this House, voted for appropriations for that work.

If it was then considered a national work, it becomes ten times more so now. Since then Texas has been annexed, New Mexico and California have been acquired, and we are bound by a solemn treaty to defend Mexico from the incursions of the Indian tribes in our territory; and a very onerous treaty it is, too. And in order to comply with its stipulations, a line of military posts must be kept up along the northern frontier of Texas, and in New Mexico and California.

I think that I have made it sufficiently clear that the cost of the work will be saved in less than two years in the transportation of troops and their supplies alone, and this, too, exclusive of the large body of public land that will thereby be brought into market, which will more than reimburse the entire expenditure.

If my view of this subject be correct, Congress has clearly the power—and in view of economy, it becomes the duty of Congress to provide for the removal of this obstruction—by the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution. The United States is bound to protect each of the States against invasion and against domestic violence. Troops must therefore be stationed along the Texas frontier to keep off the Indian tribes in the territory of the United States. Then if this work, as I have demonstrated, is necessary and proper to that end, or for the support of the army, the power is clearly conferred without any regard to that vexed question of internal improvement by the General Government.

It may be asked why this work should not be executed by Louisiana? My answer is, that the obstruction is at the northern limit of that State. The United States, and the States of Arkansas and Texas, have by far a greater interest; and by the act admitting Louisiana into the Union, it is prescribed “as a condition upon which said State is incorporated into the Union, that the river Mississippi and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same, and into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said State as to the inhabitants of other States, and the Territories of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor, imposed by the said State.” It is therefore clearly a work that should be executed by the General Government.

The United States engineer estimated the removal of the raft, and other improvements required in the river, at $186,500. A large portion of this amount is estimated for cut-offs and other work below Shreveport, thought not to be absolutely necessary. The original raft was removed at an average cost of about $20,000 per mile, including costs of examinations, surveys, boats, &c. The raft is now stated to be about five miles long, and must be more easily removed than the original, which had lain there over half a century. It is therefore concluded that $100,000 will be sufficient to free the navigation of the principal obstruction.

Mr. SACKETT. I do not intend to make a general speech upon the subject of the improvement of rivers and harbors, but only to call attention to certain defects and omissions, and to one more especially of a most glaring character in this bill, which I think this House ought to correct, and which I am quite sure they will correct after the facts of the case are presented. At the proper time I shall submit a motion, to supply what is, as I think, a most manifest and extraordinary omission in this bill. I will say, in passing, that I am in favor of the principle of the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and that it is a duty enjoined upon the Government, by every consideration of justice and good faith, toward the commerce of the country. There is a commerce on Lake Ontario of near $100,000,000 yearly. Every State of the West, and every citizen of the West, is interested in that commerce. A large share of our products of the West float over that lake, which possesses but few of what may be called natural harbors. There are few good and valuable harbors that can be secured for the benefit of commerce upon it. I wish to have the attention particularly of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to what I am about to state, with the view to ascertain whether he assents to the truth of the facts I shall set forth. As early as 1829, the Government adopted Big Sodus Bay—as it is known, in contradistinction to Little Sodus—as one of the harbors of this lake. Government had a double object in view then, which is of equal potency now. One object was to improve by far the best harbor upon the lake, for the benefit of the commerce of the lake; and the other object was this—Lake Ontario being the dividing water between this and a foreign Power, and that harbor being about half way between the eastern and western ends of the lake, was the only depot the Government could secure, in case of a war, for the shelter of any naval force it might have upon it. I can say, beyond the possibility of contradiction, that it is the only harbor of sufficient capacity to answer the necessities of the Government in case of war, between England and the United States, upon that lake. It is a bay about six miles long and from one to two and a half wide, and surrounded by a rising country, contributing to make it one of the most perfect harbors upon the lakes or sea-board of the whole country. I risk little in saying that there is no better harbor upon the American coast, sea-board or lakes, than the harbor of Big Sodus Bay. It has several sheltering islands in it. It is situated midway upon the lake, and consequently the Government, at an early period, as I have stated before, (1829,) adopted this as an important harbor, that should be protected and improved; and we have actually expended upon it between $140,000 and $150,000. I may not be precisely accurate in the amount, but at any rate that is not far from the sum.

The mouth of the harbor is now protected by two piers nearly a mile in length, which were built more than twenty years ago, and which are now, to a certain extent, in a state of dilapidation. On account of their protected situation, they have stood better than any piers this Government has constructed elsewhere upon the inland waters for the security of a harbor. The Government this year recommend an appropriation of $15,000 to put this important work in a state of preservation and security. I am personally well acquainted with the situation and condition of these piers, and, if it be desired, can go further into detail, as to the pressing necessity for their improvement. I believe the $15,000 recommended by the Government—and the chairman of the committee will justify me in stating that that sum has been recommended—will put those piers in a condition to stand for many years to come. At present there exists breaches in them, some of the stone, timbers, and planking are gone, and some dredging is required at the mouth of the harbor of sand and dirt, the collection of twenty years. The piers are about a mile in length, stretching out into the lake; and what they require is to be thoroughly repaired, so that they will stand the storms of the lake. Unless they are so repaired, the immense expenditure of the Government of more than $140,000 will be lost and wasted, and the very best harbor upon any of the lakes will be rendered useless to commerce.

I do not intend to cast any direct censure upon the committee which has reported this bill, and given this subject its consideration. I attribute to a misapprehension of the circumstances of the case rather than to intended wrong, that with such a case as this before them, they have not recommended any appropriation for the preservation of this harbor, though, as I fully represented this case before that committee, the circumstances of this omission are very extraordinary, and as I think and as the people of this country interested in the commerce of that lake will think, are without excuse.

This same committee have gone fifteen miles further east, and recommended $10,000 for a new work, in no one respect comparing at all in value or importance with this, and refused to recommend for this when even the harbor is ready made, and only wants repairing; such an extraordinary course cannot be justified. This new work was never recommended by the Government. The Department recommend no appropriation for it. Now why does this committee assume to abandon the most important harbor on the lake, to enter into a new scheme of this kind? It demands explanation—explanation that I know cannot be given on any principle of justice, right, or sound legislation. They have made an appropriation, I say, for a new work at a distance of sixteen or seventeen miles from Big Sodus Bay, for which the Government has never heretofore given a recommendation. Why is this? Why is a work of this vast importance neglected, and one of the best harbors of all the lakes abandoned, to try some new experiment, of which we know nothing, and where there is no commerce, no shipping, and now no harbor? The distance from the mouth of the Genesee river, below Rochester—a very important commercial point—to Oswego, which is another important point, is between sixty and seventy miles; and without the harbor of Big Sodus, I wish the committee to bear in mind—for it is a fact that cannot be contradicted—there is not a single harbor of protection for vessels for this whole distance, a part of the lake more exposed than any other, it being in the central part and at the widest point, and nowhere sheltered by a single island or protection. The work suggested will not be a protection at all, for it has not yet been begun.

What can be the meaning of this abandonment of so important a work? Why does the Committee on Commerce neglect to recommend the preservation of a work on which there has been already expended more than $140,000, and a harbor that is by far the best on all the lakes—a harbor that is the only one that can be used as a naval depot in case of war? This is a most extraordinary proceeding—one that cannot be justified—one that every principle of right, justice, and propriety condemns. It is a mockery of harbor protection to pursue such a course—a course that will meet the swift condemnation of the people, and that ought to be repudiated by every interest connected with commerce. Are we to let the best harbors of the country go to decay for the sake of new and untried experiments? Such a course is unheard-of in the course of commercial protection, and I call upon the House to take notice of it.

I say there is no protection at present, except this harbor, between the two by far the most commercial points on that lake, Rochester and Oswego, a distance of between sixty and seventy miles. I ask this committee, and I ask the chairman of the committee, whether this is wise and sound legislation? whether it is justice to the harbors and the commerce of that lake to refuse to appropriate to a work constituted as this is—a work in which there has been more than $140,000 expended, and which is regarded through that whole country as the very best harbor upon the lake, and that only requires an appropriation of $10,000 or $15,000 to keep it in a state of preservation for a long series of years? The water in that harbor is from thirty to forty feet deep. There are at least three square miles of water in it of sufficient depth to float any ship of our Navy.

There are other considerations, which, in justice to the subject, this committee ought to take into account. This bay is situated about nine miles from the Erie canal. A canal is at this time in process of construction, to connect the Erie canal with the waters of that bay, which is very soon to make that one of the great commercial points upon that lake. A railroad company is also organized for the purpose of constructing a road to connect that point with the series of railroads which connect the West and the East, the coal regions of Pennsylvania, and both the central and southern line of railroads running through the State of New York. If we examine this subject, we see that it is not only a point of vast importance directly, to the commerce upon the lake, but it is a point of vast importance connected with the internal trade that will necessarily and very soon be connected with the point itself. In fact, looking to the future interests of the country, there is no more important commercial point upon our inland lakes.

Mr. TAYLOR. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] seems to be discussing a particular item in this bill in regard to the improvement of some harbor on Lake Ontario. He is very properly discussing it; but I suggest to him, and I submit a question, whether his remarks would not be more proper under five minutes explanation, which would be allowed upon each of these items;—and I see that there are five for Lake Ontario.

I would further say to the gentleman, without interrupting his speech, that I really believe that it would be wiser to move that the committee rise, and limit debate to five minutes, and then proceed to the items of this bill, so that the bill may pass to-morrow. The time of this House is very precious, and I would suggest to my friend from New York [Mr. SACKETT] that he allow the motion to be made, that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate, so that we can proceed to the consideration of the various items in this bill. I see that there are seventy-three of them in all, and I suppose that there are gentlemen who would like to make seventy-three speeches for and seventy-three speeches against them. We would progress admirably under the five minutes rule, and I submit, with all due respect to the gentleman, the suggestion that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. SACKETT. If my friend will allow me, I have to make a remark or too further. I am nearly done with the subject. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the committee for any considerable length of time. I have made these remarks, because I thought such an amendment as the one I have suggested could not be presented under the five minutes rule, as I regard the point in whose behalf I have offered these remarks as one of the most important points upon the lake. It is, in truth, the only naval point which can be used upon Lake Ontario. I wished to make these explanations with a view of giving the committee the facts, so that when the amendment is moved it may be properly understood.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish in this connection to state some matters of fact. The works upon this Big Sodus Bay upon Lake Ontario, to which he refers, are old works, and were commenced in 1829. The first appropriation that was made for that harbor was to the amount of $143,000. The harbor is a fair one for a harbor upon that lake. We have appropriated $10,000 for the improvement of another harbor, which is about fifteen miles from that one, upon the understanding that the land and the position of the other harbor, would render it of great value as a harbor of refuge upon that coast; and another reason is because that part of the coast is the most exposed of any part of Lake Ontario, and if vessels are ever in danger of being driven by the northwest winds upon the coast, it is at that point. The facts as they came to the knowledge and understanding of the committee are, that the other bay, which is about fifteen miles further to the west, and is surrounded by such high banks as to afford better protection at the present time for shipping, induced the committee to make this appropriation, rather than to make an appropriation for the old work, supposing that work could be at some future time put in repair if necessary, and that the sum which we have now named in this appropriation was, at this time, a proper and fair distribution of these appropriations applicable to that point.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I wish to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce a question. If a vessel approaching Oswego in a gale from the northwest could enter that harbor—whether the committee had not in view an appropriation for a harbor of refuge, where vessels might make it when they could not at Oswego?

Mr. SEYMOUR. My colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] is right in his suggestion.

Mr. SACKETT. One suggestion made by the chairman of the committee as a reason for neglecting Sodus Bay is a reason in relation to which he is entirely mistaken. It is not true in point of fact that the country surrounding Little Sodus Bay makes it better than the Big Sodus Bay. I do not wish to say anything against that point; it is not necessary. I do not know but with $100,000 or $200,000 expended there a harbor of some value might be made. I suppose this to be true. But while I suppose this—guess at it, which is all the committee could have done, for the Government recommended nothing—I know that Big Sodus Bay is by far the best harbor upon that lake or on any of the lakes. There is no harbor that compares with it at all, either in capacity, safety, or security; and there is no harbor that can compare with it in a national point of view for naval purposes. Should we ever have any difficulty with England, there is no harbor so calculated for defense on account of the points of intersection with the lake. In fact the Committee on Commerce has refused to report for the only national harbor of protection for a navy there is on Lake Ontario, and that too even after the Government has made the work, and all that is wanted is to keep it in repair.

On the subject of appropriations for that lake, I ought to say a word. The commerce of that lake is immense, and increasing with wonderful rapidity. The whole country is interested in it, and the appropriations for that lake are only about one half what the appropriations are for Lake Erie. I am not complaining, however, in regard to that point. I am only endeavoring to show to the committee the great propriety, as I think, of improving this harbor, and putting these works, upon which the Government have expended so much, in a safe state of preservation. That is all I ask, and that is all those interested in this matter ask. It is what the commerce of the whole country requires. I come now directly to the point. Will this committee suffer these works to go to decay for the want of $10,000 or $15,000, which will put them in a state of preservation that will last for a long series of years? I do not believe that any such policy will characterize our legislation. There is some misapprehension on the part of the Committee on Commerce touching this subject. They have overlooked this important work without reason, and this House will correct it. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce says Little Sodus will serve as a port of refuge to vessels going to Oswego. Suppose it will, is so important a point as Big Sodus to be neglected to build up a tender to Oswego? What sort of justice is this, what sort of protection to commerce is it? There is at Sodus a light-house, collector, and custom-house officers, and commercial business. How is it at the point the committee proposes? I leave the committee to answer.

I have been solicited to move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing this debate. There are those who desire to be heard before this committee upon other matters connected with this bill, and I shall therefore decline to make such motion. I wish to say a word upon the supposed infallibility of this bill. I protest against any such idea as to any bill which may be brought into the House.

The committee are to judge of the propriety or impropriety of every amendment, and are we to be told when the Committee on Commerce bring in their bill here, that it is brought in upon such principles, under such circumstances, and after such labor by the committee, that it is not justly subject to amendment? Sir, I agree to no such proposition: I understand that there are various important points of the rivers and harbors of the country which are entirely neglected by this bill. I have endeavored to represent one. There are others of still greater importance, and I protest against the principle that we are not to look to the real propriety of the case, but to be guided precisely by the views of the committee that reported the bill. I repudiate all such ideas of legislation.

The amendment that I intend to propose at the proper time, in reference to Sodus Bay, appropriates $15,000, which is the precise sum that the Government has recommended as the proper amount to be expended in order to secure the works already there from destruction by the elements and the waters of the lake.

Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined bills of the following titles, viz:

H. R. No. 91. An act for the relief of the executors and heirs of Thomas Fletcher, deceased;

H. R. No. 207. An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852;

H. R. No. 262. An act to authorize the President of the United States to designate the places for the ports of entry and delivery for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, and to fix the compensation of the collector at Astoria, in said Territory;

H. R. No. 231. An act for the relief of James W. Campbell, of Pike county, Missouri;

H. R. No. 167. An act for the relief of Isaac Cobb;

H. R. No. 96. An act for the relief of Gustavus A. De Russey, late acting purser in the Navy;

H. R. No. 103. An act for the relief of John McIntosh; and

S. No. 241. An act to authorize the Mayor and Common Council of Chicago, Illinois, to excavate a portion of the public reservation at that place, with a view to the improvement of the navigation of Chicago river—

And found the same truly enrolled; when the Speaker signed the said bills.

Mr. TAYLOR. With a view to facilitate the progress of the public business, I shall not avail myself of the opportunity now afforded me of addressing the committee for one hour, although I have listened to over two hundred speeches from other gentlemen which have occupied nearly the whole session. I submit to the committee that we shall progress with this bill with as much satisfaction to every gentleman interested in it, and with as much benefit to the whole country, by closing the debate and confining ourselves to the explanation of amendments in five-minutes speeches, as we shall by further debate under the one hour rule; I therefore move that the committee rise, with a view to close the debate in a short time.

Mr. DISNEY. I trust my colleague will withdraw that motion. It is very evident, from the indications around us, that this bill has been taken up quite unexpectedly, and that gentlemen are not prepared to debate it. The bill is certainly altogether too important in its character to be forced through the House without full and free discussion in regard to it.

Now, I have a matter to bring to the attention of the committee, in which my constituents are interested—a matter of vast importance to them and, I believe, to the Republic generally; and certainly to propose to me to crowd into a five-minutes speech, even a mere statement of facts, is asking too much.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise is not debatable.

Mr. TAYLOR. I merely propose to reply to my colleague. I notice that this bill contains appropriations for the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Arkansas rivers, $260,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do; but merely to reply to my colleague. I am as much in favor of these appropriations as my colleague, or anybody else; but we are now within less than a month of the close of this session, with the great bills of the session pressing upon us, and the Senate, in some degree, reproaching the House with not expediting the public business. Now, here is a bill which has been before us since the 14th day of June last. It was submitted to this House more than a month ago, and I do not believe there is a gentleman in this committee who has not long since made up his mind definitely in regard to these appropriations, and who is not ready to vote on them. I do not desire to limit debate upon the general policy of the country; and if gentlemen desire it, I am willing to have evening sessions from seven till ten o'clock.

Mr. MEADE. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to say a word by way of explanation?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield the floor to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. MEADE. I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio, that a motion for the committee to rise with a view of closing this debate ought, in my opinion, never to be made, unless the committee shows a disposition to quit the subject-matter before it in order to discuss general matters having no connection with that subject. We have been in committee but one hour, and there has been no disposition to quit the merits of this bill with a view of discussing other matters. Now, while gentlemen show a disposition to confine themselves to the merits of the bill, and its various details and provisions, I do think that the application of the gag law by a majority of this House would be exceedingly injudicious and unjust.

I will remark further to my friend, that while it is not my purpose, nor, as far as I know, the purpose of any gentleman who is opposed to this bill, to make hour speeches, with a view of delaying the decision of the question, or in any way to throw impediments in its way; yet there are some who are desirous of bringing before the attention of the committee certain bona fide amendments to this bill which require more than five minutes explanation. And if my friend was not in too great a hurry to make his motion for the committee to rise, I would ask him for still more time, for the purpose of bringing to the notice of this committee one instance of omission in this bill, which, in my opinion, works great injustice to the State which I in part represent. But I will not ask my friend to grant me more of his time, unless it is freely granted. If it is granted, however, I have only to say that it will not take me more than ten minutes to say what I have to say. I do not wish to speak in opposition to the bill generally.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his motion for the committee to rise, in order that the gentleman from Virginia, and any other gentlemen who wish to present to the committee subjects that appertain to the perfection of this bill, may be heard at the present time.

Mr. TAYLOR. In deference to the wishes of the gentleman from Virginia, and of the distinguished gentleman who is chairman of the committee that reported this bill, I will, before I sit down, withdraw the motion. I wish, however, to make a remark in answer to the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the motion to rise is withdrawn?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; I withdraw it; but I wish to respond to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MEADE. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I will mention to him that one of my colleagues, who represents an interest deeply involved in the question of river and harbor improvements, is desirous, I have no doubt, although I have not conferred with him, of submitting his views upon this subject.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will state to the gentleman that I have withdrawn the motion until gentlemen depart from the discussion of the bill now under consideration. I differ with the gentleman from Virginia in this respect: I think that we can discuss these bills which have been lying on our tables so long a great deal more appropriately, intelligibly, and successfully, by limiting debate, and confining ourselves to five minutes of explanation for and against amendments. My experience here leads me to that conclusion.

Now, I have no desire to limit the general debate upon this bill, or any other; but I submit to the gentlemen of this committee that it behooves us, as legislators, when we have been sitting here since the first Monday in December last, to expedite the public business, and, if we ever mean to pass a river and harbor bill, to do it now, and do it quickly, for the people all over the country expect it at our hands, and expect that we shall pass upon it in time for the Senate to pass upon it also. You know that we lost a very valuable appropriation bill of this kind at the last session, because we sent it to the Senate too late for them to act upon it. In my humble judgment, however, it was in good time; but we were then in view of a presidential nomination, and it did not suit the views of presidential aspirants to take up that bill, for the want of which the Western country, and the United States generally, had been suffering for so many years, and hence it was defeated.

Now, I should like to consume an hour in discussing the merits of this bill, and of the various appropriations contained in it. It is imperatively demanded by the Western States that something shall be done to protect our harbors, to protect the commerce amongst the States, to improve our rivers, to uphold that vast internal commerce which is greatly superior, in amount, to our foreign commerce, and which, I say, demands the attention, and the speedy attention, of this House, and of this Congress. We should not, then, fritter away our time in unnecessary debate. I wish to debate some amendments which I design to offer to this bill, but I am content to debate them under the five minutes rule. Those of my friends ought not to complain who have already occupied two, three, four, and five hours of the time of this House during the present session. There are a hundred gentlemen in this House—and I wish the country to know and understand it—who, by the tyranny of the rules which we have imposed upon ourselves, have not been permitted to occupy five minutes of the time of this House on any proposition, local, private, or public.

Now, I have great deference to the wishes of those gentlemen. I am willing to sit here during four or five hours in the morning, and then have protracted sessions in the evening, if they desire it, to hear them discuss public questions of general interest. But when a bill of this kind is before us, which has been upon our tables for a month; when we have resolved to adjourn on the 16th of August, and when we have been reproached by the Senate for not sending them the important appropriation bills, so that they may get ready to adjourn, I do think it behooves us to act speedily and promptly on this bill, and not consume time by unnecessary and vexatious disquisitions on questions which are not before us.

I will now yield my right to occupy the floor one hour, and I will withhold my motion as long as gentlemen confine themselves to a discussion of the bill now before us, but I shall renew it as soon as I find gentlemen departing from it to make presidential Buncombe speeches, to which I have no objection, provided they can be made at some convenient time during our sessions, and which, if it becomes necessary, I shall probably indulge in making myself. But I submit that we are called upon by an imperious necessity, not only to act on this bill, but to hear from our various committees—the Naval Committee, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Commerce—upon other subjects than this bill, and all the other committees which have not been called for four months, while some of us have been sitting here in exhausted health and spirits, listening with regret to the waste of the time of the House and of the committee, which, it seems to me, might have been profitably appropriated, if we had limited ourselves to debate on the questions under consideration.

Now, I have no reproaches to make against any gentleman of this House; but as a member of some little experience, I feel that I have a right to submit it to the gentlemen of the committee, if it does not behoove us to act promptly upon this bill, particularly when, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] says, it is fourteen years since any appropriations have been made for the improvement of our harbors and the protection of our commerce. I, for one, sir, am willing to sit here day in and day out, to hold evening sessions, and to pass this bill before we take up any other appropriation bill whatever. I am friendly to the war establishment, and to our Navy, and I am willing to go to a reasonable extent to make appropriation for the civil and diplomatic service of the country; but I say that gentlemen who represent interior districts, should stand by this bill and pass it in some form or other, before they touch the civil and diplomatic bill, or any other appropriation bill, in the House or in the committee.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to offer a substitute for the entire bill now before the committee. I would not do it if I was assured that no amendment would be offered to the bill as reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The bill I propose is one introduced into the House by me on the 4th of March last, and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It is the identical bill which passed this House, in the last Congress, which was sent to the Senate, and was defeated there on the last day of the session. I offer it now, without any further remarks, and hope it will be printed in the Globe, so that every one can examine it. Then, if the House vote this substitute down, I shall feel justified in voting against all other amendments which may be offered. If we cannot take this bill, let us take the one reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a sum of money be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury sufficient for the following purposes, viz:

it was that those who have no constitutional scruples upon this subject should have overlooked the State of Virginia, while all the other States have been provided for? I say, Mr. Chairman, it is unfair. It is utterly unjust that any State should be overlooked from the simple fact that her delegation is restrained by honest convictions from asking for appropriations of this sort. Those who do not entertain constitutional objections should take care in all bills of this sort to see that equal justice be done to every section of the Union.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I ask the gentleman to allow me to explain the matter.

Mr. MEADE. I cannot give way at present. I said I had conferred with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He gave me for a reason of the omission that no estimates or petitions had been submitted to his committee for the State of Virginia. It only shows that the Department which submitted the estimates have overlooked the State of Virginia entirely.

Now, sir, the delegation from Virginia have the same reasons for not appearing before the committee that restrain them from voting for such appropriations in the House. But if it be the policy of Congress to improve the rivers and harbors of the country, is it not incumbent upon those who are in favor of them, and who have no constitutional scruples in the way, so far to respect the honest opinions of Virginia as to see that she shall not suffer by the integrity and fidelity of her Representatives in strictly adhering to the great doctrines inculcated by their forefathers, and reiterated time after time by their children?

Look to the map of Virginia, and see if there is a State in this Union penetrated by more noble rivers than that State is. Is there a State in this Union presenting to the operations of commerce so inviting a field as her bays and rivers? Not one. If it be the purpose of Congress to look to interests of this sort, I appeal to its justice, I appeal to its sense of equity, that the State of Virginia shall not be put under the ban simply because she entertains an honest belief that Congress has no authority under the Constitution to make such appropriations. Sir, it is the bounden duty, in my opinion, of those who have the charge of preparing these bills, to provide for the interests of that State as well as for those of other States of the Union. Why, sir, I find more than a dozen appropriations for the great State of New York, embracing every portion of it. The interest of almost every State except Virginia is carefully provided for.

To those from the interior of the country who may be disposed to favor the improvement of rivers, and who have no constitutional objections to appropriations by Congress for such purposes, I beg to say that in the State of Virginia, the noble James river, which bears the commerce of three most important cities, presents, at this time, an obstacle to the general commerce of the country equal to that of any river in the United States. But for Harrison's Bar, which lies about sixteen miles below the junction of the Appomattox and James rivers, ships of the largest burden would float safely up to the wharves at City Point and discharge their cargoes without hindrance. They can now only reach that point by putting half their cargo on board of lighters which, at great expense, are sent down to Harrison's Bar for that purpose. This bar is about sixty-five miles from Richmond, and some twenty-five or thirty from Petersburg. But, Mr. Chairman, we have not been urging upon Congress the appropriation of $50,000 for the removal of that bar. We have not brought to the attention of the nation the great interests involved in the navigation of the James river. We have not brought the claims of that river and its heavy commerce to the attention of Congress, for the reason that I have just named: our convictions in regard to the powers of Congress over the subject.

Is it not incumbent, then, upon those who entertain no such scruples, to see that the interests of every section of the country be provided for. It is adding insult to injury, to tell us we do this to punish you. To punish what? To punish honesty of purpose? To punish constitutional convictions? Is it because the term "Virginia abstraction" has become odious in this House, that this policy is pursued? Let me remind those gentlemen that we value those abstractions as the dictates of a sacred duty. Let them consider the source from which such opinions come. Let them consider that it is by virtue of the veneration and respect which we have been ever in the habit of observing towards the great charter of our rights. Let them consider, at least, that they proceed from an honest purpose, and that we are governed in this matter by a principle—a principle that leads us to these results; and that however erroneous they may be deemed by others, they are as much bound to respect them as one denomination of Christians are bound to respect the conscientious opinions and belief of another. If both sincerely believe in their religion, it becomes neither to tell the other they are wrong, and should be punished. Should Virginia be excommunicated because she adheres to her faith—because she refuses to be purchased? I protest against such a system of legislation. I say to the committee, that by pursuing a policy of this sort, instead of promoting and fostering a feeling of love for the Confederacy, it is calculated to create heartburnings and discontent, and to convert the Congress of the United States into an inquisition and engine of torture, to force the consciences of men.

Mr. Chairman, while I shall vote against this bill, in consequence of many appropriations in it which I cannot approve, and which I believe to be unconstitutional, yet if such a bill is to pass, it is my duty to urge upon this House, and upon those who can conscientiously vote for such a bill, to do justice to all.

Mr. STANLY. Will my friend allow me to say a word? In the substitute I have offered, there is an appropriation for the very thing to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. MEADE. I am very well aware of that; but I should prefer this bill with the omission of my State, to the bill offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] for the simple reason, that it does less violence to the Constitution. That bill is much more local and particular in its provisions. I would prefer this bill as the lesser evil, although the greater evil would offer a local benefit. I shall not be controlled in my choice between the bill before the House and that proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, by the fact that there is in that bill some $40,000 or $50,000 offered as a reward for the vote of Virginia. No, sir; I prefer this bill which contains an appropriation of about $1,500,000, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, which I believe appropriates upwards of $3,000,000.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. The remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] demand from me, on behalf of the committee, a few words of explanation in reference to the course which we have pursued. The Committee on Commerce found, when they looked at this subject for the first time, that no estimates had been made for any appropriation that fell within the State of Virginia. They found that no petitions had been presented from that State for any appropriation, or even for a survey upon which future appropriations could be based. No member of this House from the State of Virginia ever presented to that committee any objects for their consideration; and I would ask the members of this committee whether they deem it proper for any committee of this House, and more especially a committee constituted, as we were, in reference to the distribution of the patronage of the Government, if I may so call it, upon works of this character, to have sought cases, in the different States, for the purpose of locating our appropriations? Had we done so, we should have departed entirely from that spirit and principle of practice by which we have been actuated in the formation of this bill from the beginning to the end of it. At the same time, sir, it did not escape our observation, and it was a matter of remark and consideration in the committee, that the great State of Virginia, with all her commercial interests, did not appear in this bill. But they said that a sense of delicacy and propriety, in reference to the construction of a bill of this character, certainly ought to have, and did have, the effect to withhold any member of that committee from calling upon any gentleman from the State of Virginia to solicit a case, where we might appropriate money in that State.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) The gentleman seems to place the fact that there is no appropriation in that bill for the State of Virginia

Mr. MEADE. If I understood the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,]—for I heard him but very imperfectly,—he now proposes to offer, as an amendment, the bill passed by the House during the last session of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make a speech upon this question. I only wish to submit a very few remarks to the committee upon the subject. I see from the votes that have been taken upon preliminary questions in connection with this bill, that it is the determination of this House to pass this bill in some shape or other. I wish to bring to the attention of the committee the fact, that while nearly every State in the Union has been provided for in this bill to some extent, that which I have the honor to represent in part is not mentioned. Every other State has some appropriation except (I may without egotism be permitted to say) the great State of Virginia. I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] and asked him why upon the ground that members of that State did not call upon the committee and petition for anything of that kind. While I do not think that is a ground that ought to be considered, yet I wish to ask the gentleman if that was the rule which influenced him in not inserting some provision, and making some appropriation for the Tennessee river? He was called upon, I know, upon that subject. I find nothing in the bill for that important watercourse.

Mr. MEADE. I did not yield the floor for the introduction of any new matter. I yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] for the purpose of allowing him to make an explanation of the course pursued by the committee in regard to my own State.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] since he has alluded to the position of Virginia, and to the opinions entertained by her in regard to works of this character, and of the constitutional right of Congress to make appropriations therefor, that no considerations of that kind operated upon the committee in this matter. We respect the State of Virginia; we respect her statesmen; we respect her interests; and we were most happy to find, upon investigations which we instituted upon this subject, that the first appropriation that was made for the construction of piers upon the Delaware river, for the protection of the commerce of this country in that quarter, was sanctioned by that distinguished citizen, Thomas Jefferson, from Virginia—the very first appropriation, as early as 1805, of $5,000 and upwards, for the purpose of commencing upon these waters works for the protection of commerce.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to know if the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] is to be understood as asserting that Mr. Jefferson admitted that Congress possessed this power of making appropriations for rivers?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I mean to say this, that Mr. Jefferson approved of that bill, and I believe he approved of one or two others, the effect of which was to protect our commerce in the harbors and upon the rivers of the country. I know very well the doctrine he proclaimed in his messages. I know that he announced himself as opposed to the system of internal improvements; but I know at the same time that he did approve of that bill, and I believe one or two others, which he based upon no other power than that expressed in the Constitution—a power for building piers for the purpose of making navigation easy and safe.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman allow me to read his own language upon this subject?

Mr. SEYMOUR. Yes, sir; but I concede all that.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Jefferson, in the second session of the ninth Congress, speaking of the continuance of imports, and of the probable surplus revenue, after the extinguishment of the public debt, uses this language:

"Their patriotism certainly would prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers."

And in the same connection he adds:

"I suppose an amendment of the Constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the Constitution, and to which it permits the public revenues to be applied."

Mr. SEYMOUR. I will add to what I said in reference to the views of Mr. Jefferson, that Mr. Adams and Mr. Monroe also coincided in the views which they put forth in their messages upon this subject, and that they were opposed to a general system of internal improvement; but at the same time those distinguished men, during their administrations, did not hesitate to approve of works which had for their object the protection of the commerce of the country upon our lakes and in our harbors.

Mr. Monroe went to a greater extent in this matter than the two Presidents that preceded him. Too much is due to the history of those times.

I wish to say a word further in regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] whom I was proceeding to answer when [Mr. MILLSON] interrupted me. He alluded to appropriations contained in this bill for works in the State of New York. There are appropriations, large in amount, made to that State, as there are also to other States that have great commercial interests, and which are bordered by large navigable waters.

The proper idea, I think, to be entertained upon this subject, is not that every State in the Union should be entitled to an appropriation for the protection and preservation of its commerce, but that wherever a national object can be found, wherever it may be, whether in the State of New York, or in the State of Virginia, or in any other State, there let us meet it with the constitutional power, and let us exercise it in the protection of our commerce; and inasmuch as no question was brought before us in relation to the State which the honorable gentleman [Mr. MEADE] represents, and which he has so ably vindicated here, we did not enter into that inquiry in reference to that State. Indeed, we had no basis for our action.

No report was presented to us and no estimates in reference to the Tennessee river, to which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] has alluded. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] did, however, bring before us, from the War Department and Topographical Bureau, the case of the Tennessee river, and referred us to previous reports upon the subject. It underwent a very patient and long investigation in the committee, but the committee were not in favor of inserting it in this bill.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. MEADE. I propose to finish what I have to say, and then will leave the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I merely wish to ask if I understand the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to say, that the reason why the Tennessee river was not provided for in the bill as reported, was, that no one appeared before that committee in behalf of that interest?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I am obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] for the opportunity to correct a mistake, committed by me in reference to that matter. In one meeting we did institute that investigation upon the data before us, which were surveys made some years previous, and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] apprehending that such data were imperfect, and understanding the conclusion to which we had arrived, very creditably to himself, and for the benefit of his constituents, procured from the War Department a new estimate upon that subject, which, I will do him the justice to say, was not received by the committee until they had come to their conclusion upon the subject.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire to ask the honorable chairman this question: Did not the committee, when I appeared before them with Long's report on that river, and the estimates of the cost of the improvement of its navigation, as made out by the Topographical Bureau and submitted to the Secretary of War, give me, as a reason why an appropriation for the Tennessee river was not included in the bill, that they had perfected their bill, and that it was already as large as would probably pass?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. MEADE. Having the highest opinion of my worthy friend, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] both as to his intelligence and integrity, I am inclined to receive almost any apology he may offer for his neglect of Virginia in reporting this bill.

The chairman of the Committee on Commerce says it was not his business to invite applications of this sort. Well, that may be true, and I conceive he may not have regarded that as a part of his duty; yet, had I been a member of that committee, it seems to me that I should have taken a different view of its obligations. I should, without any special application, have thrown my eye over the whole extent of country, and examined into the wants of the whole Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would simply remark, that the chairman of that committee, no doubt, in investigating this question, had before him the appropriations included in the bill of the last session. In that bill Virginia was not wholly neglected as in this. Why is it that the small amount contained in that bill should not have struck the attention of the Committee on Commerce, if they read the bill at all, which I presume they did? If there was not a disposition to overlook the interest of my State, how is it that estimates were presented from the executive officers of the Government, without including estimates for the State of Virginia also? That was an omission upon the part of those officers which I cannot charge upon the committee or its chairman. Let the members of this House remember that the river to which I have called their attention, is the largest river in the State of Virginia, upon which are situated three of its most important towns. The obstructions in it are serious impediments to commerce, and can be easily removed by an adequate appropriation. James river affords the means of transporting to the markets of the world almost the entire tobacco crop of the State of Virginia, amounting to fifty thousand hogsheads. The worth of that tobacco is from three to five millions of dollars annually, according to its price.

In addition to that, sir, the other great staple of Virginia, wheat, goes down that river in considerable quantities. There cannot be less than from three to five hundred thousand barrels of flour transported to the markets of the world through that outlet. These constitute the most important articles of our commerce. The whole amount of commerce going down the James river cannot, in my opinion, fall short annually of from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000.

We all know that there must be a return trade of equal amount coming up the river, making a grand total of some $10,000,000 or $12,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, whilst I am making this speech in behalf of the State I in part represent, I do not wish by what I say to impress upon the committee the importance of passing a bill of this character. No, sir! I believe that every internal improvement ought to be constructed by the individuals directly interested in it.

[A message was here received from the Senate, through ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House of the passage by that body of the joint resolution of the House, fixing the day of final adjournment, with an amendment, and sundry bills, and requesting the concurrence of the House therein.]

There is another very large river washing the shores of Virginia, the Roanoke, in which North Carolina is also interested, down which immense amounts of produce annually go. There are many impediments in that river, which might be removed by an appropriation of this sort. And in this connection, Mr. Chairman, let me bring to the attention of this committee a most important fact: that of the appropriations for internal improvements, made since the establishment of the Government, amounting in all from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, but $25,000 has ever been voted to the State of Virginia, and that was for the construction of a canal from the city of Norfolk to the Dismal Swamp. I believe that is the extent of appropriations which ever have been made to the State of Virginia, notwithstanding the multitude and the extent of her wants upon that subject. It is, however, an evidence of her fidelity to those principles which she has ever maintained in relation to the power of the General Government.

Mr. ALLISON. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia what would be the probable cost of the removal of the bar in the James river?

Mr. MEADE. I will answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania simply by telling him that there have been estimates made, but I do not now recollect the precise amount. I presume $50,000 would at least be sufficient to remove that bar. I am not, however, certain as to that.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the gentleman to argue that such an amendment would be proper to this bill?

Mr. MEADE. I say such an amendment would be highly proper if the bill be passed at all.

Mr. ALLISON. If the gentleman will offer such an amendment, I, for one, will cast my vote in its favor.

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman will be gratified—an amendment to that effect will be offered.

Mr. STUART. I wish to ask a question. The gentleman has been complaining of the Committee on Commerce for not reporting something favorable to Virginia. Now, I am not a member of that committee, and do not propose to take it in charge, but I would ask him whether he does not know that that committee, as well as all others, can properly only take up such subjects as are referred to it? And when he concedes there has not been a petition before the committee asking for anything of the kind, with what propriety he can make the objection?

Mr. MEADE. The same idea was forcibly stated by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to which I have made allusion, and therefore I say it was unnecessary for the gentleman from Michigan to have reiterated it.

Mr. STUART. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. I want him to tell this committee whether he will vote for this bill should his amendment be incorporated in it?

Mr. MEADE. That question was also unnecessary, and I should characterize it by a stronger term but for the respect which I have for the gentleman from Michigan. I have said, in the course of my argument, that no bribe this committee could offer would induce me to depart from the principles in which I religiously believe, and which were taught me from my cradle by my father. Did he admit the supposition in his mind at the time he asked me such a question—that my vote would be controlled by such an appropriation? I have repeatedly said, Mr. Chairman, in the course of my argument, and I had hoped that every member of this committee had heard it, that while justice and equity required a fair appropriation to be made to the exigencies of my State, should such a bill pass, yet the delegation from Virginia, entertaining my views, would vote against the bill. But while we, under the control of our conscientious convictions, would vote against this bill, it was nevertheless the duty of every fair man in this committee to make the appropriation. I contend that the favors granted by Congress to any State of this Union should not depend upon the particular principles entertained by her in reference to constitutional power. I repeat again, sir, that the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred these various petitions, should have taken the whole subject under their consideration; and while I do not mean to bring charges against that committee or its worthy chairman, having the utmost confidence in it and its purposes, yet I would regard it as an omission of duty, which probably the press of business had occasioned. I repeat again, that the bill of last Congress was before that committee, for the bills of previous Congresses are usually taken by committees as a guide for their action, and in that bill their attention was drawn to an appropriation made for this very case.

Mr. STUART. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, I wish to say, that any question I have propounded was with the utmost respect for both the gentleman and his opinions, and simply for the purpose of bringing to his attention, because I know the gentleman's fairness upon all occasions, the character of the argument which he urges; and to submit—and I do that also with great respect—that any gentleman who denies the power of Congress to make these appropriations, cannot fairly object to any bill upon the ground that it does not appropriate for the benefit of his State. The only legitimate argument for him is, that he is opposed to the whole, and that he goes against the whole.

Mr. MEADE. You had as well contend, that in the bill which distributed the surplus revenue some years ago, the State of Virginia should have been left out because she believed the distribution to be wrong. If you adopt a particular policy, though it may be in opposition to the views of a particular State, that policy should apply equally to it as to the other States; but he must have a very perverse opinion of things who would suppose that in adopting a general policy for this Government, it should only be applicable to those who favor it. There are not, I trust, ten men in the committee who entertain the opinions of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman misapprehended me. I do not say such a bill should not be framed. I say, on the other hand, distinctly that it should be framed. I would make improvements in every State without reference to the opinions of its delegates upon the subject. But what I say is, that it is within the legitimate range of argument that a gentleman having constitutional scruples to these bills at all times, cannot object to them upon the ground that they did not favor his State.

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman has not changed his position. If the State of Virginia were to vote in the Congress of the United States against the declaration of a war which she believed to be unjust, would the gentleman exonerate the State of Virginia from furnishing her quota of men and money to prosecute that war? Certainly not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the ground upon which I place, apart from the constitutional question, my opposition to the appropriation of money for local improvements is, that the country to be benefited by these improvements is the country which should pay for them. And if a county of Ohio, or of New York, were to apply to the Legislature of either of those States for an appropriation for any local work, it would be unjust to tax the people of a remote county for that improvement, simply because it would benefit that particular locality, and thus contribute to the aggregate wealth of the country. Why, sir, if I owned an estate upon which there was an immense water power, could I require my neighbor to come and build my mill, because it added to the general wealth of the country? No, sir; the utmost I could require of him would be to indorse my note, and enable me to raise funds to erect that improvement. And so with regard to any county in any State of this Union. When it makes application for an internal improvement, it is granted upon the principle that the work will yield annually a profit equal at least to the interest on the money expended. If it does not, then the capital has been lost.

There are various considerations which enter into the mind of a Legislature of a State when it grants money for internal improvements besides the local benefit that may accrue. If the property is improved in value, why that property is more highly taxed, and thus a return, to some extent, is made into the Treasury, which contributes to the payment of the interest upon the money borrowed and expended. I will admit that many things should be taken into consideration in appropriating for internal improvements besides the profits arising from the work. It may be valuable in other respects, but as a general rule, unless it promises to yield profits in some shape or other equal to the interest of the outlay, the work should not be made. If $100,000 is expended by the community on a work which returns but half the interest, $50,000 is utterly lost. Nobody will deny a proposition so plain.

Those whose property is benefited, and whose income is increased by the improvement, should, in some way or other, be the bearers of the expense of its construction. All that a particular locality can require of the rest of the community, is to come to its assistance, and enable it by the general credit to borrow the money necessary for the work. This is the principle upon which every internal improvement should be based, and no other; those who receive the profit should bear the burden.

Mr. WALSH. Who should make the improvement in Virginia rivers?

Mr. MEADE. If the gentleman had listened to my argument, the question would not have been asked. I contend that every State should make its own improvements, and that Congress should not undertake to make internal improvements for the States.

Mr. WALSH. You have said that there was a general commerce upon the James river. If Virginia does not choose to make the improvement, is the general commerce of the country to suffer on that account? Is that the argument?

Mr. MEADE. That is not the argument at all.

Mr. WALSH. I only desire to understand the gentleman.

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman has put a question to me, which would draw me out upon the constitutional question, which I do not wish to argue. It is a foregone conclusion of the majority of the House, that this bill should pass, and I do not wish to waste my breath upon the constitutional question. I am only speaking of the expediency of making internal improvements with a view of inducing this committee, if possible, to confine their appropriations to those works alone where we have some assurance that the amount expended upon them will be returned in some way or other, by way of profits to the community, and not lavish the money of the country prodigally, and throw it away where no benefit will be derived, or if a benefit, not commensurate with the amount of the outlay. These are the considerations which I wish to press upon the minds of the committee, as they have already decided the constitutional question, as I infer from the various preliminary votes taken here. If I cannot effect one thing, I will try and effect another. If I cannot induce Congress to withhold unconstitutional appropriations, my next object is to induce it to confine these appropriations only upon such works as are known to be essential and important; and furthermore, I wish to induce Congress to exercise that power as a father would over his family, and not to make advancement to one child and forget the claims of another, or as a court of equity which will not neglect an absent distributee, but bring all the interested parties before the court. The State of Virginia is not a party to the bill. I ask this committee now to issue its summons and bring Virginia before the House, and let her rights be protected.

[Mr. FULLER, of Maine, here made an inquiry which was entirely inaudible to the Reporter, but it was in reference to the necessity of removing Harrison's bar.]

Mr. MEADE. I am not in the habit of asserting as a fact what I do not know and cannot prove to be a fact. I can only give to this committee my belief upon this subject. It is my sincere and honest belief that the interests of the commerce of the country as much demands the removal of Harrison's bar, as it does the construction of any of those works for which appropriations are made in this bill, with the exception, probably, of the Mississippi and the Red river. I find appropriations for the Hudson river, for the benefit of a State which has expended $40,000,000 in internal improvements—a State which has constructed her canal from the Hudson to Lake Erie, at an expense of $15,000,000. The appropriation made to the Hudson is but a mite compared to the immense amounts which that State is expending every year in internal improvements. This is small game for the State of New York, when contrasted with the immense amount appropriated for the enlargement of the Erie canal. At Harrison's bar, vessels which do not draw more than fourteen or fifteen feet water, come to a dead halt until lighters from the city of Petersburg and Richmond come to their relief.

The committee can now truly estimate the importance which the removal of this bar is to the commerce of the James river. Gentlemen may ask me, if it is so important, why Virginia does not remove the bar by appropriation from her own means? Virginia, at this time, is engaged in immense works of internal improvement, and there is not so great and pressing a necessity for the removal of this bar as exists for constructing the great lines of communication to the West, to which Virginia is now devoting her energies.

Our citizens are taxed as heavily at this time as they can with convenience bear, for the purpose of shaking hands with their brethren of the great West. We expect at no distant day, perhaps not more than three years, to stretch our arms from James river to the Mississippi, and to invite to our ports a part of the trade of that great and magnificent valley. The committee will see at once why the State of Virginia prefers to appropriate all its means at this time to the important improvements of which I have spoken. Persons engaged in shipping in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, and other sections of the country, are directly interested in having this obstruction in James river removed, so that their vessels can have free navigation to our cities. City Point, which is at the confluence of James and Appomattox rivers, is but ten miles from the city of Petersburg, with which it is connected by a railroad. From the city of Richmond it is forty-five miles distant. That point is the entrepôt, as it were, for both places.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have not taken the floor for the purpose of making an hour's speech.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to suggest to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that he will allow me to make a motion that the committee rise, so that I may offer a resolution in the House, closing debate upon this bill at twelve o'clock tomorrow. We can agree to have a recess from five to seven o'clock this evening, and go on and discuss this bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot yield the floor for any such purpose. I was disposed to oppose the proposition, when first suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I trust that the gentleman is in favor of limiting the debate to some reasonable time.

Mr. MARSHALL. I think myself that debate upon this bill ought not to be limited, so long as any gentleman desires to speak. My opinion is very decided, that upon a bill so important as this, there are a great many amendments wanted; and representing the section of country that I do, I shall vote for this bill with a great deal of hesitancy, if I vote for it at all. I find in this bill that the State of New York—

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish that the gentleman would allow me to put myself right. I did not wish to prevent the gentleman from offering any reasonable amendment. I humbly submit that we should limit debate to some hour to-morrow—say twelve o'clock.

Mr. MARSHALL addressed the committee for a short time, in favor of river and harbor improvements, but without concluding, yielded the floor to—

Mr. YATES, who moved that the committee rise.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman [Mr. OLDS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 282, making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

HOSTILITIES ON THE FRONTIER.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House now to call up the bill to which I alluded this morning, for the protection of the frontiers.

[Cries of "Too late!"]

Mr. DUNCAN. I object, and move that we do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SESSION.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope I shall have the consent of the House to call up the resolution proposing to fix the day for adjournment, and I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DUNCAN] to withdraw the motion to adjourn for that purpose.

Mr. DUNCAN. Has that resolution passed the Senate?

Mr. HOUSTON. It has, and I desire now to call it up.

Mr. DUNCAN. We can do that another day as well as to-day. I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned till to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. SKELTON: Petition of citizens of New Jersey in favor of Mr. Stanley's bill making appropriations for the assistance of the Colonization Society.

By Mr. SMITH: Petition of Noble A. Penland praying Congress to allow him a pension for services in the last war.

Also, documents in relation to the claim of Edward J. Jackson, praying indemnity for a mule stolen by the Indians in the winter of 1851; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Commander Thomas R. Gedney, United States Navy, asking to be reimbursed certain payments made by him in 1846-'7, on account of expenses of the coast survey; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of voters of Cardington, Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of Samuel Brenton, asking that a claim allowed to T. A. H. Edwards, and erroneously paid to James McKay, may be investigated, and relief afforded to the lawful owners of said claim; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a petition of citizens of Blair county, Pennsylvania, praying that the bill providing for the payment of the fourth installment of the deposits of the public lands directed to be made with the States by the act of June 23d, 1836, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLEMENS presented the memorial of Rosa W. Inge, praying the continuation of the pension allowed her for the services of her late husband, Lieutenant Z. M. P. Inge; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of Erskine & Eichelberger, praying the payment of the amount of a debt due them, which was contracted by John Gunter, jun., a Cherokee Indian, prior to the Cherokee treaty, of December 29, 1835; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution of the Senate to print one thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of War, of the 15th of June, containing a reconnaissance of the Gulf of California and the Colorado river, by Lieutenant Derby, reported in favor of printing the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Hannah Thompson, praying that the pension she now receives may be continued for life, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, as the committee propose to report a general bill which will include her case; which was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF COAST SURVEY.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate what sums will be required, without interfering with the regular progress of the coast survey, to extend it to the present fiscal year so as to include the islands in the vicinity of the Santa Barbara channel, coast of California, viz: the Islands of Santa Cruz, Santa Rosa, San Bernardo, Anacapa, Santa Catalina, Santa Clemente, San Nicholas, and Santa Barbara; and also to report whether the usual land surveys, dividing the islands into townships, sections, half sections, quarter sections, and eighth sections, could not at the same time be made by the officers of the coast survey, under the direction of the Superintendent.

ADDITIONAL SCHOOL LANDS.

On the motion of Mr. BORLAND, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill allowing exchanges of, and granting additional school lands in the several States which contain public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the bill is read, in order that our action may be facilitated upon it, I will state to the Senate that a portion of this bill—the first section—has already been provided for by a bill which was passed the other day, on the motion of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. MAILLORE], allowing an exchange of the sixteenth section, if it should be found to be of inferior quality. This bill contains three sections—the first section, which relates altogether to the exchange of the sixteenth section, if inferior, for another section of good land, becomes unnecessary in consequence of the bill which was passed the other day. As the passage of that bill took place since this bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, I have to propose some verbal amendments to the second and third sections.

The PRESIDENT. Let the bill be read, and then the Senator from Arkansas can offer his amendments.

The bill was read accordingly. It consists of three sections, the first of which provides that where the sixteenth section heretofore set apart for the use of schools in each of the several States which contain public land, has been or shall be found of an inferior quality, unfit for cultivation, or unfavorably located, the inhabitants of each township, under the authority of said States, shall be at liberty to relinquish the said sixteenth section, and to select in lieu thereof any other section, either as a whole section, or in any legal subdivisions, within the same township that may remain subject to sale by private entry; or should none such remain in the same township, then the selection may be made in each case from any land within the limits of the State subject to sale by private entry, to be entered and recorded at the proper land office of the district in which the selected land may lie, and a proper conveyance made therefor, in the usual form, under the authority of the United States; and upon the approval, by the Secretary of the Treasury, of the new selection, under the authority of this act, the original tract shall ipso facto revert to and become public lands of the United States.

The second section provides that there shall be selected, in the manner set forth in the preceding section, an additional section of land, either as a whole section, or in any legal subdivisions, for each township within the said States, and under their authority, which section is granted by this bill for the use of schools within such township, and shall be recorded and conveyed as before stated.

And the third section provides that the land authorized to be selected and granted by the first and second sections of, or by any preceding acts for similar purposes, or any part of the same, may be, by the proper authorities, disposed of in accordance with the laws now in force in relation to such lands in each of the States, respectively.

Mr. BORLAND. I propose, for reasons which I stated just now, to amend the bill by striking out of the first section all after the enacting clause, and inserting the second section as I propose to modify it.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition to modify the second section will be a separate question. The question must first be on striking out of the first section all after the enacting clause.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I now move to amend the second section of the bill, which becomes the first, by adding after the word "selected," in the second line, what I send to the Chair.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "selected," in the second line, insert: Either as a whole section, or in any legal subdivisions, within the same township that may remain subject to sale by private entry; or should none such remain in the same township, then the selection may be made in each case from any land within the limits of the State, subject to sale by private entry, to be entered and recorded at the proper land office of the district in which the selected land may lie, and a proper conveyance made therefor in the usual form, under the authority of the United States; and upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the new selection under authority of this act, the original tract shall, ipso facto, revert to and become public lands of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I now move to strike out, after the amendment just adopted, the words "in the manner set forth in the preceding section," these words being unnecessary, as there is no preceding section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I propose to make a corresponding amendment in what was the third section of the bill, but which is now the second. It is to strike out the words "and second." This is merely a verbal amendment, and is necessary to make the bill consistent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. The word "sections," in the same section, is in the plural number. It should be in the singular. I move to strike out the "s."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I will inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether this bill proposes to give any additional sections to the new States for common school purposes?

Mr. BORLAND. I will answer the question of the Senator from Georgia. Some two years ago this bill passed the Senate in a form similar to that in which it has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands; but it did not pass the House of Representatives for want of time; it could not be got up for consideration. It has been recently reported by the Committee on Public Lands; but the first section, granting the power to exchange inferior sixteenth sections for good lands, has been rendered unnecessary by the general bill passed a few days since, and has, in consequence, been stricken out. The second section, which has now become the first section, grants a section in addition to the sixteenth section already granted to the new States.

I will not now enter into an explanation of the reasons which make such a grant necessary and proper to carry out the object which Congress had in view in making the original grant of one section in each township in the new States. I suppose that the Senate is satisfied on that point, as to the propriety and policy, and justice of the measure—the necessity, indeed, if we desire to carry out the original object which Congress had in view in making these grants, which was to set apart such a quantity of land in each township in the new States, as would suffice for the establishment of a common school in the township.

I will also state, that this additional section has been granted to Oregon and California, and this bill simply proposes to put the other States on the same footing with regard to the public lands donated for schools.

Mr. DAWSON. Then, as I understand the proposition, it is to double the quantity of land which has been already granted to the various new States for school purposes. That is what I understand to be the fact. Now, sir, I do not desire to enter into a discussion upon this subject. I merely present it as another evidence of the large claims which the new States are making upon the old States. From the foundation of the Government, or rather from the time that we have admitted new States into the Union, one section in each township has been allowed for school purposes.

Now, because Oregon and California, for certain reasons, have been allowed an extension of this particular kind of grants of land, all the land States are claiming, in the first place, to have all the lands which they have heretofore received from the Government for school purposes, and which are found not to be worth a dollar and a quarter per acre, returned to the United States, and the township permitted to take the very best lands lying within the township for school purposes, to supply the place of the sixteenth section; and added to that, after we have given them lands as good as can be found in the township, we are to double the amount to all the new States, from Ohio down to the last State admitted. I merely present this statement to show the immense quantity of public land which we are now appropriating to the new States; first for purposes of internal improvement, and then for purposes of education, and I beg Senators from the new States to observe that I am not going to oppose this amendment. They claim land, and whenever the claim is made, we concede to them the amount of land which they desire.

This bill proposes to double the amount already given; and all I have to ask is, that whenever the question of the right of the old thirteen States shall come up, and they ask some portion of the land, they shall be respected. I can see no want of constitutionality in an honest and equal distribution of the public lands among the States, either in kind or in a division of the proceeds. I see no ground left for the new States to charge the old States with a want of liberality, and I beg them seriously to take into consideration the bill which is called Bennett's bill, for dividing a small portion of the public lands among the old States which have been worn out in the production of the means of sustaining a large population and raising men to manhood, and after exhausting the soil, has sent them off into new lands, there to "flourish like a green bay tree," not merely by the force and effect of their own labor, but by the kindness, indulgence, and liberality of the Government of the United States. Now, as the parents of these new States have become old, infirm, and exhausted, will they who have gone from our midst claim everything, and deny to us simple justice? Can you turn round and bring us back to the old question of the unconstitutionality of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, or its division in kind? I trust, Mr. President, that will not be done. Whenever a proposition of this kind is brought before the Senate I can see, Mr. President, by your own expression of countenance, that it is not likely to injure the State of Alabama. This will not injure any of the new States. You are benefited by it. And though the general wealth throughout the country is superior to that of my own State, and though you have the means of sustaining internal improvements, and educating your children far superior to ours, yet you call upon us to contribute funds for that educational purpose. And when we ask you to aid those who are so impoverished in the old States as to be without the means of the education of their children, and to give them some portion of this fund, you pronounce it unconstitutional. Here is a time for reflection, a time for us all to consider, and for the people throughout these United States to take this great question into their own hands and manage it. I have ceased to make any opposition to these schemes of the new States. I know they will all succeed until they carry all their requisitions upon the Government to such an extravagant extent as to create an excitement among the people. And, in order to prevent that, I beg to present this as a sound argument in favor of Bennett's bill.

Mr. BORLAND. As I said, I do not wish to enter into an argument respecting the merits of this bill. I have been under the impression until this morning that it meets with the approval of the Senate, and will meet with the approval of the country; and I am glad that the Senator from Georgia has expressed his intention not to oppose it. When the Bennett bill, to which that Senator has alluded, comes up, it will be soon enough to discuss its provisions. If that bill has merits, its friends will then set them forth; if not, they will allow it to take its chance. As the Senator admits the merits of the present bill, and no one is disposed seriously to question its provisions, it will, I trust, be voted on without occupying the time of the Senate by any further discussion.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not wish to be misunderstood by the Senator from Arkansas placing me in a position that I did not advance. I did not oppose the bill, because it would be useless to do so, but I would advocate it if it extended a similar meed of justice to all the States, and would put it out of the power of the new States to deny henceforth the claims of the old States whenever they may come up for consideration.

I make no opposition to the bill, for the reasons I have just stated. That is the ground upon which I put it.

The bill as amended was reported to the Senate, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SAULT STE. MARIE.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, in said State, which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment.

Mr. FELCH. I gave notice the other day that when this bill should be called up, I should propose an amendment in the form of a substitute for it. The bill provides for a grant of land for the purpose of constructing the canal. The amendment which I shall offer proposes to construct it as a public work by the United States, and to have the use of money instead of land. As the object of the bill is somewhat changed, and the amendment which I propose is a substitute for it, it may not be necessary to read the original bill until we act on the substitute. Unless some Senator wishes to have the bill read, I move to suspend the reading of it, and propose, as an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to contract with the lowest bidder or bidders, after public notice given in the usual manner for letting contracts, for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, in the State of Michigan; which canal shall be not less than one hundred feet wide and twelve feet deep, with single locks not less than three hundred and fifty feet long and seventy-five feet wide, with such piers and other appendances as shall, in the opinion of said Secretary, be required for the safe and proper use of said canal: Provided, That said Secretary may enter into separate contracts for such different portions of the work, in constructing said canal as he shall deem conducive to the public interest, and the aggregate amount of all said contracts shall not exceed $400,000, which shall be paid to the contractor or contractors as the work progresses, reserving always a sum equal to twenty per centum on the amount of work performed until the whole be completed: And provided further, That the contractor or contractors shall perform the work under such instructions and superintendence as the said Secretary shall deem necessary and proper to secure the faithful execution of the contracts, and shall give such ample security for the performance thereof as he shall direct and approve: And provided further, That such contractor or contractors shall have the right of taking from any of the lands of the United States stone and other materials for the construction of said canal and its appurtenances.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on the subject of this bill, and I will detain the Senate but a little while, for I believe it is pretty well understood. The Senate are aware of the relative position of the great lakes of our continent; that they constitute three plateaus; the principal one—Lake Superior—having an elevation of six hundred feet above the ocean; the second plateau, including Lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan—I call them one, for, though they are not strictly on a level, yet there is a permanent water communication between them—and Lake Ontario. Between the last and Lake Erie there is a difference of about three hundred and fifty feet. That is now overcome by the Welland canal, a work constructed on the British side, by the British Government, by means of which the upper and lower lakes, except Lake Superior, are now in communication, for the purpose of navigation. Between the middle plateau and Lake Superior are falls of about thirty, or, perhaps, thirty-five feet, including the rapids, leaving, however, the fall of St. Mary. We desire to overcome, by this communication, the falls of about thirty feet. The consequence of this want of communication is, that between Lake Superior and Lake Huron there is no transit of articles going up and down. The communication must stop, and a different class of vessels must be provided for on the upper lake. It is, as the Senate may well see, a very great interruption, and a very great expense to the navigation, that the business of the upper and lower lakes have to encounter.

Here is an extent of water of nearly fifteen hundred miles, and a coast of nearly five thousand miles, including these five great lakes, covering a superficies of nearly eighty thousand miles, one of the most magnificent regions in the world. With Lake Superior we are just beginning to be well acquainted. Until lately it was supposed that the land was not worth anything. It is now ascertained that it affords a valuable means of agriculture, besides being one of the richest mineral districts in the world. I presume all the members of the Senate have looked over Whitney & Foster's report. From it they will see that the copper and iron are inexhaustible treasures, enough to supply the whole world. Copper is found there in native masses in prodigious sizes, unknown everywhere else in the world; and the iron is found in such quantity as has never been found elsewhere; and there is enough of it to supply the whole world. The iron alone is a mineral treasure for any country; and what will perhaps surprise some gentlemen, they will see by referring to that report—and many Senators know that the iron is perhaps richer than any other in the world—that one ton and a half of ore gives one ton of bloom iron. It is among the richest mineral treasures we have. That region is growing to be vastly important. The United States own upon it, I have ascertained from the Land Office, twenty millions of acres of land, and the communication between which and the ocean must be by Lake Superior. They own in the upper peninsula of Michigan ten millions of acres; of which have been sold short of two hundred thousand acres, and been granted for school purposes short of three hundred thousand acres, leaving within that upper peninsula, now the property of the United States, among the richest mineral districts in the world, nearly ten millions of acres.

Now, Mr. President, no gentleman here will deny the expediency, almost the necessity, of having a canal, to overcome these disadvantages, of only three quarters of a mile, and only a fall of twenty-five feet. As to any constitutional difficulty, there is none whatever. Every foot of this proposed canal is to be over the public lands. The United States have nothing to do but dig the canal through their own land, without asking the permission of anybody; without interfering with or interrupting the State government in any respect, and the work is done. Now, sir, as to improving the value of our own land, there is no man in the world, knowing the district, knowing the region above, but would consider it a good speculation to construct a work of this nature, with a view to enhance his own property. But there are other and still more important considerations which should influence us in this matter. In a military point of view, there can be nothing more important for this country, looking to the future, than the construction of such a canal. In the event of a difficulty with Great Britain, the first thing we should have to do would be to construct a military marine upon the three middle lakes, and another upon Lake Superior. You cannot carry your marine from one lake into another; but if this canal were constructed, the marine which you have upon the middle lakes, would answer the same purpose upon all. It was so felt during the Oregon difficulty. At the time we feared a rupture with England, Mr. Polk's administration, to my own knowledge, were on the point of proposing to Congress to construct the canal with this view, and were only prevented from taking that measure by an amicable adjustment of the difficulties then pending with the British Government, rendering the work unnecessary.

The Senate will perceive at once the bearing of this subject upon our military operations hereafter. Lake Superior is too important to be neglected. It will be as important in a few years as the coast of any other lake; and the difficulties with that country which may come—as difficulties may come between all countries—and which prudent men ought to foresee will compel us to build a marine there, one single ship of which would build the canal which we now ask, and enable us to transport the marine up and down, backwards and forwards, as may be wanted on the middle or upper lakes. As a mere measure of military precaution, therefore, it is worth more than all it will cost. You must have the sailors there also—you must have the whole expense on all the lakes, when one would answer equally for the whole, with this canal. As an important matter of commerce, as a matter of expediency connected with the navigation and business of the country, few measures can be more important. There are few gentlemen who are aware of the importance of the navigation on the lakes. Our commerce is now not less than $200,000,000 upon them, and our navigation very little, if any, less than 200,000 tons. However startling these amounts may be, yet the tables submitted to the Senate will show the fact. There is an amount of commerce well worth the fostering care of the Government, so far as we can exercise it within our constitutional limits.

A few years ago the State of Michigan passed a law, made the necessary arrangements, and was going on of itself, to build this canal; but it was prevented, very foolishly, very unwisely, without any just motive, in my opinion, by the General Government from doing it. I am now authorized to say, that if you will give permission to a company of individuals to make that canal through your land, they will do it without asking a cent from the Government. But this, the Government does not want. The State government does not want it. The country upon the upper lakes does not want it. They do not want to pay the heavy tolls necessary, if it is held as a matter of profit in the hands of individuals. Still further, let me tell you, that I ascertained from the last paper received from Lake Superior, that a party are now on the opposite side of the Sault, by order of the Canadian Government, with a view to the construction of that canal, as they have constructed the Welland Canal around the Falls of Niagara. That would not answer our purpose at all. What we want is a canal of our own within our own territory to answer the necessary purposes required both in peace and in war. The President of the United States, in his message, I think of the session before the last, on a review of the whole subject, expressly recommended this measure to the consideration and favorable action of Congress. He had seen its important bearing upon the upper country, with a view not only to their interests, but to the interests of the whole United States, and he recommended to Congress to pass a law with that view.

Mr. President, I have a memorandum of a number of subjects to which I might call attention, but time is short. There are gentlemen here, perhaps, who can state to the Senate more accurately than I can the amount of iron ore which has been already transported. But allow me to read a single paragraph from a paper which I received this morning, from the Sault Ste. Marie, which will show the progress of improvement in that region:

"The Iron Mountain and Lake Superior Railroad Company are putting up a large office at the lake terminus of the road; and they have located their depot and most part of the line of the road. We learn from Mr. Ely, superintendent, that the route is quite as favorable as was expected. The grade, though steep, will be easily overcome, especially as there will be but little freight to take up from the lake. The road will run for some distance near the bank of the lake, and accommodate every one."

Here is a road now actually laid out, and in process of construction, to accommodate the iron works, which is to run from Lake Superior across the whole peninsula, to Lake Michigan, entirely by private enterprise, the product of which is to go by way of the Sault Ste. Marie.

"This is a project of immense importance to the iron interests of this lake, and, in fact, to the whole Northwest. With this road, five thousand tons of iron can be shipped as easily, in the same time as five hundred tons have been this season; and with a ship-canal at the Sault, five hundred thousand will be a limit of yearly shipment as easily accomplished. Does any one think this is a steep estimate? Let him look at the steep and high iron mountains, worth more by the pound than common pig metal; let him look at the almost limitless demand growing up at the great West, and consider these facilities for procuring here a supply, and he will be satisfied with our estimate."

"This road is but the beginning of a more extended route from this place to Bay de Noquet, on Lake Michigan, which will make a direct southern outlet for some of the iron from this region, as well as an inlet for the supplies needed to carry forward extensively the iron business."

The amendment proposed by my colleague, instead of containing the provision made by the original bill, which appropriated land, and which intended to confer upon the State authority with a view that the work might go on by the authority of the Legislature, proposed that Congress shall do the work like any other public work, rendered necessary by the circumstances of the case. An amount of land might be given that would make the canal; but it would take a long time; and, in the fluctuations now attending our land system, not knowing, from day to day, what measure Congress may adopt, men competent to construct such a work would be fearful about taking land for compensation. The matter remains altogether so uncertain, that it is difficult to tell what amount would be necessary, or whether any reasonable amount would be sufficient now to induce them to go on. In these circumstances, we propose that the United States shall take hold of the work, and make it as they would any other improvement; and I trust that such will be the decision of the Senate.

Mr. DAWSON. I will ask the Senator who reported the bill, whether there has been any survey made, or estimate presented as to the cost of construction of this canal?

Mr. FELCH. There have been two surveys made for this work. One was made, in the first instance, under the authority of the State of Michigan, in 1836, I believe. Subsequently to that time, the attention of the Department was called to the subject, and they directed another survey to be made under the authority of, and by the officers connected with, the Topographical Bureau; and a report was presented, exhibiting the whole country, with a map of it, giving the distances with an estimate of the expense. The estimate is given in detail. The total amount of expense is $454,107 66. This provides, however, for a canal with double locks, the estimate for which was based upon the length and size of the steamer Michigan, which was then the only steamer upon the lakes belonging to the Government. That was a small iron vessel, one hundred and sixty-seven feet long. The dimensions for the canal were, one hundred feet wide, and twelve feet deep; for the locks, two hundred feet long, and fifty feet wide.

Since that time, the commerce of that country has very much increased, and the dimensions of the canal, as provided in the amendment, are larger than those provided for in the estimate. In other words, we have, in the amendment, provided for a canal which shall accommodate the steamers now plying upon the lakes—supposing that they will be large enough for future use. The size of the locks, then, is larger than that provided for in the estimate; but the estimate provided for double locks, while the amendment provides for single locks. The probability is, that the expense of making the work which we have provided for in this amendment will be not very far from that which was the subject of the estimate by the Department. I believe this answers the inquiries of the Senator.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, this is another of those internal improvements that I suppose come within the Baltimore platform. It seems, from the argument of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] that it is necessary for the public defense, for the purpose of increasing and protecting the commerce of the country; and he says further, that it is necessary for the purpose of increasing the value of the public lands, which, I suppose, makes it all very justifiable! I do not pretend to enter into the discussion of the question of internal improvements on this bill. All that I require is, that the Senator who reported it shall call upon the proper Department to have an estimate made of the cost of the construction of the canal, founded upon the data presented in the bill, and ascertain how much money we are about to appropriate for the improvement.

I admire very much this manner of introducing a bill for internal improvements, putting it upon its own independent footing, and not in connection with other propositions, merely for the purpose of gaining strength to carry it through. It is certainly a very honorable position to place it in; and I must ask of the Senator to be so kind as to bring it within one of my principles. In passing bills making appropriations for internal improvements, I always desire an estimate to come from the Department, as to the probable cost. Then I will take into consideration the propriety and practicability of the improvement, and vote in regard to it, according to my convictions. But here, sir, there seems to have been two surveys—one made by individuals, for their own individual enterprise, or intended enterprise—none authorized by the Government of the United States, save through the head of a Department. Was it by Congress that they were called upon to make that estimate? or did the Department itself call the attention of the engineers to it?

Mr. CASS. The Department makes almost all of these estimates. Not one case in ten arises from a resolution of Congress: not one in twenty; perhaps not one in fifty.

Mr. DAWSON. As we are taking the matter into consideration ourselves, to declare whether the improvement ought to be made, let us have it submitted to the Department, and let the estimate be made by our authority. I do not recollect who was Secretary of War at the time the order was given for the survey to ascertain what the canal would cost the Government. Will the Senator from Michigan be kind enough to inform me in what manner it was made?

Mr. FELCH. The report of the Topographical Bureau was called for by a resolution of the Senate, and was presented to the body, in reply to that resolution, in 1844.

Mr. DAWSON. The report made by the Topographical Engineers was called for, I know, by a resolution of the Senate; but a resolution was never passed by this body authorizing a report to be made, according to my recollection of the matter. I know the report was called for; but I want to know when the Secretary of War instructed the engineers to make the survey. What is the date of the engineer's report?

Mr. CASS. If the honorable Senator would be good enough to recur back to the register, he would find who was Secretary of War at the time. My colleague, I believe, said that the date of the report was 1844.

Mr. DAWSON. That is the time the report was communicated to us; but how long was the officer engaged in making the report?

Mr. CASS. Perhaps one day.

Mr. DAWSON. What I wanted to show was, that the report had been made for a number of years; called for by the Department, and not by the authority of Congress. I wished to show to the Senate that the number of years past and gone since the examinations upon which that report was based, cannot be less than twelve or fourteen. As it is now proposed to increase the dimensions of the canal over what was then proposed, it is proper that we should have a new estimate presented.

The amendment of the Senator from Michigan is already before the Senate for consideration. I presume it will take but a short time to submit the provisions of that amendment to the Topographical Bureau, and have an estimate made, and let it be presented here; then we shall know upon what to base our action; we shall have no bad foundation, by which other appropriations may be based upon this for other internal improvements. I also like to require estimates in every case before passing upon an internal improvement bill. That is my object and design in this case.

Mr. CASS. I would ask the honorable Senator if he intends to vote for the bill, if he gets the report which he desires?

Mr. DAWSON. I think it very probable; if the canal would increase our commerce and protect our frontier as a military improvement—thus bringing it within either of the platforms—the Democratic or the Whig.

Mr. CASS. Which will the gentleman take for himself?

Mr. DAWSON. I will take both. [Laughter.] Your platform is certainly much weaker than ours on that point; and therefore I certainly cannot fail to take yours by accepting our own.

Mr. FELCH. It seems to me that there can be very little object in taking the course proposed by the Senator from Georgia. The amount provided for by the amendment is less than the estimate of the Department. That estimate was for $454,000. The provision in the amendment which I have offered is, that the Secretary of War shall receive proposals for the construction of the canal, accepting of course the lowest bid. He may receive a bid for the whole or any portion of the work. The whole cost, however, is not to exceed $400,000. Unless a contract can be made for the amount of $400,000, of course no legislation which we may have here on the subject can go into effect.

In regard to the amount, the Representatives of Michigan felt an interest in providing, in the first place, for an amount which would be sufficient to construct the work; for it is true that although it is a work of a good deal of magnitude, yet it is of that character that if money is appropriated, in this manner, a single season will, I believe, be sufficient to open the communication between the lakes lying below Lake Superior. We desired, therefore, to fix upon such a sum as would be sufficient, in the first place, to insure the making of contracts for the execution of the work; and in the second place, which would not be an extravagant expenditure of money for the construction of the work. We were, therefore, satisfied, on consultation, with the amount proposed—and I can assure the Senator that the consultation has not been confined either to members of the Senate, or to individuals outside, but included those at the Department who were conversant with the matter, who have aided us in fixing on the amount necessary to secure the construction of this work at a very low expense.

Now, it is very true, as my colleague said, that there are men outside of this Chamber—moneyed men in this country—men interested in the country bordering on Lake Superior—who would at once take hold of and construct the work, if the Government would permit them to do so. We have resisted all application of that kind, because we thought it was a work of so much public importance, that acting, to a certain extent, for the public interests, we ought not to suffer it to pass into the hands of individuals, and thereby give them the control of the navigation of the upper and lower lakes.

The amount fixed in the amendment, $400,000, with the explanation I have given, will, I think, be sufficient; and I see no necessity of sending to the Department for the purpose. This is a less sum than the Department estimated for in 1844. Although the work will be increased as regards the magnitude of the locks, it is a less sum; and yet I have no hesitation in saying that, for the amount specified here, we can at once have contracts entered into for the construction of the work. If it can be done for less, of course the whole amount proposed to be appropriated will not be expended. The matter will be open to the competition of every person who may see fit to enter into it.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not wish to prolong this debate; but I will very candidly state to the honorable Senator what my object was. If this canal is needed for the public defense, then the bill ought properly to have been investigated before the Committee on Military Affairs. If it is intended for the purpose of encouraging our commerce, it ought to have been referred to the Committee on Commerce. But, as it comes from the Committee on Public Lands, it can only be considered as an improvement for the purpose of increasing the value of the public lands. Have the Military Committee asked for the appropriation of this money for the public defense? Have the Committee on Commerce ever presented a report to this body, asking for an improvement of this kind, for the purpose of encouraging the commerce of the country? Then it comes down at last to one of the arguments of my distinguished friend from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] that it is to increase the value of the public lands. And then the question necessarily arises whether we should appropriate this amount in money, for the purpose of improving the value of the public lands in this way.

The Senator from Michigan stated that not many years ago a late President of the United States, when we were in danger of a foreign war, had it seriously under consideration to present the subject to Congress as a means of increasing our public defenses. But that apprehension passed off, and he did not do so. He thereby showed his good judgment and good sense, and his unwillingness to involve the Government in an appropriation of money which the emergencies of the time did not require. Yet, now, when we are in a state of profound peace—when there is no war-cloud lowering—when there is no apprehension felt, we are called upon to make this appropriation. In the same way I might speak of the appropriation in reference to the commerce of the country. Then the question is: Is it politic, merely for the purpose of improving the value of the public lands, to make this appropriation? I wanted to get to that point, and to show to the Senate that we are legislating now for the defenses of the country, and for the encouragement of commerce, through the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CASS. I do not intend to follow the honorable Senator from Georgia through this discussion. We have pursued that race long enough, and I am not going to say another word about it. But I cannot help noticing one most extraordinary doctrine which he has advanced, which is, that if a standing committee of this body report a proposition, we here have no right to take into consideration any other question than the simple one that may have been before the committee.

Mr. DAWSON. I did not say you had not the right to do it, but that it is unusual.

Mr. CASS. Unusual! Why, Mr. President, I take it that if a measure is before this body and a Senator is compelled to vote upon it, it is his duty to look to all the circumstances connected with it. A measure is presented; it is referred to a committee; the committee make a report giving their views; and then when it comes before the Senate, it is every Senator's duty to look into the whole circumstances connected with it. There are propositions which come before us every session which involve considerations that are frequently not adverted to by the committee which report them. Very frequently occasions arise where questions involve different interests, and it is difficult to know to which committee to refer them; but because they are referred to one of the committees, does it, therefore, follow that we are to lose sight of all the considerations which might recommend their reference to another committee? Such a doctrine will not do for a moment. You might as well shut your eyes to these questions at once.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I shall vote with a great deal of pleasure for the bill before the Senate. It comes from a committee of which I am a member, and I would ask my friend from Georgia whether, when a subject is referred to a committee by the Senate, it is not the appropriate duty of that committee to report upon it. It was by the action of the Senate that this subject was sent to the Committee on Public Lands. The action of the Senate, therefore, superinduced the duty, on the part of that committee, of making such a report as they believed proper in regard to it.

This is a national work of internal improvement, and the amendment of my friend from Michigan, instead of going in a roundabout way to do what is to be done, proposes to appropriate out of the public Treasury the public money to do it. It recognizes the old doctrine—in favor of which I have always been—in the power of the General Government to appropriate the public money for works of national importance. I rose more particularly, however, to suggest that it is all-important, as it seems to me, that we should pass this bill at this time, not only for the reasons assigned by my honorable friends from Michigan, but for another reason—that, if it is not passed now, it may be possible, looking to the future, that we may have at the head of this Government some one who would prevent its going into effect, even if it were passed.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia inquired whether this bill had received the sanction of any of the committees of this body, except the Public Lands Committee. He asked why it was not referred to the Committee on Commerce. I wish merely to state, that it has been referred to the Committee on Commerce. They have given their sanction to the bill in a report here. It was then referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That committee have given their sanction to it, and their report provided for the execution of the work by a grant of land, which was the scope of their authority. It has received the sanction of the War Department, as is indicated by the report to which reference has already been made. The President of the United States, also, gave it his sanction in his message to Congress, which was alluded to by my colleague.

Mr. SMITH occupied the attention of the Senate for some time, in favor of the proposed canal, showing its importance, and the great importance of the region of country it would open to market. He also commented upon the mineral resources of that region, and their great value to the country. [For his remarks see Appendix.]

Mr. MASON. It is not contemplated, I suppose, that we shall take a vote upon this bill to-day.

Several SENATORS. "Oh, no!" "Oh, no!"

Mr. CLARKE. There will be no vote taken on this bill to-day, and I therefore move to postpone its further consideration till to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Mr. CLARKE. I now ask the favor of the Senate to allow me to call up a resolution which I offered yesterday, for the purpose of disposing of it. It will not occupy one moment. It is a resolution in relation to a call for papers from the Department of the Interior.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the reasons for the recall of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham, from his position as chief astronomer of the Boundary Commission, employed in determining the line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico; together with all the papers connected with his appointment, the revocation of that appointment, and the instructions given to him. Also, that the Secretary of the Interior be further directed to report to the Senate any instructions given or sent to Andrew B. Gray, relating to the initial point upon the Rio Grande, agreed upon by the commission, and the reasons for the removal of the said Andrew B. Gray from his position as surveyor upon the part of the United States upon the said Boundary Commission.

Mr. CLARKE. I move to lay the resolution on the table; and, in doing so, I merely wish to say that, since the introduction of that resolution, I have ascertained that all the papers which I designed to call for by that motion, were included in a similar resolution, offered by the Senator from California some time ago. To call for them again would be a work of supererogation, and I therefore move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN. The unfinished business of yesterday is a bill to "authorize the payment by the 'surveyor general of California for the survey of 'any claims which have been, or may be presented 'to the board of land commissioners for adjudication under the act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1851, to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California."

I believe that is the next business in order to-day; but, as it is now late, and as it is desirable that we should have a short Executive session, I will simply remark, that if it leads to any further discussion, I will move its postponement. I think, however, that we can take a vote upon it to-day, and I hope it may be taken up and disposed of. I move that that bill be taken up.

Several SENATORS. No, no; it's too late; adjourn.

Mr. GWIN. If gentlemen are indisposed to take up the bill, I will withdraw the motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 22, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill No. 284, "to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads passing through the public lands of the United States."

Mr. CLARK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up and have passed Senate bill No. 316, which is now upon the Speaker's table. It is a bill entirely of a local character, and the interests of the citizens concerned in it demand that it shall be passed. I believe that if the House will hear the bill read, there will not be a dissenting voice to its passage.

Mr. DUNCAN. Will the gentleman state what is the object of the bill he refers to?

Mr. CLARK. The object of the bill is merely to relinquish to the town of Bellevue, in the State of Iowa, a certain narrow strip of land bordering the Mississippi river. It is formed, in part, by accretions, and I suppose it does not amount to more than three or four acres altogether. The object of relinquishing it is to enable the corporate authorities to erect warehouses and wharves. Nobody is interested in it except the citizens of the place. If gentlemen will hear the bill read, I am sure they will permit it to pass.

Mr. AVERETT. Has the bill been referred to any committee of this House?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. AVERETT. Then I object to its being taken up.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. The people of the town are waiting the passage of this bill in order to build warehouses and wharves, which the commercial interests of the place absolutely require.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia withdraw his objection?

Mr. AVERETT. I do not.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 358, for the purpose of having it referred. It is a bill "directing a survey and estimate of the cost of constructing a canal basin at the terminus of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal at Georgetown."

There being no objection, the bill was taken up, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a bill "for the protection and settlement of the eastern frontier of California," for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Has previous notice been given?

Mr. FLORENCE. No, sir; I have given no notice of it.

Mr. STANLY. Then, sir, I object.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I insist on the regular order of business.

RIGHT OF WAY TO PLANK AND RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is House bill No. 284, and the pending question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.]

The bill as amended and the substitute [published in yesterday's proceedings] were then read.

Mr. SMART called for the yeas and nays on the substitute, and asked for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. OLDS and DAVIS, of Indiana, were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported 23 in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the substitute; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 36, noes 81.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, several clerical errors in the bill were corrected.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was subsequently read the third time.

The question now being, Shall the bill pass?—

Mr. SMART called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. COBB, the title of the bill was amended, by inserting after the word "plank" the words "Macadamized turnpike."

CESSION OF CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I desire to renew the request which I made yesterday. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to cede to the State of Ohio the unfinished portion of the Cumberland road; the State authorities desire to finish it. If the bill is not taken up now, it cannot pass at this session.

Mr. BISSELL. What does the gentleman propose to do with the bill?

Mr. STANTON. I want the House to pass it.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I object.

Mr. STANTON. The State of Illinois got a bill passed just like this.

Mr. RANTOUL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. OLDS. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

[Cries of "Read the resolution!"]

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, so far as may be, in his opinion, be consistent with the public interest, all the information in his possession relative to the right of vessels of the United States to take fish within three miles of the coasts of the British North American Provinces, according to the uniform practice under the convention of 1818, and as to any order issued, or any cruisers dispatched, or fitting out by the Government of Great Britain, or by either of said Provinces, for the purpose of interrupting said fishery; and also what measures, if any, have been taken by the authority of the United States to protect such right of fishery.

Mr. OLDS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the House will proceed to the regular order of business.

Mr. OLDS. At the request of gentlemen around me I will withdraw the objection.

The resolution was then again read and adopted.

HOSTILITIES ON THE FRONTIERS.

Mr. OLDS. I ask for the regular order of business.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table the bill authorizing the Government to furnish arms to the citizens upon our frontiers.

Mr. OLDS. I cannot consent. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman hear what the bill is, and then object?

Mr. OLDS. But I shall be compelled to object to any other than the regular order of business.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope the House will allow me a word in explanation of the object of this bill. The House sometime ago passed a bill authorizing the Government to supply the citizens upon our frontiers with arms for their own protection. The bill was sent to the Senate, where it received a small amendment, authorizing the President, in certain cases, to call out the militia there for the protection of the frontier. With that amendment the bill is now returned to the House. The recent and the latest accounts show the greatest possible necessity for the passage of this bill, as the Indians and Mexicans upon the frontiers of Texas are committing the most horrible outrages, and there is the utmost necessity that this bill should be immediately passed. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take that bill from the Speaker's table, with a view of concurring in the slight amendment made by the Senate.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. HOWARD. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BISSELL. I am sure if any gentleman will read the latest accounts from the frontier of Texas, he will not object to the passage of the bill. I have no interest whatever myself in the matter, but the necessity of the case demands that the bill should be passed immediately. I think no gentleman objects.

Mr. STANTON. I objected; and I do not withdraw my objection.

SPRINGFIELD AND TERRE HAUTE RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of House bill No. 289, granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Indiana and Illinois to aid in the construction of a railroad from Springfield, Illinois, to Terre Haute, Indiana. The pending motion is to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I now withdraw the demand for the previous question, and also withdraw the motion to recommit; and in order to get a vote upon the merits of the bill, I move to put it upon its passage; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. STANLY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, and let the bill be postponed for a week or two, in order to see what the Senate may do with the land bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I would willingly do that, but I suppose the motion to postpone is not in order. I ask the Chair whether it is competent for me to move to postpone the further consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order during the pendency of the call for the previous question.

A MEMBER. Let the call for the previous question be withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS. I decline to withdraw the call.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I insist upon the motion to lay upon the table, and ask the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken, the result was—yeas 61, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Bartlett, John B. Boyd, Bragg, Caskey, Chastain, Cleveland, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dinwiddie, Duncan, Faulkner, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haswell, Hibbard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kurtz, Lecher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McQueen, Menzies, Milson, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Perkins, Reed, Robbins, Ross, Savage, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Venable, Wallace, Washburn, Wildrick, and Woodward—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Bissell, Bowne, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Bushy, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cullon, J. G. Davis, Doty, Eastman, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Goodenow, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Harper, Hart, Hebard, Hendricks, Henu, Howard, T. M. Howe, Jackson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Miller, Miner, Molony, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Penit, Penniman, Phelps, Polk, Rantoul, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Seary, David L. Seymour, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Townshend, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—78.

So the bill was not laid upon the table.

The question then recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. YATES demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. FOWLER and ASHE were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 63.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DOTY. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the proposition in the nature of an additional section?

Mr. DOTY. It is designed as an addition to the last section of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it in order to move to postpone the further consideration of the whole subject for two weeks?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move that the bill, with the proposed amendment, be postponed for two weeks.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask that the amendment may be read, so that we may have some knowledge of what we are acting upon.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

That to aid in the construction of the railroads hereinafter mentioned there shall be and hereby is granted to the States hereinafter named, respectively, all the rights, privileges, and liabilities conferred by the preceding sections of this act, on the States of Indiana and Illinois; and that public lands of the United States to the same extent, in proportion to the length of the road, on the same terms, limitations and restrictions in every respect shall be and hereby are granted to each of the said States hereinafter named, respectively, for the benefit of the road or roads described, viz:

To the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, for a railroad from Toledo, in Ohio, by Logansport and Lafayette, in Indiana, and by Peoria, in Illinois, to Burlington; from Cincinnati, in Ohio, by Vincennes, to St. Louis; and from Louisville, by Mount Carmel, on the nearest practicable route, to a point on said last-mentioned road, in Illinois.

To the States of Missouri and Arkansas, for a railroad from a point on the Mississippi river opposite Cairo, by Little Rock, to a point on the Texan boundary, in Arkansas, with branches from Little Rock to Fort Smith, and to a point on the Mississippi river, to be designated by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas.

To the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, for a railroad from New Orleans, by the way of Jackson and Canton, in Mississippi, thence to connect, by the nearest and best route, with the proposed Nashville and New Orleans railroad; from New Orleans, by Opelousas, to the Texas line; and from a point opposite to Vicksburg to Shreveport, and thence to the boundary of Texas.

To the States of Mississippi and Alabama, for a railroad from Brandon, in Mississippi, to Montgomery, in Alabama. To the State of Wisconsin, for a railroad from Chicago, by Woodstock, Janesville, and Fond du Lac, to Lake Superior; from Milwaukee, by La Crosse, on the Mississippi river, to the Falls of St. Anthony; and from Manitowoc, on Lake Michigan, by Stevens's Point, to the Falls of St. Croix, and thence to the Mississippi river, in the Territory of Minnesota, with a branch to Fond du Lac on Lake Superior.

To the State of Iowa, for railroads from Dubuque to Keokuck, and from Davenport, Dubuque, and Burlington, on the Mississippi river, upon the best and most direct routes to the Missouri river—the points of termination to be selected by the Legislature of the State of Iowa.

To the State of Michigan, for a railroad from Zilwaukee, on Saginaw river, by the head of Grand Traverse Bay, to Mackinaw; from Pontiac, to the mouth of Grand river; and from Port Huron, on the river St. Clair, across the Peninsula of Michigan, to Lake Michigan.

To the State of California, for a railroad from San Francisco to San José.

To the States of Alabama and Mississippi, for a railroad from Charleston, in South Carolina, to Memphis, on the Mississippi.

To the States of Indiana and Illinois, for a railroad from Lafayette, in Indiana, by Middleport, in Illinois, to La Salle county.

To the State of Florida, for a railroad and branch from a certain point near the Atlantic ocean, in Florida, across the said State, to a certain other point or points on the Gulf of Mexico, in said State; the said points, and the route of the said road and branch, to be designated by the authority of the said State; and also, to the States of Florida and Alabama, for a railroad from a certain point on Pensacola Bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in Alabama, (with a branch from the said road to a point at or near the terminus of the Girard and Mobile road, on the waters of Mobile Bay or Tensaw river, in the said State of Alabama,) the route of said road and branch to be designated by the authority of the said States, respectively.

To the State of Alabama, for the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad, leading from Selma to the Tennessee river, at or near Gunter's Landing.

Also, for the Winchester and Tennessee river railroad, leading from Winchester to the Tennessee river, at or near Deposit, in the State of Alabama.

And the routes of the said roads shall be on the most direct and feasible lines between the places named, and in all cases where the said routes, or either of them, are not now located and determined, the proper authority of each State, respectively, through which said roads, or parts thereof, run, or to which the preceding grants are made, shall determine the same. And all mineral lands, excepting those subject by law to private entry, are hereby expressly reserved to the United States from the lands hereby granted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The amendment, I think, is certainly not in order, for the reason that the bill under consideration is for a particular object, and this amendment is to introduce a general system applicable to other States in which the public lands lie, and the Chair will recollect that it has been held in this House uniformly, I believe, that a pension bill, for instance—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, (interrupting.) I must call the gentleman to order. He cannot debate the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is stating his point of order, and after the decision of the Chair is made, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] may appeal.

Mr. JONES. I was stating what had been the uniform practice of the House.

Mr. DOTY. I wish to remind the Chair of the decision the Chair made, in the case of the bill reported for a railroad in Wisconsin by the Committee on Public Lands, and referred to the Committee of the Whole. A gentleman from Kentucky was allowed, and decided by the Speaker to be in order, to move an amendment in favor of a railroad in Kentucky, and a general grant of land. The question is therefore decided.

The SPEAKER. Was that during the present session?

Mr. DOTY. It was.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect it.

Mr. DOTY. Mr. GREY, of Kentucky, made the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Is a further amendment in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. There is a question of order pending, upon the amendment already proposed. The bill, as the Chair understands it, proposes to appropriate lands, and to give the right of way to the States of Indiana and Illinois: This proposed amendment is to extend precisely the same privileges, as the Chair understands, to other States.

Mr. TAYLOR. To what other States?

The SPEAKER. The number I do not recollect, but there are several. In a word, the effect of the amendment is to convert a bill for a special purpose, into very nearly a general bill, embracing almost all, if not all, the States of the Union, in which public lands lie. The Chair is inclined to overrule the question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] The Chair confesses that he has some doubts.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I wish to inquire if the morning hour is out?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DOTY. I move to recommit the bill, to which I offered the amendment which has just been read, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] has the floor.

Mr. STANTON. Is not the first business in order the report of the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. It is the first business in the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Would it be in order to move to recommit the bill which we have just had under consideration, to the Committee on Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order, if the gentleman can get the floor for that purpose.

Mr. STANTON. If I do not lose my privilege to the floor, I will yield to that motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. If the morning hour has expired, I insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour is out. Mr. HARRIS. Then I insist upon the regular order of business.

Mr. STANTON. As I have the floor, I will make the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. Is it competent to make that motion, while a motion to postpone to a day certain, is pending?

The SPEAKER. It is not only competent, but the Chair thinks it takes precedence; but he will turn to the rules. The 46th rule reads:

"When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged," &c.

The Chair thinks that the motion to recommit is not in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I was under the impression that it was not, until the other motion was decided. However, the Chair will determine.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone to a day certain takes precedence.

Mr. KING, of New York. Then the motion to commit is not in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The first business in order is the report of the Committee on Printing. The chairman of that committee is necessarily absent, and I move to postpone the consideration of that business until to-morrow, when he will be here.

Mr. KING. My colleague over the way, [Mr. JENKINS,] who offered a substitute for the bill reported by the Committee on Printing, is obliged to be absent to-morrow, and for a few days. If it is to be postponed on account of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] the chairman of the committee, being absent, I suggest that it be postponed for a still longer time, say until the latter part of next week. My colleague can say when he will be back.

Mr. STANTON. I have no objection to any reasonable time.

Mr. KING. Then I suggest a week from Monday next. It can be taken up at any time by unanimous consent, at an earlier period.

Mr. STANTON. I cannot consent to so long a delay. I have no objection to have its consideration postponed until next Monday.

Mr. KING. My colleague will not be back then. I will inquire of the Chair, if it will not be in order to bring this matter up at any time, if it is not postponed?

The SPEAKER. If the House does not postpone it.

Mr. KING. If it is not postponed it remains the business first in order in the House, after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. STANTON. I will modify my motion, and move to postpone its consideration until Monday, instead of to-morrow.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to postpone it until Tuesday next.

Mr. JENKINS. I move to postpone it until this day week.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the longest time.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. JENKINS, to postpone the consideration of the whole matter until Thursday next, and it was agreed to.

THOMAS RITCHIE'S CLAIM.

Mr. STANTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing for the House, who have had under consideration the memorial of Thomas Ritchie, on the subject of public printing, proposing a reduction of fifty per cent. upon the prices of 1819, as the prices by which he proposes that his accounts shall be settled, to make a report upon that subject. My object in presenting a report now is merely that it may be printed; and I will, in addition to the motion to print, move to postpone the consideration of it until this day three weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is the report in the shape of a bill or a joint resolution?

Mr. STANTON. In the shape of a joint resolution.

The resolution was then read a first time by its title, as follows:

"Joint resolution providing a settlement with Thomas Ritchie, assignee of William M. Belt, for printing in the Thirty-first Congress."

Mr. STANLY. I should like to know how that report gets before the House?

The SPEAKER. It comes from the Committee on Printing, which has the privilege of reporting at any time.

Mr. STANLY. I raise the question of order, that that committee has no jurisdiction over the subject. That is a private claim, and the Committee on Printing has no jurisdiction over it at all.

Mr. STANTON. I have simply to say that the House gave the committee jurisdiction over the matter by receiving Mr. Ritchie's memorial, and by referring it to us; and we have simply acted in obedience to the commands of the House in presenting the report.

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who is not now in his seat, very properly intimated to the House, a few days since, that we are in the habit of exercising a higher law, one above the Constitution and the rules, by taking jurisdiction of subjects which do not properly belong to the various committees. Now, this is one of those occasions; and I want the House to settle, before they go any further, whether this Committee on Printing has any authority to pass upon private claims in this manner. According to the rules, the Committee on Printing have no more to do with it than the Committee of Ways and Means, or the Committee on Military Affairs, or any other committee in this House—none in the world.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me to ask a question, I desire to know whether this bill refers to any printing of this Congress, or whether it is a claim for past and executed work?

Mr. STANTON. It relates to the current work. Mr. Ritchie has not completed the work of the last Congress. He has not had it in his possession long enough to enable him to complete it. The work is now going on. The resolution simply provides the terms upon which the account shall be settled; and it relates to the current business of the last Congress which is under the control of this House, and the officers of the House.

Mr. HAVEN. I would like to inquire of my colleague upon the Committee on Printing, [Mr. STANTON,] whether this is a report from the Joint Committee on Printing, or whether it is a report only from that part of this committee which consists of the members of this House? Before the question is answered, I deem it due to myself to say, that for one, as a member of that committee, I have always insisted that the duties of that committee were simply executive, and should be confined to carrying out in its fullest force and operation the resolution under which the committee were appointed; and hence I have declined to act upon any of these things which I did not consider as pertaining to the duties of that committee. If it shall turn out that this report is made by a portion of that joint committee, then I want to submit a question, whether this House can receive anything short of a report from the Committee on Printing, which consists of three members of each House?

Mr. STANTON. I stated, when I introduced the report, that it was a report from the committee of this House, and not of the joint committee. The memorial of Mr. Ritchie was referred to us, the three members of this House on the Committee on Printing, and we were directed to take the matter into consideration, and report upon it. We have done so.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I desire to make the additional question. The second section of the joint resolution recognizes a Committee on Printing; and there is but one such committee, that I am aware of, and that consists of six members—three from this House and three from the Senate. I submit, in addition to what was suggested the other day, that even if the whole of that committee, as a committee, can report upon any subject, at any time, yet it is not competent for half of that committee to do it.

Mr. STANLY. The following is the 20th joint rule:

"A committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases, the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing; but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated.—Joint resolution (section second) of the first session Twenty-ninth Congress."

Now, sir, this must have been audited and passed upon in the last Congress. Mr. Ritchie has been paid according to his contract in the last Congress, and this is an application of his for relief, because he lost money by that contract. I want a vote of the House upon the point of order, before this question shall be acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The fact that the House of Representatives has directed the memorial of Thomas Ritchie to be sent to that committee is conclusive as to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STANLY. How did the House send it? Did some gentleman send it up, as we do petitions every day, and say, presented by Mr. A B, and referred to such a committee?

The SPEAKER. That would be equally legal and regular, in the opinion of the Chair. It will be for the House to alter its rules, if they are imperfect.

Mr. STANLY. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the reference of one of these papers gives jurisdiction to the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so thinks.

Mr. STANLY. It is time the House should decide that question. After the question is decided I want to raise the question whether one half of the committee can make a report. If so, it is not necessary for the House to appoint any one committee upon any particular branch of business; for if I can get a committee favorable to my views, having referred to it—

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I call the gentleman from North Carolina to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is called to order. Does he take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. STANLY. I do take an appeal.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow the Chair for a single moment, he will refer to the proceedings of last Congress upon this very subject.

"WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1851—page 267.

"Mr. McWillie, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Ritchie, a party to the contract of William M. Belt, to execute certain classes of the printing of Congress, asking that some arrangement may be made by which he may be suitably compensated, reported a joint resolution (No. 36) 'for the relief of Thomas Ritchie on the subject of the public printing.'"

"Mr. Burt made the point of order that it was not competent for the Committee on Printing at this time, except by unanimous consent, to make a report based upon a private memorial—the rule of the House which authorizes the Committee on Printing to report at any time only contemplating such cases as are designed to expedite the public printing."

"The Speaker stated that the 21st joint rule explicitly provides that 'it shall be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time; it places no restrictions as to the subject matter of such report, only limiting the committee to such matters as are legitimately before them. For this reason, and in conformity with a decision of the House in the Thirtieth Congress, he decided that it was in order for the Committee on Printing to report the said joint resolution at this time."

"From this decision of the Chair Mr. Burt appealed."

"Mr. Robert M. McLane moved that the appeal be laid on the table."

"And the question being put on the latter motion,

"It was decided in the affirmative."

"So the decision of the Chair was sustained."

The Chair decides that it is in order for a committee to make a report based upon a memorial that has been referred to it.

Mr. STANLY. I take an appeal from that decision.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I demand tellers upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. STANLY. This question involves some $200,000 in its decision, and I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Only $60,000.

Mr. STANLY. I understand $200,000.

Mr. STANTON. Then we differ about that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order to move to lay the appeal on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. STANLY. I demand the yeas and nays upon that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire, for the purpose of ascertaining the precise question before us, to propound an inquiry. I understand the gentleman from North Carolina to raise the point that the sending of a petition to a committee by a single member, under the rule, does not confer upon that committee jurisdiction of a subject the same as if the House had made the reference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gave some such reason for taking an appeal. The Chair's decision is, that inasmuch as the memorial has been sent regularly under the rules of the House to that committee, it is in order for it to make a report upon that memorial.

Mr. KING. My vote will be governed by the facts of the case. I doubt whether a single member can confer jurisdiction; but if in open House, by its order, the reference was made, there is a difference.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call the gentleman to order. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. KING. My object simply was to get possession of the facts of the case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in reply to the gentleman from New York, will be allowed, he trusts, to say, that even if it were referred by a single member, it was referred under a rule of the House, which is as binding as though it were referred in open House. It is the business of the Chair to enforce the rules as they are and not to amend them.

Mr. KING. And then the decision of the Chair is that such a reference would confer jurisdiction?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides.

Mr. CARTTER. I ask the reading of the rules governing the power of the committee—rules 20th and 24th.

The SPEAKER. They will be read, unless objected to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. For the purpose of getting information, and ascertaining the starting point of this matter, I ask that there be read the entry made upon the memorial. Let us see to what committee it was referred by the member introducing it, and whether it was referred to the whole or only part of the committee.

[Cries of "There is objection to the reading or discussion!" and "Question!" "Question!"]

The SPEAKER. All discussion is objected to upon the right of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. We need light upon this subject.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the table, and it was agreed to—yeas 81, nays 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Thos. H. Bayly, Bissell, Bragg, Breckinridge, Busby, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Caskey, Chastain, Churchill, Clark, Cobb, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dimmick, Doty, Eastman, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Green, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Hearn, Hibbard, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Mason, McLanahan, Meador, Millson, Molony, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Penn, Polk, Powell, Rantoul, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Seely, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Thurston, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Williams—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaugh, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Albert I. Brown, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Cleveland, Conger, Cullom, Duncan, Fowler, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Grow, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thos. M. Howe, Hunter, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Kubus, Landry, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McQueen, Miller, Minor, John Moore, Morehead, Newton, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Reed, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Scudder, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, and Yates—64.

So the motion to lay the appeal upon the table was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States informing the House of the signature of certain bills.]

Mr. STANTON. I move that the further consideration of the report be postponed till this day three weeks, and that it be ordered to be printed.

Mr. STANLY. There is another question of order pending—the one raised by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire that question disposed of. The question just decided was disposed of the other day, and I did not care to trouble the House about that. The question I raise was stated before, and it is, that this petition was referred to the Committee on Printing, consisting of three members of this House and three members of the Senate, which is designated in the law as the "Committee on Printing." There is no such thing as a division of it in the law. The third section provides that certain duties may be discharged by members of the committee from each House. If the Chair has the section I allude to before him, he can understand my point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the section before him.

Mr. HAVEN. The Chair, then, sees my point. It is stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] and no doubt truly, that this is the report from a portion of that committee; that it is from the members of that committee of the House. It is not, therefore, a report from the committee. To be so, it must be a report from a majority of members of that committee from both Houses. It is not the report of that majority. The law specifies the duties that may be performed by one portion of the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the question of order raised by the gentleman to be, that this must be a report from the entire committee, which is a joint committee of the two Houses. The third section of the law reads as follows:

"That all motions to print extra numbers of any bill, paper, or document of either House, shall be referred to the members of the committee of that House, who shall report upon the propriety of printing, and the probable expense thereof as early as convenient."

It is very clear from this section that the law contemplates separate action to that extent, at all events.

Mr. HAVEN. There is no doubt of that.

The SPEAKER. And the right of that portion of the committee belonging to the House has been again and again exercised, the Chair thinks, in this body.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Allow me to make a suggestion at this point. It has not been three days since this House referred to that committee, composed of three members of this House, a proposition to print under their direction, and, in their discretion, twenty thousand copies of the obituary speeches and proceedings upon the occasion of the announcement of the decease of Mr. Clay.

Mr. HOUSTON. That comes under the express letter of the law.

Mr. HAVEN. Besides the House could direct any one member of the committee to make such a contract.

Mr. STANTON. The joint resolution of 1846 provides that the Joint Committee on Printing shall have this printing executed, and that the contract shall be made by it; but the House conferred upon our portion of the committee special authority by that resolution to have this printing done under their own discretion. It is taken from under the law.

Mr. SACKETT. Has the House done so in this case?

Mr. STANTON. It did so in the case of the printing of the obituary addresses.

Mr. HAVEN. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, the House conferred—if that is the language of the resolution—upon the three members of the House composing the Committee on Printing the power to have executed a certain number of copies of the obituary addresses and other proceedings of the House upon the occasion of the announcement of the death of Mr. Clay.

Mr. STANTON. It is not an extra number of any document ordered to be printed by the House. It is a special job out of the usual and ordinary printing of the House.

Mr. HAVEN. It is understood and conceded that it does not come within the powers of the committee under the law. It is not in the fifth class of printing, for if it had been, it would have gone to the public printer—Mr. Hamilton—without any difficulty. And not coming within either of the classes, it was a kind and portion of printing for which there was no contract provided, and hence the committee was charged with exercising a duty not under the law to carry out the will of the House upon that subject.

Mr. STANTON. I will ask my colleague upon the committee if the House has power, without any rule, to refer that description of matter to this committee, whether it has not power to refer this proposition of Mr. Ritchie?

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Ritchie's proposition was referred to the Committee on Printing composed of the six members I have mentioned. In the other case, the proposition was referred to the three members of the House on that committee.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman labors under a mistake there.

Mr. HAVEN. In one case under the rule, and in the other by the House.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman labors under a great mistake.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York contends that the memorial was referred to the entire Committee on Printing, and not a portion of it, and that it is not in order for a portion of the committee to report. That is his point.

Mr. STANTON. Now to the facts. The gentleman who presented the memorial says he designed to send it to our committee. It was indorsed upon the back "To the Committee on Printing." If it had been intended to send it to the joint committee, it would have been so reported upon the Journal. The Clerk of the House sent it to our committee, believing that to be the direction intended by the author, as it really was. That is the way our committee got possession of it.

Mr. STANLY. I wish only to say a word. I will not indulge in argument. On the 10th of January, 1851, the petition was first presented. It is indorsed "Petition of Mr. Ritchie, for compensation for public printing, proposing a reduction of fifty per cent. on the prices of 1819, and asking relief from his contract."

There is nothing at all about the current business of the session. The last entry upon the petition is, "March 17th, 1852; referred to the Joint Committee on Printing. THOMAS H. BAYLY." The reference is to the joint committee, and here half of that committee have undertaken to do the duty of the whole, and this House is to act upon it before it goes to the committee at all.

I should like to have the yeas and nays upon that proposition.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether this discussion is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very anxious to make a correct decision in this case, and was indulging gentlemen in the suggestion of facts.

Mr. STUART. I will make a single suggestion. This Joint Committee on Printing possesses certain duties under a law, but not under any rules of this House. I have listened, and, as I understand, all gentlemen agree that this is not a duty arising under that law, but that it is a subject-matter referred to the Committee on Printing under the rule of this House. The only Committee on Printing this House has for such purpose is its own committee. We cannot refer to a joint committee raised for a particular purpose. Now it has been held heretofore that the members of this committee, appointed by the House, constitute its committee, and the only committee it has, upon printing.

Whenever, therefore, a subject is referred, under the rules of the House, to the Committee on Printing, and that subject does not fall within this law which authorizes this joint committee, and defines its duties, it goes to the members appointed by this House. They have the sole control over it, and they are the only ones who can report to the House, because they are the only ones over whom the House have any control. They are the only organs from whom we can compel a report. We cannot coerce a report in this House from the joint committee, but from that portion which constitutes our Committee on Printing we can, by resolution, coerce a report. We can instruct, and we can control them, and if the facts have been properly stated in this case, I submit that the report has been correctly made.

The SPEAKER. I wish to know if a portion of the committee belonging to the House did not report during the present session, changing the existing law upon the subject of printing. Has it not become our practice by that precedent? The law very clearly contemplates action upon the part of the committee of each House, independent of the other. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.]

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I only desire to refer to the mistake which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] has made in a matter of fact. The old memorial of the last Congress, which was re-referred at this Congress, is indorsed thus: "THOMAS H. BAYLY, referred to the Committee on Printing."

Mr. STANLY. In whose handwriting?

Mr. BAYLY. It is my indorsement. The Clerk interpreted it as referred to the Joint Committee on Printing, but he had no right to alter my reference, as the first is in my handwriting, and the other in that of the Clerk. Here is the memorial I presented at this session, and it is indorsed in these words, in my handwriting: "THOMAS H. BAYLY, referred to the Committee on Printing." I beg to say to the House—

Mr. HAVEN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I fear I shall lose the opportunity unless he does. I do not desire to raise these questions continually, and when the House disposes of them, I am willing to abide by them. I desire to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair upon that subject. I will mention it now for fear that I may lose the opportunity, that the Committee on Printing is a designation which the law gives to the members of both Houses on that committee. There is no such thing as a committee of this House, and a committee of the other. There is nothing but a Committee on Printing, and then there are certain duties which are conferred upon the members of that committee, who belong to this House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. For the sake of getting a little light, and to have the beginning point right, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I understand him to draw a distinction between the Joint Committee and the Committee on Printing. I wish to know if there are two distinct committees—whether there is a Committee on Printing in this House, and a Joint Committee of the two Houses?

The SPEAKER. There is but one, which is a joint committee, but the duties of this committee are in many cases made separate by the express language of the law.

Mr. BAYLY. The phraseology of that reference was not accidental upon my part, but it was placed there by design. I was consulted about this memorial as to where it should go. Some persons had the impression that it should go to the Committee on Claims. That was not my opinion. We have a great many Committees on Claims; a Committee on Revolutionary Claims to which the revolutionary claims go—a Committee on Private Claims, to which all private land claims go—a Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to which invalid pensions and other claims go, which properly come under their jurisdiction. Then there are a variety of claims which go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs—such as the claims of the Secretaries of Legations, for instance, who perform the duties of Ministers. Besides these Committees on Claims which have specific jurisdiction, there is a general committee, if I may say so, which is the residuary legatee of all other claims, and that is the Committee on Claims.

This is a claim which I thought ought to go to the committee having jurisdiction of the subject to which the claim related, precisely as I would send a private land claim to the Committee on Private Land Claims; and as I would send a claim in respect to printing to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. It appears to me that the House have just settled this whole question by laying upon the table an appeal from the decision of the Speaker upon a question of order that tested the admissibility of this report.

The SPEAKER. That is very true. In terms the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] appealed from the decision of the Chair that a part of the committee had a right to report; and the House decided that the committee had the right to make the report. Another ground of objection is made, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] has a right to appeal from the decision of the Chair, which he has done. It is the same question repeated upon different grounds, that the report made is inadmissible.

Mr. CARTTER. The point I wish to make is this—

Mr. HAVEN. I beg pardon, if the gentleman from Ohio will allow me to correct a mistake. I do not wish to take up the time of the House. The other was a decision as to whether the committee had a right to report at any time. That was decided and disposed of by the House. This is a question whether less than the committee—that is, one half of the committee—can report in regard to this matter when it has not been before the committee?

The SPEAKER. It resolves itself into the same proposition: whether the report was a proper one under the rule. The Chair decided that it was. From that decision an appeal was taken, and it is substantially the same as the other for different reasons.

Mr. CARTER. The point I make is this: that a distinct reason, or accumulated reason, operating upon the mind of the House to bring them to the same conclusion, cannot change the force of the decision which has been already made upon this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] arose and stated distinctly that it was a report from that portion of the Committee on Printing which belonged to the House of Representatives. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] raised the question of order, that the report could not be received under the rules. The Chair overruled that objection. From the decision of the Chair the gentleman from North Carolina took an appeal, and the House have laid that appeal upon the table. The Chair must repeat again, that it is the same question as to the reception of the report, although the appeal is founded upon a different reason.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire to state a simple fact. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] stated his reason prior to the decision which was made by the Chair and vote taken by yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. He made an argument which went against the reception of the report.

Mr. STANLY. My friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] is mistaken in regard to a part of his statement as to the reference of this petition. The last petition reads, "referred to the Committee on Printing;" that is dated March 16, 1852. The next day after that reference is to the Joint Committee on Printing, March 17th.

Mr. BAYLY. The direction I made to the Clerk was to refer it to the House committee.

Mr. STANLY. What is it that gives jurisdiction? It is the reference by this House. How does this House act? By the direction which the Clerk gives the petition. That reference is special, and to the Joint Committee on Printing; but by the terms of the report of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] it is referred only to one part of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] upon the ground that his proposition has been already decided. It is competent to take an appeal from that decision, but it is a repetition of the question of order raised by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] based upon different reasons. The gentleman will remember he urged that very reason against the reception of the report.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to say to the Speaker, and the House, of course, that I did not so understand it, or I would not have raised the question of order. I have no desire but to put an end to the continual questions of order raised upon this matter. I wish to have it settled. I understood the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] had made his point.

The SPEAKER. The reasons against the reception of the petition were made to operate, and did operate, upon the minds of certain gentlemen. The appeal is upon the very same point as to the reception of the report, which has already been made.

Mr. STANLY. I appeal from that decision, because it is altogether a separate and distinct question. Suppose it should turn out that there was only one member in the city during the whole time, and that during the whole year two members died. They of course could not have acted upon the report.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I object to any discussion unless there is an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] takes an appeal.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STANLY. I only wish the question settled. It ought to be settled in some way. The first question was, whether the committee have any jurisdiction at all upon the subject? And the next question is, whether it ought to be referred to the whole committee or not? The questions are as wide apart as two questions can possibly be. The House have decided that the committee had jurisdiction of the matter by the reference of the petition to them, by sustaining the Speaker in his decision. There is an end of that, and I have nothing more to say upon that point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will recollect that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] stated distinctly that it was a report from that portion of the committee belonging to the House, and upon that state of facts the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] took an appeal.

Mr. STANLY. No, sir. I appealed upon the ground that they had no authority over this question at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to be understood by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] and he thinks that he will agree with the Chair. It is precisely the question which was raised and settled upon his own proposition, as to the right of the committee to report—

Mr. STANLY. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. But for different reasons.

Mr. STANLY. It was another argument used by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] in addition to what I stated at the moment he interrupted me. I remarked that that was another question, and surely it is another question. I have nothing to do with that appeal. I made no point, and I did not know that this point was coming up. This is altogether different from the one made before. I wish the House to decide whether one half or a member of this Committee on Printing can make a report.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from North Carolina labors under the impression that this is a report from a single member of that committee he is much mistaken.

Mr. STANLY. By no means. I put that by way of argument to the Chair.

Mr. BARRERE. I understood the Chair to have decided this point: that a single member may refer a petition or memorial to less than the whole committee. That seems to be involved in his decision. If reference was made to a part of the committee it violates the rule—

The SPEAKER. That is another reason why the report should not be received; and if upon the appeal now taken the House sustains the Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BARRERE] can have the same question repeated again for the reason which he has now stated.

Mr. BARRERE. I merely desire to know how the Chair decides the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the memorial was properly referred to the committee.

Mr. BARRERE. If it be referred to the whole committee, can a part make a report?

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair is this: The committees of the two Houses act in cases which are separate and distinct from each other. This is a matter which belongs exclusively to this House. The practice of the House is to receive such reports, and the Chair adheres to that practice.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is it possible to call the previous question upon this matter?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have had so much debate and lost so much time upon this matter, that I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair is, that the question of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] is in fact the same question of order raised by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] upon which he took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and which appeal was laid upon the table. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] insists, the ground being different, that the question is really a different one, and may be again decided by the House. The Chair thinks it is incompetent for the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] or the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] to appeal thus the second time from the decision of the Chair after the question of the receivability of the report had been settled by the vote of the House. From that decision the gentleman from North Carolina takes an appeal, and upon that the previous question is demanded.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. What will be the effect of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a vote upon the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON. Not upon the report of the committee?

The SPEAKER. No, sir.

Mr. STUART. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. HART called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. PENN and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 61.

Mr. STANLY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to, the Chair will again state the question as he understands it. It would be quite competent for the House to reconsider its vote and reach this object, but nothing can be clearer to the Chair than that an appeal upon the appeal just decided is not in order. The Chair was of opinion that the House really could not understand the question. The gentleman from North Carolina took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, which was, that the gentleman from Kentucky had a right to report. The gentleman took an appeal from that decision, which was laid upon the table. The gentleman now says, that the committee had no such right to report, but for another reason entirely—and it may be a very good one—and insists that he has the right again to take precisely the same appeal that he took before. These, certainly, are the facts of the case which must appear upon the Journal.

Mr. HAVEN. With the permission of the Chair, I desire to correct his statement. I submit that the former decision of the House was, that the committee had a right to report. This is a question whether less than half of the committee have the right.

The SPEAKER. In reply to that, the Chair states that the gentleman from Kentucky stated, with great distinctness and clearness, that it was a report from a part of the committee, and from the decision of the Chair, that such a report was in order, the appeal was taken.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the Chair will allow me to put myself right. He misunderstands me. I never said or argued that the Committee on Printing had no right to report. I argued that they had nothing to do with this case at all—that they had no jurisdiction over it.

The SPEAKER. That is very true.

Mr. STANLY. My argument was, that the whole committee of the Senate and the House together, had nothing to do with this. That was my point, and from the decision of the Chair upon that point, I appealed. Then the question raised by the gentleman from New York, and which had not occurred to me, is whether the committee had reported at all. The House has to decide that.

The question was then taken upon laying the appeal upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bragg, Brinkridge, Busby, Caldwell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Doty, Eastman, Faulkner, Florence, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Green, Hamilton, Hammond, Isiah G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Howard, Jackson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mason, McLannan, Meade, Millson, Molony, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Peaslee, Penn, Polk, Powell, Rantoul, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Savage, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townsend, Venable, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Woodward—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, William Appleton, Barrere, Bell, Bibbians, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Burrows, Lewis D. Campbell, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, Culom, Duncan, Durkee, Fowler, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Gray, Grow, Harper, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Kulus, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McQueen, Miller, Miner, Moore, Morehead, Newton, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Reed, Sackett, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, and Yates—70.

So the appeal was laid upon the table, and the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the House.

The joint resolution was then read a second time.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there are several appropriation bills which the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is desirous of getting through with as speedily as possible. I therefore desire to move to postpone the further consideration of this resolution until this day three weeks.

Mr. POLK. I suggest to the gentleman to say two weeks.

Mr. HOUSTON. That would hardly leave us time to get through with the appropriation bills.

Mr. STANTON. My object in putting off this matter is that other, and, perhaps, more important business of the country, shall be got through, and that this matter should not in any way embarrass the action of the House upon those measures.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman propose that the report of the committee be printed?

Mr. STANTON. I do, sir.

Mr. STANLY. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Thomas Ritchie, assignee of William M. Belt, the contractor for executing the second, fourth, and fifth classes of printing for the Thirty-first Congress, shall receive as compensation for said work, payment at the rate of one half of the price paid for the printing under the joint resolution of 1819, and in lieu of the prices specified in the contract of said Belt.

Mr. BAYLY. I would suggest that we shall be more pressed three weeks from now than in one or two weeks. It occurs to me that the better time would be an earlier day.

Mr. STANLY. If this resolution is postponed will that give it priority over other business when it comes up?

The SPEAKER. That will depend on the circumstances of the case. There are various other propositions that would take priority.

Mr. STANLY. Does it make it a special order?

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to anticipate what would interfere with the consideration of it.

Mr. STANLY. I desire to inquire how much money this will take out of the Treasury?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I remarked to you about $60,000. If I had had an opportunity then, I should have corrected some of the errors into which you have fallen.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone is not debatable.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to postpone the resolution until the 4th of March.

Mr. POLK. When Pierce is to be inaugurated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] must propose some day within the present Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I say the third of March.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I wish to inquire if this is not a bill that is required by the rules to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? Does it not appropriate money?

The SPEAKER. It does not, according to the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move the previous question, and I desire to know what will be the effect of that motion?

The SPEAKER. The effect of it will be to bring the House to vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STANTON. And if that fails, then upon my motion?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STANTON. Then it is exhausted.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make an inquiry. If we sustain the previous question, will it not cut off the motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It will cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. STANTON. Then I withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will it be in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It will be, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. KING, of New York. Let us postpone this matter first.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well, if the House will let this matter be postponed by general consent.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it is not debatable, then I withdraw my motion.

The question was accordingly withdrawn.

The question being upon the motion proposed by Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania,

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaugh, Rowne, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Cleveland, Conger, Durkee, Fowler, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grow, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McQueen, Miller, Miner, John Moore, Morehead, Newton, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Rantoul, Reed, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Stant, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Thurston, Townsend, Walbridge, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Alexander White, Woodward, and Yates—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bissell, Bragg, Breckinridge, Busby, E. C. Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Churchill, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Eastman, Ewing, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Green, Grey, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mason, McLaughan Meade, Molony, Murphy, Murray, Nahers, Olds, Peaslee, Penn, Polk, Powell, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Venable, Walsh, Addison White, Wilcox, and Williams—90.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred to postpone the further consideration of the report until this day three weeks; and, being put, it was agreed to.

SEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I call up my motion, made on Saturday last, to reconsider the vote to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the Senate bill apportioning the Seventh Census.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Is it in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. McLANAHAN. This is a privileged question.

Mr. SEYMOUR. So is the other.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order when the gentleman can get the floor for the purpose of making it; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] is now upon the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will it be in order for any member to make a motion to postpone the consideration of the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order when the gentleman can get the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I supposed the gentleman had yielded the floor with a view to the motion's being put.

Mr. McLANAHAN. No, sir; I had not yielded it.

The Clerk then read the title of the bill, as follows:

"Senate bill No. 281, supplementary to an act providing for the taking of the Seventh and subsequent Censuses of the United States, and to fix the number of members of the House of Representatives, and to provide for the future apportionment among the several States, approved 23d May, 1850."

Mr. McLANAHAN. It is not my design, at this late day in the session, to make any decided opposition to the passage of this bill. My main object in submitting the report which accompanied the bill, was to turn the attention of this House, and of the country, to the fact, that the constitutional provision for the apportionment of the census had been violated—and that the act of 1850 was a total departure from the uniform practice of the Government from the beginning. The law of 1850 bears a striking similarity, in all its features, to the bill presented to President Washington, in 1792. It is well known that after full consultation with his distinguished Cabinet—Jefferson being Secretary of State—President Washington sent his first and only veto message, with this bill, back to the House of Representatives, where it originated. The bill fell under the weight of the constitutional objections urged against it by the Executive. And from 1792, up to 1842, the uniform practice was to divide by a fixed ratio—not the aggregate mass of the representative population of all the States in the Union, but the representative population of each separate State, without regard to fractions. In 1842, this practice was abandoned, so far as to admit the representation of major fractions—fractions above a moiety. Mr. Webster, in his celebrated report as chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, avowed the doctrine that the representation of minor fractions would be unconstitutional.

The bill, however, before the House has received the sanction of the Senate. I was directed to report it without amendment, by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I have now moved to put it on its passage.

Now, sir, inasmuch as the most of the States in the Union have already formed districts for their Congressional representation—thereby anticipating the execution of the law—and inasmuch as the presidential election approaches, and electoral representatives of the several States must be ascertained under the provisions of this bill, I am willing that it should be acted on without further delay. If the House see proper to pass the Senate bill, I will not interpose any objection here, although I must say I never can sanction its principles by voting in its favor. I am opposed to it in the general and in the detail. I move that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. KING, of New York. The motion to reconsider must first be put.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the previous question upon the proposition to reconsider?

Mr. McLANAHAN. No, sir.

The question was then taken upon the motion to reconsider, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The question recurred upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I withdraw that motion, and move to put the bill upon its passage, and upon that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, and was subsequently read a third time.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Desiring to have an opportunity of recording my vote against that bill, I call for the yeas and nays upon its passage.

Mr. FOWLER demanded tellers upon the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill passed.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. The resolution fixing the time of adjournment of the present session of Congress, was returned by the Senate on yesterday, with an amendment. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table that resolution, in order that we may concur in the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I object.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Before moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I wish to offer a resolution closing debate upon the river and harbor appropriation bill. As to the time, I will state to the House that it is immaterial to me, but the period for the close of the session is drawing near, and I should like the debate to be closed to-day if possible. If gentlemen want a longer time they can offer amendments. I offer this resolution: To close debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the river and harbor appropriation bill, at four o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and many gentlemen are desirous to be heard upon it before the discussion is closed. The resolution proposes a very short time, only an hour and a half. I move to amend that resolution by inserting Saturday next at one o'clock.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I give notice that if that should be voted down, I will move "tomorrow, at one o'clock."

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I hope, sir, that my motion may prevail.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 119.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, demanded tellers upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. FOWLER and MOLONY were appointed.

Mr. JONES. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] by striking out the words "Saturday, at one o'clock," and inserting "to-morrow, at one minute after one o'clock" in lieu thereof?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be technically in order.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I will adopt that as a part of the original resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You cannot get rid of my amendment by that kind of operation.

The SPEAKER. It would accommodate the action of the House if the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] be allowed to amend his resolution.

Mr. VENABLE. He has a right to do it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has a right to modify it. It will then read "that debate shall close to-morrow, at one o'clock."

Mr. JONES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "Saturday, at one o'clock," and inserting "to-morrow, at one minute past one o'clock."

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 55.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the question being then taken upon the resolution as amended, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 66, noes 55.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. St. MARTIN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, to enable me to submit another motion, which will occupy but one minute.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I withdraw it.

Mr. St. MARTIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, to submit a motion that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of clerks in the custom-house at New Orleans, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, the motion was entertained and agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, terminating debate on the river and harbor bill, was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I now renew the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business before the committee was House bill No. 282, "making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers," and that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, concluded his remarks in favor of river and harbor improvements. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. LOCKHART obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STUART. It is evident that there are many gentlemen who wish to speak upon this subject, and as it is nearly dinner time, I propose the committee take a recess until five o'clock.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I hope not. I hope the gentleman will proceed with his speech.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would suggest six instead of five o'clock.

Mr. STUART. I accept that modification.

The question was then put upon the motion that the committee take a recess till six o'clock, and it was agreed to.

And the committee then took a recess till six o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the river and harbor bill, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

Mr. LOCKHART, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee an hour in favor of the bill. He avowed himself a strict constructionist of the Constitution, and said he was prepared to vote for a just system of measures, of a national character, for the improvement of rivers and harbors. In doing so he was not departing from the Democratic doctrine, having before him the example of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and Polk. He expressed the hope that the gentlemen from Virginia, and from other sections of the Union on the Democratic side of the House, would lay aside their abstractions and go in for the support of this bill, which was certainly national in its character. He expressed some objections to the details of the bill, which gave large appropriations to the Northern and Eastern sections of the country, and comparatively small appropriations to the great western rivers.

Mr. WALSH did not wish to trouble the committee with a speech, and gave notice that he should write out what he wished to say in defense of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DUNCAN obtained the floor, and entered into a vindication of the Committee on Commerce from the charges which had been preferred against it. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] he said, complained that the bill appropriated too little, while the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] complained that the bill appropriated too much, he being opposed to all such appropriations; and both charged the committee with injustice and neglect of duty towards their particular sections. He entered into a refutation of those charges by calling attention to the duties of the committee, and detailing its labors and the data on which its action was based. In the course of his remarks he said that the committee proposed to appropriate as much as could be judiciously expended by the next session of Congress. As to the complaint of Virginia members that there is no appropriation in this bill for that State, he remarked that so long as they adhere to hair-splitting constructions of the Constitution, they must suffer the consequences and take the responsibility. He expressed the hope that the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] containing many objectionable items, and involving a much larger appropriation of money, would not be adopted.

Mr. VENABLE addressed the committee in opposition to the bill on constitutional grounds. He had been in the House long enough to know that the mere will of the majority fixed the construction of that instrument; and when gentlemen rise to speak about the constitutionality of a measure it excites a smile, and they are called abstractionists for endeavoring to maintain the Constitution which they are sworn to support. The question of constitutionality on the subject now before the committee had not been touched, and the gentlemen who had spoken in favor of it had been driven from point to point until they had been compelled to take shelter under the shade of "the general welfare." The Whigs spend all the money they can. It was their policy, and they act up to it. He did not complain of them; but he wished to confine his remarks to those gentlemen who call themselves Democrats. They had just returned from the Baltimore Convention, which declared against any general system of internal improvements. There were seventy-three items in this bill—one of them appropriating $5,000 for connecting the waters of Indian river and Mosquito lagoon, at the Haulover, Florida. When a small stream was made so peculiarly Democratic as to come within the force and meaning of the Democratic platform, he was at a loss to understand the meaning of the declaration.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, addressed the committee an hour in support of the policy of making appropriations for harbor and river improvements. He said he could see no constitutional impediment to making such appropriations at any point where there was Federal jurisdiction—at any point where the general commerce of the country, whether upon the lakes or the sea-board, demanded such appropriations. He could not enter into the nice distinction made by some gentlemen, that it was constitutional to improve the harbors on the sea-board, and unconstitutional to make such improvements on the northern lakes, and the great western rivers. He objected to such a construction of the Constitution. He could see no difference in principle between improving harbors on the lakes and Atlantic coast, and the improvement of the western navigable streams.

Mr. MOLONY obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. FAULKNER, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to, there being upon a division—ayes 8, noes 7.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. OLDS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 282, making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and had made progress therein, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would ask of the House, as it is a matter which can excite no sort of opposition, that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the State of Virginia, asking to have refunded to her moneys advanced to the Mexican volunteers, and to submit a report which I move, with the memorial, be laid upon the table, and printed.

There was no objection, and the order was entered accordingly.

On motion by Mr. FLORENCE, the House then adjourned.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petition, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. WALBRIDGE: The petition of Hermann Camp and seventy-five other citizens of Tompkins county, New York, in favor of Mr. Stanley's bill making appropriations for the Colonization Society.

By Mr. STANTON, of Ohio: The petition of citizens of Miami county, Ohio, praying the establishment of a post route on the turnpike from Troy to Springfield, Ohio.

Also, the memorial of Robert Irons, of Logan county, Ohio, praying that a pension may be granted to him for his services in the Indian war of 1790.

By Mr. FAULKNER: The memorial of John F. Cannon, of Warren county, Virginia, praying relief in a contract made with the Post Office Department.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 23, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the execution of the order of the Senate, assigning Friday of each week for the consideration of private claims, be suspended until one o'clock.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the petition of Amos Kuapp, praying that the pension allowed him may be made to commence from the 3d of April, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the petition of Anna Maria Baldwin, praying compensation for time and expenses in obeying a summons of the United States circuit court for the District of Columbia, in the case of the United States against White; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEWARD submitted additional documents in relation to the establishment of a line of steamers from Brooklyn, New York, to Gluckstadt, in Holstein; which, with the memorial of Christian Hansen, on the same subject, were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

EMIGRANT ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Committee on the Territories, to which was recommended the bill for the protection of the emigrant route and a telegraphic line, and for an overland mail between the Missouri river and the settlements in California and Oregon, together with an amendment by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] and another offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Baopnead,] have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report a substitute for the original bill, and for both amendments. I move that the bill be taken up for consideration, with the view of moving that the substitute be printed, and that its further consideration may be postponed until next Wednesday.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until next Wednesday.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1853, have directed me to report the same with certain amendments. As I suppose that it will lead to no debate, I ask that the bill be considered immediately. If it leads to any debate, I shall be willing to postpone it, as I do not wish to interfere with private bills.

The PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments of the committee were, to insert the following items:

"For riding hall, $12,000.

"For improvements and additions to officers' quarters, $3,000.

"For additional pay to the lithographer and pressman employed in the lithographic office, $50 each—$100;"

—to add the following additional section:

"And be it further enacted, That hereafter the assistant professors of French and drawing shall receive the pay and emoluments allowed to other assistant professors;"

and to strike out the following clause:

"Provided, That the Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point may be selected by the President of the United States from any corps in the Army of the United States."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. HUNTER subsequently rose and said: There has been a mistake in the enrollment of the deficiency bill, and it will be necessary to rectify it by reconsidering the vote ordering the Military Academy appropriation bill to a third reading, in order that we may attach to it an amendment rendered necessary by this mistake. The deficiency bill has gone to the President, and has been signed by him; and it is necessary that we should introduce speedily some amendment, in order to make provision for what was omitted there. The item is in relation to the compensation and mileage of members, which was a subject of difference between the two Houses, but which was finally settled. By some mistake it was omitted by the enrolling clerk. It is my purpose now to ask a reconsideration of the vote ordering the amendments to the Military Academy bill to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time, that we may add a section to it making provision for this item.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I now offer the following amendment as an additional section:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That to rectify a mistake which was made in the enrollment of the bill entitled

"An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," by omitting a clause appropriating for per diem compensation and mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, and agreed to by the Senate and House of Representatives, the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for that object out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I think it due to the clerks of the Senate to say that the mistake was not made by them. It was made by the enrolling clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to; the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read a third time, and passed; and the title was amended, on motion by Mr. HUNTER, by adding thereto the words "and for other purposes."

THE NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interests, all correspondence on file in the Executive Departments with the Government of England, or its diplomatic representatives, since the convention between the United States and Great Britain, of October 20th, 1818, touching the fisheries on the coasts of the British possessions in North America, and the rights of citizens of the United States engaged in such fisheries, as secured by said convention.

And that the President be also requested, under like limitation, to inform the Senate whether any of the naval forces of the United States have been ordered to the seas adjacent to the British possessions in North America, to protect the rights of American fishermen, under said convention of 1818, since the receipt of the intelligence that a large and unusual British naval force had been ordered there to enforce certain alleged rights of Great Britain, under said convention.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I have thought it my duty, considering the present aspect of affairs, so far as they are communicated to us by the public journals, to submit this resolution and ask that it be considered immediately. We are informed, unofficially, but in a manner clearly indicating that it is correct, that the British Government has recently asserted rights under the convention of 1818, in relation to the fisheries of the north, which, whether they exist or not, they suffered from 1818 to 1841 to pass without a question, and after 1841, when the question was mooted as to the respective rights of British subjects and American citizens under the treaty of 1818, they still suffered to remain in statu quo.

Sir, the British Government know well that very large and important interests are embarked by citizens of the United States in these fisheries. They know that the harbors, and coasts, and seas off their possessions in North America swarm at stated seasons of the year—and this, as I am informed, is one of those seasons—with these fishing vessels; yet, suddenly, without notice of any kind, we are informed from the public journals, and semi-officially, by a sort of proclamation from the Secretary of State, that a very large British naval force has been ordered into those seas for the purpose of enforcing, at the mouth of the cannon, the construction which Great Britain has now recently determined to place on that convention. Now, sir, I had supposed, in this civilized age, and between two such countries as those of Great Britain and the United States, that were it the purpose of England to revise her construction of this convention, and require that it should be enforced, comity, ordinary comity, national courtesy, would have required that notice should have been given of that determination on the part of Great Britain. But, sir, when no such notice is given; when, on the contrary, the first information that reaches us is that Great Britain has ordered into those seas a large naval force for the purpose of enforcing this alleged right, I know not in what light it may strike other Senators, but it strikes me as a far higher offense than a breach of national courtesy—as one of insult and indignity to the American people.

This morning, in the first paper I took up from the North, I see extracted from one of the British colonial newspapers, printed at St. Johns, in New Brunswick, a formal statement of the actual naval force ordered by Great Britain immediately to rendezvous in those seas. It consists of the Cumberland, a seventy-gun ship, commanded by Sir G. F. Seymour, who, I believe, is a British admiral commanding on the West India station; and then follows an enumeration of steam-vessels, sloops-of-war, and schooners, to the number of nineteen, ordered to rendezvous there immediately, and with the utmost dispatch. For what purpose? To enforce at once, and without notice to this Government, so far as I am informed—and yet we have some information, through the quasi proclamation of the Secretary of State—at the mouth of the cannon, the construction which the British Government places upon that convention. I do not know what view has been taken by the President of this extraordinary movement on the part of the British Government; but I think I do know what the American people would demand of the Executive under such circumstances. If there be official information, or information satisfactory to the Executive, that this extraordinary naval armament has been ordered by Great Britain into the North American seas, for the purpose of executing, instantaneously, the construction which Great Britain places upon the convention, I say the American people will demand of their Executive that all the naval force on the home station should be ordered there instantly, to protect the American fishermen.

Sir, we have been told by the poet who most deeply read the human heart, that "out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety;" and if I may be told that there is danger of collision, I would answer at once, there is no danger. But if there were, it becomes the Executive immediately to resent that which can be looked upon only as an indignity and insult to the nation. I have no fear, Mr. President, that war is to follow the apparent collision which has taken place between the two Governments; but I confess that I feel deeply the indignity that has been put upon the American people, in ordering this British squadron into those seas without notice; and if I read the feelings of our people aright, they will demand that a like force shall be instantly sent there, in order that the rights of our people may be protected.

Sir, I do not profess the power to construe the purpose of this movement on the part of the British Government; but I was very much impressed by a dispatch which I saw in one of the late papers, but which, unfortunately, I have not at hand, within the last few days—a dispatch from the Foreign Office of Great Britain to the Colonial Office, advising the Colonial Office of this movement—advising it that it was one that required celerity and dispatch, and requiring that measures should be taken by the Colonial Office to procure concert between the British naval force and the colonial authorities. The reason assigned was, that this measure was taken on the part of Great Britain as preliminary to certain negotiations. Now, what does this mean? I know not what these negotiations are, but if it means anything, it means that we are to negotiate under duress. Ay, sir, at this day, that this great people, covering a continent, and numbering five and twenty millions, are to negotiate with a foreign fleet on our coast. I know not what the President has done; I claim to know what the American people expect of him. I know that if he has done his duty, the reply to the resolution of inquiry will be, I have ordered the whole naval force of the country into those seas to protect the rights of American fishermen against British cannon. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to consider the resolution immediately.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution is not under consideration, except by unanimous consent. If not objected to, it will be considered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. As one of the representatives of a State most deeply interested in the subject embraced in the resolution, I desire to express my gratification that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has seen fit to call the attention of the Senate and country to it; and I desire to yield a most hearty and cordial approval of every word and sentiment which have been expressed by that Senator. We are not permitted to know at this time precisely, what is the state of affairs between this country and Great Britain; and it is for the purpose of knowing, so far as it may be compatible with the public interest, what is the precise state of affairs, that this resolution has been offered. It is, indeed, wonderful, that after a treaty had been acquiesced in, and after a construction had been given by acquiescence for a long period of time, without notice, an armament from that Government should be sent into those waters. What are its peculiar objects, it is impossible for us to tell. That there is some ulterior purpose beyond that which is borne upon the face of the matter, in my judgment, is quite certain. Indeed, it has been whispered—rumors have come to my ears—that it is taken in connection with the question of reciprocity of trade with the British colonies surrounding us. Whether it be so, or whether negotiation is to be demanded, or legislation to be asked under duress, I am sure we are not permitted to know. But, if that be the case, it was well said by the Senator from Virginia, that in this age, ay, at this hour, it is wonderful, indeed, if either negotiation or legislation should be attempted by such a course. We could neither legislate nor negotiate under such a state of things, without dishonor or disgrace, nor would we.

This is a very important question, however, to the States that compose the Northern section of this Union. Their interests are extensive. The individuals who are engaged in these fisheries are numerous, and their lifetime is one of danger and disaster; and while the treaty has been acquiesced in, and a construction given to it by acquiescence for a long period of time, it is nevertheless true, and is well known to all of us who reside in the immediate vicinity, that there have been many occasions when its plain principles have been violated, and our fishermen have been subject to annoyances, and their vessels seized and confiscated upon more than one occasion, when it is justly believed they had not fallen within the provisions of the treaty stipulations. They have never been free of annoyance. What is to result from this movement remains to be seen.

It is not my purpose, at this time, to go into an accurate account of the extent of that interest, or of the persons who are directly connected with it. As one class of our population, however, there are none who have more just calls upon us for protection in their just rights. Wherever a naval battle has been fought, on the ocean or on the lakes, the men interested in those fisheries have been the individuals who have added luster to our flag in every such engagement; and they are, indeed, entitled to all the protection which the treaty stipulations of the Government can give them. That flag which they have so patriotically sustained on all occasions they may well look to for protection now, and I am rejoiced that the chairman of the appropriate committee proposes to make the appropriate call upon the Department. When we shall learn definitely what is the precise state of affairs, I shall concur most cheerfully with the Senator in carrying out the just demand which he has made. This is not the time, in my opinion, when a discussion should be had upon the general question. The resolution itself shows that we should have that definite information which we do not now possess. When that shall arise, I will endeavor to show the extent and magnitude of this great branch of industry, and its connection with the commerce and prosperity of the country; and I believe I can satisfy all that our fishermen may call upon us for protection in all their rights; nor do I doubt that they and the commerce of the country will receive that protection from our Government.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I desire also to express my full concurrence with the remarks that have fallen from the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Mason,] and my gratification at the character of those remarks, equally statesmanlike and patriotic. It seems to me that the course of the British Government in this matter, so far as we can understand it, is one of the most extraordinary proceedings that has occurred between nations in modern times. What the object is, I cannot precisely determine to my own satisfaction. Whether it is to try us, or to provoke us, or with some ulterior object, I do not undertake to say; but, in any event, I trust that this Congress, as I am sure the American people, will stand up to their rights, whatever they may be, and maintain them. But there is a question, independent of any doubt that may arise on the construction of the treaty, as to our right to fish within a given distance from the British colonial coasts. Here is a treaty which has been in force more than thirty years, and a practical construction has been put upon it from the day it was made to this day, without contradiction. Now, in this state of things, what do the British Government do? They do not enter into a negotiation to remove the difficulty. They draw the sword and cut the Gordian knot. Instead of amicable negotiations with a view to terminate the difficulty between us, they resort to force in the face of the world. But I trust this Government will meet the British Government face to face.

But I may be allowed here to express the regret I feel that one word has been published in the papers on the subject, by way of warning to the fishermen; for I understand by the remarks in one of the respectable papers here, that that was the view with which a publication was made. This is a mistake. It is in fact saying to the fishermen, "There is great doubt in regard to this question. Take care how you go there until that doubt is removed." That is not the way to meet such a question as this. It is not proper to meet it by throwing out doubts to the country and to the world. We should stand upon our position until the question is met by fair negotiation, and not say at once to the world, "There is great doubt upon this subject—great doubt whether we will support our fishermen, and therefore we tell them to take care how they go there. We should stand upon the position we occupy, upon the construction put upon the treaty for almost half a century; and we have a right to say to the British Government, 'If there is any doubt upon this subject let us negotiate, and do not draw the sword and cut the knot.'" I fully concur with every word that has been said by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have heard it rumored—and I speak only from rumor—that this matter is now under the consideration of gentlemen clothed with power to negotiate. The newspapers inform us that the British Minister has gone to Boston, and the letter-writers state—and I suppose they tell the truth—that he there meets the Secretary of State to consider this matter. If there is really any difficulty I hope they will find some mode of adjusting it; but I must confess that, though I may be wanting in the earnestness of patriotism which belongs to gentlemen in this Chamber, I have really felt no alarm—no apprehension for the safety or the peace of the country—none whatever. I feel no anxiety, because I see nothing which menaces our tranquillity or promises to disturb our repose, and I think I apprehend, to my own satisfaction, what lies at the bottom of the matter on the British side of the question. I think my friend from Maine [Mr. Hamlin] has got hold of the key which unlocks and exposes all that may seem mysterious in what has occurred in the Provinces.

There has been for some considerable time past a pretty earnest and determined effort made to open between these colonial governments and the Government of the United States, what they call reciprocity in trade. Certain propositions, known by that name, have been brought forward in Congress, and one is now pending in the other House. There have been bills, called bills of reciprocity, reported to each of the Houses, in former sessions, which failed to become laws. I may say, that whenever I see a bill that has any claim upon its face to its title—a bill that is actually reciprocal in its character—I shall give it a very careful consideration. Hitherto I have seen none. I have seen a pretty strong and urgent effort made by these colonies to open what they call a reciprocal trade with this country, but that reciprocal trade, if you examine the bills brought forward, will be found to contain conditions in favor of their own people, while the reciprocity is not extended to us. Whenever that is extended to us, I shall be disposed to treat it with great respect. But a measure of this description must look to our interests, as well as to that of our neighbors, or it can have no claim to be called reciprocal.

I feel as sensitive perhaps as any gentleman upon this floor, and desire to give the most ample and the most complete protection to the fishing interest, which is mixed with this question of reciprocity; and I declare with the greatest sincerity that I do not believe that in all of the great interests of this country there is one that deserves and merits protection more. I know of no interest where the dollars which are earned are earned with more labor, more toil, more peril, or more sacrifice of personal comfort and enjoyment. Sir, the fisherman pursues his employment upon the open, tempestuous Atlantic ocean, enduring all the hardships which belong to that laborious pursuit, all the privations and all the sufferings which separation from home and a continuous isolated condition on the sea implies, and after all obtains nothing but a moderate, a humble living. That is their choice, however; for the world is open to them as to others.

But there is a national point of view in this matter which is deeply interesting to us. These men who go upon the Grand Banks and upon the Labrador coast to fish are generally native citizens. There is scarcely an exception; they are native-born citizens, and from that nursery springs the great body of navigators and men of enterprise, who adorn and embellish the country. I say it here, sir, fearless of contradiction, that if you take away this protecting arm of the Government, you take that which is more essential to you in the defense of the country than any one thing which can be named. Why, sir, the enterprise, the skill, and the courage of these men are manifest as far as our name and fame extend. They carry your commerce everywhere, and they give to it the high character which it has attained. Without them and their maritime skill we should sink down into the condition of France, and other countries, which have not found themselves capable of carrying on successfully a great and extended commerce with other nations. This is the nursery of the skill and strength which are indispensable to success on the ocean. As a money-making business, I may say to you, what will be found to be true on analyzing the subject, that the profits of fishing seem incapable of alluring any one into the pursuit. But as a maritime subject, it is clothed with interest in every point of view.

Hence it is I would give to them heartily and cordially, under all circumstances, the protection which they deserve. But while I desire this, it is fitting and proper that I should repeat what has been declared by the Senator from Maine, that these fisheries have been more or less attended with controversy and difficulty at all times. There are, as the Senator from Virginia justly observed, fishing grounds lying within the exclusive jurisdiction of the colonies that are valuable, and they desire to participate in them. Through accident or through inattention they sometimes get upon those grounds; sometimes their vessels have been seized; and it may be lawfully, but sometimes it is said unlawfully condemned. But that seizures have taken place from time to time we all know.

At what time Great Britain put the construction on the treaty which raises the difficulties which are now said to exist, I am not at this moment informed; though I do know that the controversies have been so grave as to cause remonstrance which was followed by negotiation. I believe we do not claim, we never have claimed, the right to fish within the limits of her jurisdiction without her consent—that is, within three miles of the coast; but I have understood she sets up a claim of this kind: there being on the coast of her colonies large bays and inlets of the sea that are very extensive in their character, she says, in giving interpretation to the treaty, that when the headlands of such bays are within six miles of each other, she claiming jurisdiction three miles from each coast, we cannot enter to fish. That is probably the chief matter of controversy. This is not the time to discuss that point, or to vindicate the ground which we maintain. It is said, however, that an unusual force—and I believe it is an unusual one, one of unusual numbers, of unusual strength—has been ordered to protect this right. I see nothing more avowed than the purpose of protecting their lawful right to what the treaty of 1818 concedes. This may or may not cover the motive. I can find some solution of what seems at least unusual in the suggestion of the Senator from Maine. I have seen the rights of navigation upon the St. Lawrence more stringently asserted than formerly. There was a time when courtesy would pass a vessel of the United States through the canals of the Province, but such privileges are now denied or reluctantly conceded. I have been told of late that it cannot be passed upon any terms. You hear the matter of the free navigation of the St. Lawrence much discussed, and that of the St. Johns also. The latter, perhaps, is, to some extent, more important than the former.

But still there are gentlemen—the Senator from Illinois for example—who esteem the free navigation of the St. Lawrence of very high importance.

That may be, though I believe the effect of the internal improvements of the United States has been to divert a very large portion of the trade of the St. Lawrence through New York. That has been the result; but still that is a great highway, and it is desirable that it should be opened, though if the Canadians desert it for highways of ours it remains to be seen whether we have genius enough to make it available to great practical uses.

These colonial gentlemen are earnest for permission to bring their products free of duty into our markets, and they wish to barter the navigation of these rivers and the fisheries for this privilege; and what more natural than in this earnestness they should esteem it advisable to straighten the line, and to refuse the courtesy that has heretofore been extended, and if the fishery laws have been a little laxly administered, to hold us up to the full letter of the law, and, perhaps, a little beyond it? I can find a solution of that sort that satisfies my own mind very well; yet I profess no knowledge upon this subject but what is open to everybody. It is gathered, in fact, from the circumstances which surround us—nothing else. Now, I do not believe, any more than the Senator from Virginia, that anything very serious is to grow out of it; but still it is certainly a matter to which the attention of the Government ought to be directed. They ought at least to take pains to investigate the subject, and see whether there is anything that deserves consideration on the part of this country; and if there is I trust they will make the appropriate movement.

I hardly know what better guarantee we can have than that which I suggested in the outset of my remarks. If the Secretary of State and the British Minister are together in consultation on the subject, I dare say, before they part, we shall know and understand the length and the breadth, the depth and the height of this whole subject. Nevertheless, so far from having any objection to the passage of the resolution now under consideration, I most heartily and cordially approve of it, and shall be gratified to see the information for which it calls, and gratified to look a little more into the subject; and if there is anything deserving the attention of the Senate, I know it will get it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I wish to make a single remark. I do not know what may have been the British policy upon the subject of the fisheries; but I know that the British Government has become a good deal excited on the subject. I have reason to say so. In 1832, as I am informed, and I know at later periods, (in 1845,) the British subjects upon the Bahama Islands, and other neighboring islands, did apply to the Government for leave to fish, believing they had been unjustly excluded by the fishermen from the North, who had gone there. Now, it may be that Great Britain has done this with a view to bring this subject to a negotiation; and I confess it is a singular form, in which they have proceeded, to reach that result. But they wish to make some issue; they wish to make some negotiation on the subject. I dislike to see an issue made by arms, in the first place, to be ended peaceably. Of course, I wish for a peaceable end; but I think negotiation should precede the arms. I think it would be better to commence the matter with negotiation instead of arms. I agree very much with the Senator from Massachusetts, that it would be better to leave the matter to the negotiation of those in whose hands it is at this time. That would be quite as safe as if it were made the subject of popular agitation.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not come from a portion of the country which is supposed to be directly or deeply interested in the particular interests involved in the question now before us. But, sir, I do feel deeply interested, as my constituents do, in every question which affects the honor of this country and its proper relations with other countries. For that reason I would add a few words to what has been said.

I concur most fully in the views which have been expressed in favor of the adoption of the resolution. I hope it will be adopted unanimously. But while I do so, I must express also the astonishment and regret I have felt that there should be any necessity for it; and that instead of our calling upon the President for information upon this important subject, the Executive should have failed to communicate to us, voluntarily and at once, all that he has in regard to it. It cannot be said that the Executive does not attach importance to the question itself, to make it a matter of communication, for we find in the newspapers such communications from the Secretary of State. And I have here, in a late New York paper, dated two days ago, a letter from him to the editor of a Boston newspaper on this subject. In those communications—the one a sort of proclamation to the fishermen, whose interest are directly involved—and the other to the Boston editor, furnishing a portion of an old official record—and both together evincing, on his part, a familiar acquaintance with the whole subject, both past and present, and showing that, in a certain sense, he is not indifferent to its importance. And more, and what I regard as far more serious by his manner of treating it, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] casting doubts over the rights of our citizens—rights which have not before been questioned. Thus, sir, the Secretary of State has made the matter one of newspaper publication and popular discussion. Now I ask if this subject, involving the rights of our citizens as endangered by the hostile acts of a foreign force, be of sufficient importance to call forth the Secretary of State in public proclamations to warn the people of impending danger from such a source, what has withheld his hand from communicating all his information in regard to it to the two Houses of Congress, who alone are competent to deal with the question in its most serious aspect—who alone are authorized and able to take efficient measures for the full protection of the interests and honor of the country?

Sir, it may be true, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, that the proposition for reciprocal trade between the British Colonies and the United States is at the bottom of this. But, I ask, if that be so—if all the views he expressed on that subject be correct—if such a course as has been pursued be the way to open negotiations with us? Has it ever happened before, in the whole history of our country, from the day when our independence was acknowledged by Great Britain until this Administration, that negotiations have been opened with us through the medium of cannon pointed against our citizens and our ships? If there be such an instance in our history, I confess my ignorance of it; and I would gladly have remained in ignorance to my dying day that such a thing could be. But, whether I be ignorant on this point or not, I am very sure of one thing—that its existence at the present time will not only not be tolerated by the American people, and should not be tolerated by their representatives in either House of Congress; and more, sir, its toleration for one moment at the other end of this avenue, by those intrusted with the Executive management of our foreign relations, while it should be held up before the people's eyes, will be inevitably sure to receive the people's condemnation, as it ought to receive it, in terms the most decided and emphatic.

It has been said, in the course of this discussion, that a negotiation, perhaps, is going on between the British Minister and the Secretary of State at Boston. If that be true, it is certainly a most extraordinary proceeding, that negotiations, involving a question of such importance as this, should be carried away from the seat of Government, from the neighborhood and beyond the observation of the whole Cabinet, and of Congress, to a remote town, made, as it were, a matter of summer recreation, rather than a national business here, at the appropriate place, and under legitimate, accustomed, and appropriate influences. But I am not satisfied that this suggestion is true. So far, it seems to be a mere newspaper rumor, which is fully offset by a very positive newspaper statement which contradicts that rumor flatly. The New York Herald (as reliable for such information as any paper we receive) declared positively, on yesterday, that Mr. Crampton was neither then at Boston, nor had been there at all; and that the rumor that he and the Secretary of State were engaged in negotiations there, had no foundation whatever in fact.

Mr. ADAMS. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution. The resolution itself admonishes the Senate that we are not advised of all the facts in relation to this matter; and until we are advised and have all the information that can be obtained in reference to this controversy, I submit to Senators, that it is not altogether proper to create a war panic about matters of which the statement of every Senator shows we are not advised. Articles in newspapers, and such like intimations, together with a letter from the Secretary of State, are all the information which we have upon the subject. The inquiries contained in the resolution are not only right and proper, but I think they ought to be made, and to receive an early answer. Yet I do not think it is the best policy for the proper conduct of these negotiations, that, in this body, there should be a war panic or denunciations by the one side or by the other. I think this discussion is premature; that we should obtain all the information that can be obtained before we so fearlessly assert, that we will maintain our position. I think we should first ascertain that we are right, and then talk of maintaining our position. I have no fear, sir, that our Government will not maintain its position when that is discovered; but first let us have the information, and then determine whether or not we are right. And if we find that we are right, then the idea of either Great Britain, or any other Power holding an armed force over this Government, will only excite a smile on the countenance of every American citizen; for the British Government cannot so far misunderstand the American character, as to suppose that such a course would have any influence in determining any action on our part, which it might be desired by such Power that we should take.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall vote with very great pleasure for the resolution of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON.] I have read it with some care; and I perceive that it is limited to two objects—in the first place, a call for the information in the possession of the executive branch of the Government; and in the next place, for information as to whether that branch of the Government has resorted to any measures for the purpose of exhibiting, on the part of the United States, an armed force in the waters which are the scene of the difficulties which have arisen. I see nothing improper in the calls made. While all of us feel the importance of the fisheries, on the northern shores, to the United States, it must also be admitted that there is no one State—either Maine, for which the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. HAMLIN] has spoken; or Massachusetts, for which another Senator [Mr. DAVIS] has given expression—that is more interested than another in this question; it is very clear that there can be no collision of the forces, or of any portion of the forces, of Great Britain and the United States on the Bay of Fundy, or in the waters adjacent, which will not necessarily involve this whole country in the blaze of war; and if that event should arrive, there is no part of the Union that will be exempt from its calamities, and certainly that State which I, in part, represent, will be one of the first to be visited with its responsibilities and its disasters.

While, therefore, I see, and admit, the propriety of calling for this information; if it be true, as there seems to be no doubt that it is, that the British Government has exhibited a force preliminary to negotiation, and while I think that the suggestion is a pertinent one that the Government of the United States should be prepared with a corresponding force for the purpose of maintaining an attitude equally commanding and advantageous for negotiation; while I think that this resolution, in itself, is not only harmless, but proper, I must deprecate, with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] if I understood the spirit of his remarks correctly, any undue excitement on this subject.

It is a great and important question, and whether it is to be terminated, as I have no doubt it will be terminated, peacefully; or is to be determined by a sterner arbitrament, it is very clear that it will be conducted most wisely and most safely on our part, if we keep cool during the present stage of the controversy; and I, for one, propose to keep myself in that temperament. Nor do I think that there is anything extraordinary in newspaper accounts of the negotiation on this subject. We all know that the honorable and distinguished Secretary of State is accustomed, precisely at this season of the year, to resort to his native climate as a protection against that of this latitude, which is injurious to his health, and he resorted there before any of these questions had arisen. He is there recruiting his energies and his strength, and wisely, and, I hope, well, too. If he has transferred to the mountains of New Hampshire the scene of the negotiation upon this subject, I beg Senators not to think that the latitude is at all unpropitious to a negotiation which will maintain the dignity and honor of this country. For, if I recollect right, it was from those mountains that issued only one or two years ago, that famous dispatch which established the relation of the United States to the despotic Powers of Europe—the Hülsemann letter. I do not know, nor do I care, whether the honorable representative of the Government of Great Britain has resorted to Boston for the purpose of meeting and negotiating with the Secretary of State. If it be true, it is well. The negotiation can be conducted as well there as elsewhere; and if it be not true, the Secretary of State has given abundant evidence in the publications which have already appeared upon the subject, that he is alive to the interest involved in this question, and that he is sound with regard to national interests, as, indeed, we all know, that he is loyal and devoted to the dignity and honor of his country. While, therefore, I shall vote for the resolution, I do not think the occasion calls for unnecessary excitement on the subject.

Mr. RUSK. I do not design to enter into this debate at any length; but from the very statement of the case, it seems to me that the conduct of Great Britain in this business should be met promptly, on our side. It is supposed by some Senators to be designed to bring about an enactment for reciprocity of trade on our part with the British colonies. If that be so, I will never give a vote for such a measure under such circumstances, no matter what may be the consequences. I will never yield to any threats made by the British Government, and cannon will be found to be the least available argument that could be used.

It is said, upon the other hand, that it is for the purpose of bringing about a negotiation by which the British Government will acquire rights in another quarter similar to those which they have acceded to us on the northern coast, and which we claim there. Sir, is this the way to negotiate? Is this the time when negotiations are to be opened between Great Britain and the United States, after ordering a strong naval force there? Can we negotiate at the cannon's mouth? No, sir, I would not negotiate, nor would I sanction a negotiation, nor stop to inquire into the justice of a negotiation brought about under such circumstances. I think it is due to ourselves to protect our rights, and if we would do it, it is necessary to meet this demonstration on the part of Great Britain with a similar demonstration. I would do nothing to bring on a war; I know the evil consequences which would result from a war, but I would not submit to this domineering spirit which has manifested itself too much in all the conduct of Great Britain with other nations. We have equal rights, and under such circumstances we owe it to ourselves to maintain them—some time or other we may be compelled to do it. If England chooses to negotiate with cannon, we can negotiate with similar instruments, and whenever the time comes, we shall be ready to do it. She will find she has blows to receive as well as blows to give. She has interests to be sacrificed upon the ocean as well as we have. War will be as injurious to her as to us, and she will find to her cost that a demonstration of a strong naval force will be of but little avail in carrying out any views she may have in this matter. I shall most cheerfully vote for the resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON.]

Mr. MASON. I desire to be indulged in one word, that I may put the matter right, so far as I am concerned, having originated the resolution. I can assure the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] as well as the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] that I never had it in contemplation, nor have I expressed any such purpose in this matter, as to substitute war for negotiation. Sir, if Great Britain had been content to submit this matter to negotiation, either upon our shores, or upon their island, I should not have called for the information. I would have left the matter in the hands of the executive branch of the Government, to which it properly belongs. But, when we are informed that a large and unusual naval force has been sent, with dispatch and celerity, into those waters, preliminary to negotiation, I want to express to the Senate, that if negotiations have begun I would stop them. I would not exchange one word, or write one line on the subject of these fisheries, until that force be withdrawn. I wished to express that purpose. Sir, we are to be considered in possession of these fisheries—a possession, whether rightfully or wrongfully obtained, acquiesced in by the other Power for thirty-odd years; and the first intimation which the American people have had of any dispute, are some twenty vessels of war ordered immediately to these waters. I know not for what purpose the Secretary of State has gone to Massachusetts; I know not for what purpose the British Minister has gone there, (if he has gone there.) But I do know this: That if that honorable Secretary, for whose intellect no one entertains a higher respect than I do, exchanges one word with that Minister, or pens one line, until that force is withdrawn, he will disappoint the expectations of his countrymen.

Mr. TOUCEY. I trust that nothing has been said, or will be said, in this place, that will operate adversely to the important interest which is involved. I concur most fully in the sentiments of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] with regard to the magnitude of that interest. It has ever been cherished by the Government and people of this country as one of the very highest importance, not merely as a profitable employment, but as a nursery for seamen. I feel, myself, entire confidence that nothing which has been said, or will be said, in this Senate, will operate adversely to that interest. I must say, however, that, if it be proposed to open a negotiation on the subject, under the mouths of British cannon, it is a mode of initiating it that does not commend itself to my judgment as a citizen of this country, or as a member of this Senate. After we have been in possession of this right, we and our ancestors, from the first settlement of this country down to the present moment, without the slightest interruption; after the British Government, during a period of more than thirty years, have acquiesced in the enjoyment of it under the treaty of 1818, by our northern fishermen, are we now to be interrupted in it, and to have a negotiation forced on us in this hostile way? I trust, sir, that no Government of this country will ever open a negotiation in regard to any interest in this exceptionable and, I may say, humiliating manner. I may say that if the Executive is desirous of conducting this matter in a spirit becoming the American people, the first step will be a demand for the withdrawal of the British naval force.

And what, sir, is the meaning of this notice which has been sent to the public prints by the Secretary of State? What is its object? I should like to hear the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] explain the object of that notice, issued from the State Department to the public. Is it that our fishermen should withdraw from those waters which they have been accustomed to frequent, before the negotiation is commenced? Is it that we are to abandon our rights, and then open a negotiation under British cannon? Is that the object? If it be, it is a mode of opening and conducting it, that I think this country will not very cordially approve of.

I am sorry that I have not that confidence in the Executive which, perhaps, I ought to have. After what I have witnessed in Central America; after what I have witnessed on the coast of Cuba; after what I have witnessed in reference to this matter thus far, I confess that my confidence in the Executive is not as strong, as, perhaps, it ought to be.

It seems, indeed, that the British Government is rather disposed to pursue a hostile course towards us, not only in Central America, not only in sending forces into the neighborhood of Cuba, but in sending this large force to the neighborhood of Nova Scotia.

I return my thanks to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON,] who has introduced this resolution. I am very glad that the subject has been introduced here; for I am constrained to think that perhaps the Executive Department may need a little prompting—prompting, at least, by forcing on it a knowledge of the intense interest felt on the subject, and the importance attached to it by the Senate, if nowhere else.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] says that the claim of Great Britain is, that we shall not enter a bay where the capes are not six miles apart. Does the honorable Senator suppose that that is the extent of the claim which is made? Is he well informed on that subject? I had myself supposed that their proposition was to draw a line from one cape to another without limiting it to a distance within six, or ten, or twenty, or forty miles, and then to require us to keep three miles outside of that line. That, as I understand, is the claim of the British Government; and the force that is sent into British waters and our waters there, is for the purpose of enforcing that claim, contrary to the practical construction put upon the treaty from 1818 down to the present day; and that force is sent there without notice, and sent, too, in the fishing season, so that vessels engaged there are seized, without warning, for a violation of this new interpretation of the treaty of 1818.

I express again my gratification that the Senator from Virginia has presented this resolution. I shall vote for it with great cordiality, and I trust the consequences growing out of it will be only such as will conduce to the safety of this great public interest.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, I honor the motive which prompted the introduction of this resolution; but I am sorry to be obliged to say that I do not consider the course which the discussion has taken is in character with the motives which prompted it. Facts have been assumed for the purpose of discussing this question, with a view not precisely intended to be involved when the information shall come in. If I understand the reason of this resolution being offered, it is that the Senate is without legitimate information on the question, and that it is desirable to have it in order that we may thereby shape our action; and, in getting at this information, intimations too strong to be misunderstood, objects too clear to be misinterpreted, have been inferred and commented upon.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. TOUCEY] says that the Executive probably may want prompting on this question; that he does not understand the feelings of the country, and particularly the feeling exhibited here! When has he ever exhibited a want of interest in any great question? From what public or political act of his can you infer that he has been sleeping on his post when the honor and interest of the country were involved? What act of his ever authorized a Senator to rise in his place upon this floor and presume that he has not discharged his duty? What circumstance has been suggested here that would influence the mind of any Senator so as to lead him to suppose that he is not now acting upon the question on the information which he has, and is seeking for all other necessary and proper information? And when was it that he ever failed to communicate to the Senate any matter likely to involve the honor or the interest of the nation? Never, sir. Why then talk about prompting, urging, and stimulating the Executive Department of this Government to sustain its honor and its influence?

I would not have uttered one word upon this subject, but that I see everything tending to party, and to influence the public mind against the agents of the Government. Have we got to this pass, that we cannot discuss even the grave question of probable war, without first attacking the character of the representatives of the people at the head of one of the Departments? It is said that this is a great interest of the North, and that they are alive to it. And where has the North a greater man to sustain her interests, than the present Secretary of State? When is it that he has ever failed to meet any duty devolving upon him in that respect? Never, sir; never. But I am not going to be the occasion of introducing discussion. I merely reply to gentlemen by saying, that this has all occurred within three days; and yet blame is sought to be imputed to the Executive Department! Wait your time, gentlemen, with patience. First obtain your information; and if the Executive or any member of his Cabinet, has failed to discharge his duty, then stand upon that which will be understood by the people, and make your attack. But we are now standing on air—treading on nothing; and therefore we should avoid making any insinuations which might seem to be ungenerous or unkind. Even the absence of the Secretary of State has been spoken of; an absence created by the state of his health. Who supposes, Mr. President, that when a question like this arises—a question, I may say, almost involving peace or war—he, or any other man connected with the Administration of this Government, would fail in the full discharge of his duty?

But, Mr. President, I regret this for another reason. No longer ago than yesterday, in reply to the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] I stated that there was no "war cloud" now lowering over us; but how seasonably this reminds me of what is said in the best of books that we "know not what a day or an hour may bring forth." Can it be that all this talk of war, which we hear this morning, was intended to frustrate my prediction of yesterday? [Laughter.] Sir, the people may well inquire why this discussion, with this reference to subjects upon which we have no information, should have arisen; and why war should have been spoken of here to-day. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. Adams] has unquestionably put this matter in its proper light. He spoke of it as it ought to be spoken of. He said, "You have no official information, and why will you needlessly alarm the country?" Let us, then, wait with patience. This is Friday. We can have the information by to-morrow or Monday; but in the mean time I much fear that the public mind will become filled with apprehensions. The telegraphic wires will convey the information over the length and breadth of the Union, that the question of war has been discussed here; that gentlemen have risen in passion, asking for information when they had none; and yet went on to talk about war, and about the guns of a foreign country being brought to bear upon us; and that the Government of this country would be forced to treat under the pointed artillery of an enemy! Sir, I ask, in all candor and seriousness, are these facts? No, sir, they are mere imaginings—mere expressions of gentlemen whose minds are not informed as to the actual facts; and yet it will go from one end of the country to the other, that there is a "cloud of war" lowering over the country, when nobody seriously believes any such thing. Hence it is that I say, that I honor the motive which prompted this resolution of inquiry, in order that the public mind may be quieted in regard to the matter. Is there a Senator here who supposes for a moment that the resolution will result in the communication to this body of any grounds on which we shall have occasion to talk about war? Not one, sir; not one.

The papers which have been spoken of as having been published in relation to this subject, really amount to nothing. So far as I can comprehend the subject, I can really see nothing but what is amicable between the two nations. I am in favor of the resolution, and hope it will be passed.

Mr. TOUCEY. I will reply to the question which the Senator from Georgia has addressed to me by asking a question. Why has there been issued from the Department of State the letter which has appeared in the public prints? and why has not the Executive, instead of that, sent a naval force to protect the fishermen in the enjoyment of their rights?

Mr. DAWSON. Does the gentleman desire an answer to that question now?

Mr. TOUCEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWSON. I presume that if the fishermen have been deprived of their accustomed rights, and the President has been informed of it, he has discharged his duty. If those statements, with regard to the fishermen being injured in their just rights, be true, show them to be so, and present to me the papers in which the declaration is made.

Mr. TOUCEY. Does the Senator from Georgia say that the President has sent a naval force to our northern waters for the purpose of protecting our fishermen?

Mr. DAWSON. Did you understand me to say so?

Mr. TOUCEY. I understood the Senator to intimate it, and I wish him to be explicit.

Mr. DAWSON. I will respond to the inquiry, because in arguing a question in the Senate I take every gentleman upon his own statements. He propounded to me the question, why has not the President done so and so, and asked me to respond. I reply, that if his facts be true I would presume that the President had discharged his duty.

Mr. TOUCEY. The answer of the gentleman is, that he presumes the President has discharged his duty. How has he discharged his duty? What has the Executive done? The Secretary of State has issued a notice to the fishermen, and I can conceive of no object of that notice, except that it is to induce them to yield to the British claim. There has been time to send a force there. What vessel, what naval force, has gone there or has been ordered there? If there has been a movement of that kind it ought to have been public. No information has been communicated to Congress, and, so far as the public know, nothing has been done. And now the facts to which I have adverted justify me, I think, in saying that we have not the evidence of there having been those prompt and decisive measures which the country demands.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] is altogether mistaken in saying we have no information on this subject. If the Secretary of State be capable of communicating information, and is worthy of belief, we have information from him. We have, as I have said, publications in the newspapers, over his own signature, as Secretary of State, that Great Britain has ordered this large naval force there, and that there is danger of that force coming in hostile collision with our people; and the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, as I understand it, is based upon that information, and very natural inferences from it. Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, has published to the world, through the newspapers, that such has been the action of the British Government, and he has given a sort of politico-historical account, somewhat in detail, of this fishery question. And, as part of its present aspect, he says that an American fishing vessel has already been taken by the British naval force there, and carried into a British port; that a number of our citizens, with their property, while engaged in their usual pursuits, and in the exercise of rights not questioned for thirty years, and entitled to our protection, have been captured on the high seas by an authorized British naval force, and carried prisoners into a British port, and there detained for trial by British courts. It is true, sir, we learn, from another source, and I rejoice at it, that, in the spirit which belongs to and becomes our people, a sufficient number from other vessels organized and armed themselves, and pursued the marauders, and "cut the vessel out" again, leaving her commander, it is said, still a prisoner.

Such are the publications, and they are not disputed. Now, if that be not information upon which to act, I should like to know what would be the character of information to induce the Senator to act? It is in the face of these facts, as published to the world by the Secretary of State, that we ask for what else the Executive may know, what he has done, and what he means to do. We surely are entitled to such further information—indeed, we need it, if we mean to do our duty, and do it intelligently and effectively.

Mr. DAWSON. The Senator will perceive that I am in favor of the resolution. I have announced that fact, and you are entitled to that. The gentleman goes on discussing a point that I never raised, one way or the other.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator said we had no information upon which it was proper to act.

Mr. DAWSON. Upon which it was proper to make an attack upon the Executive branch of the Government. That was the issue.

Mr. BORLAND. As to the declaration of the Senator that these things occurred so long ago as the sixth of July, the letter of the Secretary of State is dated on the twentieth instant, only three days ago; and as far as we have any knowledge at all on the subject it has all come to us within three days. If it was so long ago as the Senator has said, there might be time for the first flush of excitement to have passed away, and the Senator might well say that it was out of place now. Perhaps there is not so much excitement as the Senator supposes—not so much as may lead to war. But if there be no cause for excitement, when, upon the authority of the Secretary of State, we are told that our citizens have been interfered with in the rightful pursuit of their business—that their rights have been violated, their persons violated, and their property taken by an armed force,—if the Senator finds no cause for excitement in all this, and no cause of censure against an Executive that neither puts a stop to it himself, nor calls upon us to do so, then I know not when or where, or in what he would find cause. In such a state of things, I think negotiations are out of place. It is time something were done, either by the Executive or by us.

Mr. SEWARD. This is either a grave question, or it is not. If it is a trivial one, time is only wasted in discussing it. If it is a serious one, it is worth while to know what we are disputing about. Now, we certainly are not disputing about this call for information, for we are unanimously in favor of that, so far as it is possible to ascertain from the sentiments expressed by gentlemen on this floor. Then the only question about which there is any dispute is, whether any fault should be attached to the executive branch of the Government, thus far? I submit to Senators, that if there be a prospect, however dim and distant, of a war with Great Britain, it is an important and serious question, and one of the best modes for losing the advantages in a negotiation, either for securing our rights or for preventing that war, is to show the British nation at the outset that we are not agreed among ourselves; that we are taking to task the executive department of our Government, for want of sufficient promptness in securing our interests. But let that pass.

What evidence is there that the Executive has failed, or that the Secretary of State has failed, or is about to falter in securing the national rights? Why, our first knowledge of this question comes from a publication of his own, announcing it to the country, and declaring that in his opinion the right of the question was on our own side; and that very communication was made before he had time to examine the facts, and the evidence since disclosed, showing that the position assumed by the British Government is wrong, and that the position assumed by the fishermen is right. The Secretary of State is already committed. What, then, is wrong? Gentlemen say that he is proceeding to negotiate while there is an armed force collected by the opposite party, to compel us, if we will negotiate, to negotiate under threats or menaces. Sir, it is the business of the Secretary of State, and of the Government, always to be ready, in my humble judgment, to negotiate under all circumstances, whether there be threats or no threats—whether there be force or no force; but the manner, and the spirit, and the terms of the negotiation will be varied by the position that the opposing party may occupy. And there is nothing new in this. We have a treaty that is called the treaty of Washington, which settled conflicting boundary claims between the United States, embracing a portion of the State of Maine, and the Province of New Brunswick, and it was consummated, as the negotiation was held, while both parties were standing on the line ready, if the negotiation failed, to establish their respective pretensions by force.

Sir, we sent a Minister to Mexico to negotiate the payment for indemnity for commercial obligations and other claims; but at the same time we marched a force to the Rio Grande, and we afterwards dictated the terms of peace to Mexico, with a victorious army in her capital. I agree that the parties should be made equal, equal in every advantage for negotiation; and if it be true—and there seems to be ground to believe it is—that the British Government has resorted to the extremely improper measure of collecting a force in those waters, preliminary to the negotiation, then I subscribe to every word which has been uttered by the Senator from Virginia, and implied in his resolution, that we should be represented there by an equal force. One object of this resolution is to ascertain from the President whether he has sent such a force. Either we believe that he has sent such force or we believe that he has not. If we assume, with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Toucey,] that he has not, and that he is indisposed to do so, and will not, then it is an insult to the President to ask him if he has sent the force, which we have concluded in our own minds that he has not sent. We should at once proceed to a vote of censure, and not to a resolution of inquiry. If it would be proper to send a force, we are bound to believe that the Executive, which has charge of the whole case, knows the time and the manner of sending that force, and, therefore, I repeat that in the very moment we are inquiring whether a force has been sent it is discourteous to the President, as it is unwise and imprudent, to bestow censure for not having done that which we imply that we suppose he may have done, or will yet do in good season.

On the whole, I see no necessity for any excitement on this subject. A war with Great Britain will be no trifling affair, and, as I said before, we will go into either negotiation or war, and come out of it more safely, if we are to go into it, keeping cool and taking our time, and taking every advantage of circumstances which may arise. I need not say that when such an exigency comes I shall be as well prepared to meet it, its responsibilities and its consequences, and to stand as long and firmly by the national rights and dignity as any one here or elsewhere.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I do not wish to continue this discussion by going into any expression of my views on the various suggestions which have been thrown out, but I wish to say a word or two upon one point. I have listened with a great deal of interest—with more than common interest—to all that has been suggested on this subject on both sides of the Chamber. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to much that has been said. I accord with much of it; but there is one view, one suggestion—and the whole debate is very suggestive to my mind—which has not yet been thrown out.

I do not think there is any real cause to apprehend war between the two countries, growing out of this transaction, whatever it may be; and it has been very well said that we do not know all the facts bearing upon it. Certainly, sir, some portion of the discussion might very well have been postponed. But there have been certain sentiments announced which I think worthy of a passing attention from the Senate, and from the country.

I understood the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to say that, from some information within his reach, he is satisfied not only that some few vessels-of-war of Great Britain have been ordered to those grounds for the protection of the alleged rights of British fishermen, but that the extraordinary armament of twenty vessels-of-war has been ordered into those waters for the protection of British interests.

Mr. MASON. I have no other information than that contained in the public journals of the day. I stated that I obtained that information as to the extent of the British armament from a newspaper of St. Johns, New Brunswick, setting out the armament, and stating its objects, which I took to be authentic.

Mr. BELL. That was a very good foundation upon which to base the remark. There must be no great reason to doubt—I believe it is not doubted at all, that some unusual force has been ordered to that station—some armament beyond the usual extent. I hinted at the amount of it for the special purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to it.

The honorable Senator has also announced the sentiment, that if it be true that any armament has been sent to those waters, all negotiation ought to cease, if there has been any projected negotiation.

Mr. MASON. Not at all. I announced this, that the presence of an unusual armed force almost in our own waters, sent there with dispatch and celerity as a preliminary to negotiations, had been stated in the public journals; and if that were true, in my estimate of the spirit of the American people, they would require that armament to be withdrawn before any negotiations were entered into.

Mr. BELL. I understood the honorable Senator, perhaps, not exactly as he has stated it now; but I understood him to announce that there seemed to be authentic information that it was in connection with a negotiation—not that the British Government had sent this armament there as a preliminary to a negotiation, but that in their instructions to their officers, it was expressly stated that it was in connection with a pending negotiation. Upon the assumption that this was true, I understood the Senator from Virginia to announce that all negotiation ought to cease.

If it be that that force is ordered there as a preliminary to a negotiation, I will not say what would be the soundness of the policy of the British Government in commencing a negotiation by such an order issuing from her Admiralty, or from any other department of her Government; but I will say that if it be as assumed by the honorable Senator from Virginia, his sentiment was a correct one. If it was for the purpose of intimidating and overawing this country by the superiority of the British force, and thus commencing a negotiation with an armed battery of a thousand or two thousand guns, then it would be a question whether negotiation ought not to be terminated until they were withdrawn.

I did not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of going into the particular details of this business; for we are really somewhat in the dark as regards what they are. But there are some, which seem to me of sufficient authority to base some action of this body upon them. I rose merely for the purpose of expressing this sentiment: that if Great Britain has thought proper to array this force upon those waters in connection with a negotiation, and for the purpose of forcing a reciprocity treaty (for which she has so much desire) between her North American Provinces and the United States; and if she has, whether wisely or unwisely, thought proper to order these armaments into those waters for that purpose, then I rejoice that she has done so. Not that I think war will grow out of it; for I believe there is too much good sense and intelligence in the two countries to suffer a war to grow out even of a menacing and insulting attitude—such as that taken by Great Britain. She will find some way, consistent with her honor, to recede from her position, if she has taken it. But I repeat the sentiment—if she has done so, I rejoice at it.

Honorable Senators have said they feared the Executive of the United States had not met this question with the true national spirit with which he ought to have met it; that he should have ordered an adequate force immediately for the protection of our interests in those waters. Honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber particularly have spoken with that spirit of resoluteness and determination that indicated that they were ready to meet Great Britain at once in this controversy, with guns and with naval armaments, if it were proper in that way to maintain the honor and dignity of the country.

I say again, sir, that I rejoice, or shall rejoice, if Great Britain has taken this position, trusting that it will not lead to any serious difficulties between the two countries. I rejoice at it because I trust that it will serve to wake up this country to its true position, that we are not in a condition either in regard to the fisheries or our interests in the States south of us, or in regard to the islands on the Pacific coast, to negotiate on precisely equal terms with such a Power as Great Britain. Sir, she has some twenty-odd thousand guns on her floating batteries to back her diplomatic agents, when she sends them abroad. She has great advantages over us. Still, great as they are, I know the American spirit is ready to maintain the honor of this country against all odds. I am rejoiced to see even the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] waking up upon this subject, and ready to meet Great Britain. I have understood that there has been a proposition made in another Hall to curtail the appropriations for the Navy, from the very moderate estimates sent in by the Executive Government, fully one third. And I would like to know of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. TOUCER], where are our twenty ships-of-war, to meet the twenty British ships-of-war on those waters? We may have a greater number than that—I do not know exactly how many—on our various commercial posts on the Atlantic coast, on the Mediterranean, in the East Indies, or on the Pacific coast. I do not know how many of these are in proper condition for service. I question whether we have altogether in our Navy more than twenty or thirty vessels in proper condition to be sent out to meet this squadron of twenty ships, which is not one twentieth part of the British Navy fit for service. I call the attention of honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber particularly to this question. I wish them to remember it when we come to the subject of making appropriations for the Navy.

On a former day I threw out the intimation, that, if I had the power, I would vote five millions extra, for making experiments in regard to the building up of a navy, so as to have a respectable force on the Pacific coast; though such a force would not be equal to half or one tenth that of Great Britain, or France, yet, with a good force there, you would be in a position, without the probability of absolute and shameful disaster, to meet any Power from abroad that might think proper to insult us.

I repeat again, that I apprehend no war with Great Britain in regard to this question; but I think this a fit occasion, not only to call the attention of the Senate, but, so far as I can, to call the attention of the country to our miserably defenseless condition; to call attention to the condition in which we would be if our honor compelled us to meet the power of Great Britain, as some think there is danger we shall be compelled to do. I have not the least idea that a war will grow out of the transaction. The truth is, we would be in a condition to be overawed—or ordinary people would be in such a condition—except for the indomitable energy, courage, and self-sacrificing spirit of this country, for every gentleman must know that, to meet Great Britain promptly at this time, must be a great sacrifice, not to the honor of the country, but to the safety of many of the most exposed parts of the country; and the safety of our dominion in one quarter of the world. Still our honor would be preserved after all; and finally, perhaps, history would have no occasion to record, that the United States had ever succumbed to any power, however superior. The only object for which I arose was to call attention to this fact.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I am unwilling to prolong this discussion, but a remark of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] calls for a word from me. He expressed his gratification to find that I—even I—was waking up to the interests and honor of this country. Sir, I am but an humble member here, and do not often take part in discussions upon the general policy of the Government, confining myself more particularly, as I think becomes me, to the special interests of my immediate constituents; but I am not aware that I have made a remark here, or given a vote, or failed to give a vote, that has indicated anything like indifference to any question of importance—to any measure involving the national defenses.

Mr. BELL. Perhaps I did not explain sufficiently what I intended by the allusion to the honorable Senator. I referred to his sentiments, expressed some weeks ago, in relation to the expenditures of this Government upon the Navy.

Mr. BORLAND. Such, I supposed, was the Senator's allusion, and that is the point to which I wish to come. I find no necessity for changing the opinions then expressed upon that subject, in view of what some Senators seem to regard as a cloud of war. I do not anticipate that war will grow out of this any more than the honorable Senator from Tennessee does. But even if I did, it would not change the opinions I sincerely entertained, and decidedly expressed, in regard to appropriations. I did not, and do not now, object to full, abundant appropriations for all purposes of national defense. The point of my objection was, that unnecessarily large and extravagant expenditures had been made in a time of peace. But let war actually come, or impending danger of war, and I shall be as ready as the honorable Senator from Tennessee, or any other Senator, to vote not only as much as the twelve millions per annum for the Army, and eight millions for the Navy, which I complained, the other day, that this Administration had expended in a time of profound "peace with all the world;" but I will vote fifty millions, if necessary, without hesitation—nay, sir, the last dollar now in the Treasury, or which the entire means of the people could pay into it, if it were to protect their interests or their honor.

I do not object to sufficient defenses, or the means of paying for them. But we are not deficient, either in means or preparation for defense. I do not agree with Senators who say we are in a defenseless condition. I do not think, with the Senator from Tennessee, that there is any necessity or propriety in expending "five millions extra" to put ourselves in a better state of defense. We are now the best defended people upon the face of the earth. I do not agree with the Senator that, if war should come, we are so exposed to the incursions of the enemy, by land or water, that our interests would materially suffer before we could give blow for blow, and drive him from our shores, and even from the sea. Such is the spirit and character of our people, fostered and developed by our institutions, that ten days would not be suffered to elapse from the first sound of war, before every assailable point would be prepared, as no other people could prepare, to receive all comers, and defy the world in arms. Such is my opinion of my country and my countrymen.

It is a remarkable fact, Mr. President, and I think it is not out of place to notice it here, that, in looking back through the history of our Government, especially to the war period of 1812, and since that time, in every dispute, or hostile collision, with a foreign nation, without an exception that now occurs to me, there has been a party in our country, and represented in the two Houses of Congress, which has invariably taken sides with that foreign country, and against our own. Or, if they have not actually taken sides against us, they have, at least, held back the word of encouragement, and often the helping hand, when we have needed them to sustain the interest and honor of home. Such things I do not charge against the Senator from Tennessee in person—far from it. But the old elements of that same party are yet organized in this country, and are not without representatives in the two Houses of Congress. Of this, and its line of demarkation, we have proof in this discussion here to-day.

Sir, it may be no unfit occasion to say a word in reply to the inquiry which was made on the other side of the Chamber, as to where was the ground of apprehension that the present distinguished Secretary of State would not be found true to the interests of his countrymen, when brought in collision with the interests of other countries, and Great Britain especially? I may remind the Senators who ask that question, that in the war of 1812, growing out of interests similar to those of these very fishermen, the distinguished Secretary of State, then a member of the other House, denounced and opposed the war, and used terms of reproach against those who were engaged in it, and the protection of whose rights had led to it; and if my information is not greatly at fault, uttered that notable exclamation, "Let them starve and freeze!" That gentleman then, and those adhering to him, denounced the war in terms which I will not now disgust the ears of an American Senate, or an American people, by repeating. Even when the war was over, and the patriotic hearts of our people, from one end of this Union to the other, were pouring out their gratitude to God for the success of our arms, and congratulating one another upon the glory which rested upon our flag, fresh from the fields of that war, the present Secretary of State, and those who adhered to him, instead of joining in that expression of gratitude, and in that voice of congratulation, declared it to be unworthy of a Christian people to rejoice at the result of such a war. I do not undertake to say that the distinguished Secretary of State himself used these precise expressions; but we know, as well as we know any other thing in our history, that the party to which he belonged, and of which he was considered the head and leader, in the other House of Congress, did utter expressions such as that; and that division upon the opinions and sentiments then entertained and thus expressed, marked the line of separation between the political parties of that day, and which have continued their separate existence until now. From that day to this, whenever disputes or collisions have arisen between our own country and another, and anyone has advocated, has demanded, prompt and energetic action, to vindicate the rights of our own, opposition and rebuke have never failed to make themselves seen and heard on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ADAMS] has well expressed my opinion. I think that we admit, by the resolution which is now before us, that we are not furnished with the information which is desirable and necessary for the understanding of this question; else it is to be presumed we should not ask for it. Well, sir, in the absence of information—when we are but half informed, or not informed at all—we are proceeding to discuss, and almost to determine, this whole matter. We determine first, and consider afterwards. I think that is a reversal of all proper course of proceeding. I do not know, sir, what course the Administration will take; but I think it scarcely liberal to throw upon them at this time the suspicion of being wanting in patriotism and public spirit. Still less do I think it fair in the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] to give, as the basis of that suspicion of his, the supposition which he seems to entertain, that the Secretary of State, at a time to which the memory of man can scarcely run, as mine certainly does not, did express some opinions very disgusting, as he says, to American ears. I do not recollect the whole course of that distinguished man; but I know this, that he was not a member of the Congress which declared war against Great Britain, and that many years ago, when he was charged in this Senate with being wanting in public spirit during the war of 1812, he replied with great vigor, and defied the production of any evidence to show that he was wanting in the most loyal patriotism, or any vote or opinion of his inconsistent with honorable and patriotic conduct. He said he differed from the dominant party of that day as to the course which should be pursued in the conduct of the war, that it had been written of Great Britain by one of her sweetest poets that—

"Her march is o'er the mountain wave,
Her home is on the deep,"

and that during the war of 1812, he was for meeting her at that home; he was for intercepting her on that march; he was for giving play to the gallant spirit of our Navy, and teaching Great Britain that we were not strangers on the bosom of the deep. I do not believe, sir, that any unpatriotic expression, such as the Senator from Arkansas has referred to, ever escaped the lips of that eminent man during the war of 1812, or at any other time. And when charges were rung most loudly and repeatedly against him here in this Hall, twelve or thirteen years ago, I never heard such language imputed to him.

But be this as it may, what course is the Administration to take? Are they to assume, as gentlemen here assume, that the British have sent a fleet to the waters of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to overawe us, that we may be compelled to negotiate at the mouth of the cannon? I am not willing to assume it. I think a regard for the honor and dignity of the country—a consciousness of the regard, and for our nation's dignity and courage, which other nations must entertain, would prevent them from assuming that. I think that if the Secretary of State, or the Executive, were to call upon the British Government to say whether such was the purpose of sending their fleet to the waters of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, they would promptly disavow it. The British Government would probably say that they have had, ever since the treaty of 1818, and before that time, vessels cruising upon that station for the purpose of protecting their fishermen in their just rights, and that this increased force was sent for this purpose, and no other. If they should say that, who could doubt that they said that which they had a right to say, and were doing that which they had a right to do? We would not hesitate to send our fleet to protect our fishermen, under similar circumstances, and would not think ourselves liable to a suspicion of offering a national insult if we did so. I have no doubt, therefore, that this purpose would be promptly disavowed.

But, says the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. TORCEX], and I think some other Senators, that it is due to ourselves that we should send a fleet to the same waters to which the British have ordered their fleet—to their waters. I do not see that Senator now in his seat, and I regret it, for I should like to know from him what instructions he thinks the Executive ought to give to the commander of the fleet sent to those waters, because it would very much depend upon that, whether such a demonstration would be harmless, ridiculous, or pernicious. Should we send a fleet without instructions? To do so would be a farce. To send them with one set of instructions would be almost as ridiculous; and to send them with another might involve the country in war, and subject the President to impeachment.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will indulge me for an instant, I will state to him what is my view of the subject. It is this: that if the British Government have sent a large and unusual naval force into the seas adjacent to their possessions in North America—where American citizens were in the habit of fishing unmolested—with instructions, as we are informed, to interfere with the rights asserted by these American fishermen, whether well or ill-founded, under a construction alleged to be placed by the British Government upon the convention of 1818; and if the American Executive is informed that such a movement has taken place on the part of the British Government, it was his imperious duty at once to order an adequate naval force into those seas, to protect American citizens in the exercise of their rights under the treaty.

Now, sir, as to the danger of collision, I put this to the honorable Senator from Maryland: the British Government have taken the initiative, and they either expected a collision, or they did not. If they expected a collision, they were not deterred in their movements by that expectation. If they did not expect a collision, they expected us to acquiesce tamely in this national offense on their part—for it is a national offense, according to international law to send without explanation, and without notice, such a fleet, on such an occasion, to these waters.

Mr. PEARCE. I think the Senator is trenching on my time.

Mr. MASON. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator, but to give him my view of the subject. He asked what instructions should be given to our naval commanders if sent on such a mission. I will tell him what instructions. I would suggest to instruct the naval commander to preserve the rights of the American fisherman in statu quo; to let him fish where he has been accustomed to fish for the last thirty years; and if he was interfered with by the British naval power, to protect him; and I would do it for the very purpose of avoiding a collision between the two countries.

Mr. PEARCE. There are a great many ifs and buts in the statement of the honorable Senator from Virginia. It is much more qualified in that respect than the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. TORCEX]. I do not understand the latter Senator to put any of these contingencies in the case at all, but to assume that it is now the duty of the President of the United States to send a fleet into the waters of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I said that much would depend upon the character of the instructions given to the commander of such a fleet. Much would depend upon the purposes of the British Government—and of those purposes the Senator understands no more than myself. It is a matter of pure conjecture. If the commander of such a fleet is to be instructed to protect our fishermen in their just rights, who is to tell him, or is he himself to be the judge, when their just rights are invaded? Is the Executive to transfer his duty of construing a treaty to a captain of a man-of-war? How shall he give him definite instructions? Shall he leave it to the commander to say which are the broad waters of the ocean common to all nations, and which are those in which we fish by license?

The Senator says our fishermen are to exercise their just rights, as they have for thirty years past. Who knows how they have exercised their just rights for thirty years past? Is this Government prepared to say on what part of the coast of the British Provinces, and within what distance from the shore they have invariably fished for thirty years past? May it not be that our fishing vessels have encroached from time to time? Do we not know the fact that they have done so?

Our fishing vessels have been captured more than once in the course of the last thirty years for the violations of treaty. Is the captain of a man-of-war to determine the questions that may arise, some of them, perhaps, very nice and subtle? Or is he to be sent there with general instructions to protect our fishermen, and be left to the guidance of his own discretion and the conjectures he may make as to the proper construction of the treaty? Or, on the other hand, is he to be sent there and be told, if you find a British vessel capturing an American fishing-smack in British waters, or within the waters of a bay whose entrance is not above six miles wide, open your broadside upon him? Now, sir, when the Executive does that, I think he will assume a power for which the Congress of the United States will be very apt to call him to account, and a very solemn account, while the country, too, would demand a reckoning. It would be assuming a power which does not belong to the Chief Magistrate of this country; it would be forcing this country into a war, when the power of making war resides in Congress, and in Congress alone. I think, sir, that, without stimulating the Executive by fiery discussion here, we may safely intrust the honor of the country and the interests of our Northern fishermen in his hands. No American statesman is likely to betray the one or sacrifice the other. With a full sense of his responsibility to the country and his own stainless reputation, and with much fuller knowledge than we now have of the subject, we may expect him to discharge his whole duty.

But I do not wish to violate the rule which I announced as the proper one when I set out—that is, that it is not wise to discuss a subject when we are not furnished with the necessary information in regard to it; and I conclude with the hope that the discussion will not be pursued further, and that the resolution may either be passed at once, or, if there is to be further debate, that it may be postponed till another day.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I suppose, from the lateness of the hour, that this day cannot be devoted to the object for which it was designed. I differ in some degree from those Senators who have spoken on this subject; and that difference of opinion, in my own mind, brings me to the conclusion that there is a much stronger probability of a collision with Great Britain than is expressed by the Senators who have spoken. Great Britain has said that she now claims the exclusive right of fisheries on those waters. Mr. Webster, the representative of this Government, has said that under the convention of 1818 the citizens of the United States are entitled to fish there. Here, then, the two Governments are directly at issue. Great Britain has sent an unusually large fleet there to protect her citizens in the alleged rights assumed by her Government. We have the letter of instructions from the British Admiral to the commanders of the vessels composing that fleet, which says that our citizens are to be prevented from fishing in those waters as they have done from 1818 to the present time. Mr. Webster assumes not only that this is the legitimate construction of the treaty of 1818, but that the British Government have subsequently, in 1845, admitted our construction to be the correct and legitimate construction of the treaty of 1818. Now, sir, when the two Governments stand in this attitude; when here is the British fleet instructed by the Admiral in command to take possession of our vessels pursuing what our Government says is their legitimate right, is there no danger of collision?

Our fleet ought to be sent there—and it can be sent with but one object—with instructions upon the part of our Government precisely similar to those sent on the part of Great Britain. We have the letter of their Admiral directing their vessels to take possession of our fishing boats, and to capture our seamen engaged in this business, which our Secretary of State says—which our Government says, is the legitimate right of every citizen of the United States. Now, when our vessels go there, they can go there properly with but one instruction—that if the British Government enforce that order it must be prevented by force. As my colleague says, it is all a farce to send a fleet there unless you send such instructions.

Each Government has assumed its attitude upon the subject, the one claiming for its citizens the exclusive right of fishery, the other assuming a claim upon the part of our citizens of the right to fish. The British Government have sent their vessels there for the purpose of preventing the exercise of that right by our citizens. If we send, as we ought to send, a fleet there, it should be with instructions that if the British attempt to carry out the orders of their Admiral, our naval force must prevent it—that if it is to be done by force it must be prevented. I therefore see in the attitude of this question, a greater probability of war than I did with reference to the "54° 40'" question, or with reference to any position in which the country has been placed within my recollection.

It seems to me that the whole argument here to-day has proceeded upon a false hypothesis. It is assumed that the British Government have sent their vessels there in order to treat. Why, sir, the sentiment avowed by my friend from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] that the people of this country, the Government of this country, will never consent to treat at the cannon's mouth, is well known to the British Government. It is as well known to the British Government, as it is known, Mr. President, to you or me. There is not a Government on the face of the civilized globe that does not now know that no treaty can be made with the American Government, if it be attempted to be done by force, however desirous this Government might otherwise be to make the treaty which the other Government proposed. It is known to Great Britain; and therefore I assume that she has no intention to treat. She would not have sent her fleet there if she had desired to treat on that or any other subject. There is not a man in the country who would submit to treat with her, if the fact assumed, no doubt correctly, by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. Mason] be correct. Great Britain, therefore, does not pretend to treat. She has assumed her attitude on this subject. It is this: That she has the exclusive right to these fisheries. She intends, at the cannon's mouth, to protect her subjects in what she has proclaimed to be their rights. We cannot be left in doubt on that point, because we have here the letter of her Admiral, published by our Secretary of State, setting forth that fact.

I think the people of this country should not be lulled into security about this matter. I think there is great danger of collision with Great Britain in regard to this subject. I have no doubt that the Executive Department of this Government has done as much as any Senator would desire it to do. I have no doubt that the necessary steps have already been taken to provide a sufficient naval force to protect our seamen in what our Government has proclaimed to be their rights; and when the naval force of this country goes there, I do not see how a collision is to be avoided. The British Admiral must withdraw his orders, or those under his orders must not obey them, or a collision is inevitable—it cannot be avoided. Is there an officer in the American Navy, who, if sent there for this purpose, would permit an American vessel to be captured without firing his guns into those who were about to capture her, however unequal the force might be?

I certainly did not rise to defend the Administration. It can need no defense from me. The members composing it are about to retire from public life. The gentleman who has been most assailed has retired, or will retire very shortly. I think that the violent assaults on that gentleman might at least have been dispensed with. His age, the services which he has heretofore rendered to his country, ought to have protected him, it seems to me, in this, the theater of his fame, from the violent attack which has been made upon him by my honorable friend from Arkansas. I need not say anything in this Hall with regard to the character of Daniel Webster. I will not attempt it. We all know him. The American people all know him. There is no necessity for political asperity to rail against him, for he is about to retire from public life forever; and he should rest in the affections of the American people. His talents should be admired, as I believe they are, by the people at large, and should be free, I think, from any violent political attack.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed the Senate bill supplementary to "An act providing for the taking of the Seventh and subsequent Censuses of the United States, and to fix the number of the members of the House of Representatives, and provide for their future apportionment amongst the several States," approved May 23, 1850.

Also, a bill to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads and macadamized turnpikes passing through the public land belonging to the United States.

The last-mentioned bill was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADDITIONAL SCHOOL LANDS.

The bill allowing exchanges of, and granting additional school lands in the several States which contain public lands, and for other purposes, came up on its third reading.

Mr. BORLAND. I will state to the Senate that since that bill was ordered to be engrossed yesterday, I myself, together with the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, have examined it with a great deal of care, and although it expresses really what is intended, yet, owing to its having been made up by amendments, the phraseology of the bill is not perhaps as clear and specific as it might be. For that reason I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to substitute another bill which I have prepared. It is the same in substance as this, but varying somewhat in the order of its arrangement.

The PRESIDENT. The bill can only be amended at this stage by unanimous consent.

Mr. BORLAND. The amendment which I propose is to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That there shall be, and hereby is, granted to each of the States which contain public lands, and to which one section only in each township has heretofore been granted for the use of schools, one additional section of land of good quality for each township within said States, which additional section is hereby granted for the use of schools within such townships; the said additional section to be selected under the authority of said States respectively, either as a whole section, or in any legal subdivisions within the township that may remain subject to sale by private entry, or should none such remain in the same township, then the selection may be made in each case from any lands within the limits of the State subject to sale by private entry, to be entered and recorded at the proper land office of the district in which the selected land may lie, and a proper conveyance made therefor in the usual form.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the land authorized to be selected and granted by the first section of this act, or by any preceding acts for similar purposes, or any part of the same, may be, by the proper authorities, disposed of in accordance with the laws now in force in relation to such lands in each of the States respectively.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion the Senate adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 23, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is upon ordering the following bill to be engrossed and read a third time, viz: "A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, commencing at the village of Pontiac, in the county of Oakland, and terminating on the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in the county of Ottawa."

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 276, entitled "An act for the relief of Colonel James R. Creedy," for the purpose of its reference.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. POLK. I rise to a privileged question. In justice to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] I consider it proper to state that desiring to be absent from the city of Washington, he requested that I would pair off with him on the vote upon the Collins line of steamers—I being for and he against it. I did so. During his absence the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMMOND] asked me to assign to him the pair off, as he wished to leave for Maryland. Being doubtful whether I would at the time leave the city or not, I assigned it to him. When I found that I had to leave, I paired off with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.] On my return, upon a conversation with Mr. HAMMOND, I learned that he apprehended the assignment was to apply only till Saturday. He told me that when he found there was some doubt upon the subject he ceased to vote. He did not vote when it was explained to him. I make this statement that the gentleman from Kentucky may be correct upon the record.

Mr. CLARK. I ask that Senate bill No. 316, be taken from the table in order that it may be referred.

Mr. DUNCAN. What does the bill provide for?

Mr. CLARK. It is the same bill of which I spoke on yesterday morning. It is to relinquish to the town of Bellevue a strip of land.

Mr. OLDS. Does the consideration of the bill come out of the morning hour?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object. I do not know what the bill is.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit the bill authorizing the President to supply the citizens upon the frontier with arms to be taken up and passed. I would say again to the House that there is the greatest necessity for speedy action upon that bill. Our citizens upon the frontier need the arms. Its consideration will occupy but a moment.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. OLDS. If it does not come out of the morning hour, I will not object. Otherwise I shall.

Mr. STANLY. I object, if it does not come out of the morning hour.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, then, let it be taken out of the morning hour.

Mr. OLDS. Then I object.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I propose that it be taken up in advance of the morning hour. It will take but a single moment to pass the bill.

Mr. STANLY. I object to that.

SPRINGFIELD AND TERRE HAUTE RAILROAD.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire of the Chair whether the consideration of the Springfield and Terre Haute railroad comes up first in order during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair in regard to that matter is, that there being no question pending to commit the bill, it takes its place upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. DAVIS. I will endeavor to state my point of order in as few words as possible. I understand the Chair to decide that a motion to recommit or to commit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands would keep it from the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It would keep it before the House.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the Speaker decides, further, that a motion to postpone to a day certain will not keep it from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS. It strikes me the Chair makes a difference without a cause. I have examined as far as I could this question of order, and am satisfied that if the motion to recommit keeps the bill before the House, the motion to postpone certainly does not put it upon the Speaker's table. If the Chair overrules my point, I take an appeal.

The SPEAKER. Under the twenty-seventh rule, Senate bills and resolutions are to be taken up in their order, and if, on being read a second time, no motion be made to commit, they are to be ordered to their third reading, unless objection be made, in which case, if not otherwise ordered by the majority of the House, they are to be laid upon the table in the general file of bills, to be taken up in their turn. That provision has controlled his predecessor in reference to Senate bills, and also bills reported from committees, upon their second reading. The practice of the House, as far as the Chair knows, has been uniform upon that point—that unless a motion be pending to commit, the bill takes its place upon the Speaker's table in the general file.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to make a remark, by the leave of the House, to put myself right. The amendment to the Springfield and Terre Haute road was proposed against my will and consent. I understand this morning that the gentleman who offered it is now willing to withdraw it, and to let the vote be taken upon the merits of the bill which I had the honor to present. I do not desire to state anything further. I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I trust that the House will sustain that appeal, that there may be a direct vote upon the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand, then, that if the House sustains the appeal, and reverses the decision of the Chair, they reverse the rule upon this subject, as understood and practiced by the House?

The SPEAKER. It will reverse the practice of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House.

The SPEAKER. And it is difficult to say where the change in the practice will end.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the point I wish made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, from all his experience, could not point out the trouble that might follow.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS demanded tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would be gratified if the Chair would state the question.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday a motion was made to postpone a bill which was before the body for consideration. Before the House determined upon taking the vote upon the motion to postpone the morning hour expired, and the House proceeded to other business. The Chair decides that the bill in that stage, according to the universal practice of the House, goes upon the Speaker's table in the general file, to be taken up in its order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to propound a single question to the Chair. The practice of the House has invariably been, that where a motion is made to commit, the bill does not go upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the difference in fact, and what rule makes the difference between the motion to postpone and the motion to commit?

The SPEAKER. The Chair this moment read the rule, which provides that Senate bills in that precise condition, being upon their second reading, shall go upon the Speaker's table, unless there be a motion to recommit. That expression in regard to committing, or a pending motion to commit, has been controlling the action of this body upon bills reported from the committees when at the same stage as the bills from the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to make this point: A provision is made that Senate bills at a particular stage—the House having passed from their consideration to go into Committee of the Whole—shall go upon the Speaker's table, and take their place upon the files. This excludes the idea of any other but Senate bills going there. The practice of the House in regard to House bills at the same stage has been in conformity with that rule; although the rule itself excludes, in my opinion, the decision which the Chair has made.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the Chair have the rule read again?

The 27th rule was then read, as follows:

"3d. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading, that they be referred to committees and put under way; but if, on being read a second time, no motion be made to commit, they are to be ordered to their third reading, unless objection be made; in which case, if not otherwise ordered by a majority of the House, they are to be laid on the table in the general file of bills on the Speaker's table, to be taken up in their turn.—September 14, 1857."

The SPEAKER. This is the rule, which is clear enough in regard to Senate bills. According to long usage, and, as the Chair thinks, according to propriety, bills reported from committees in this House take the same course, and no preference should be given to them over bills from the Senate in the same stage.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know of the Chair, as he is more familiar with the rules than myself, if there is any other rule bearing upon this question of which the Chair is aware?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no other rule bearing upon this matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The effect of the rule, then, in my judgment—

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable, as a motion has been made to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Discussion is not in order I know, but I wish to inquire for information upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] and to the House again, that if there is a single instance in the history of the proceedings of this body varying from the practice as stated by the Chair, he is not aware of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not familiar with the practice, but I do not think that the rule warrants the practice.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Was not this bill "ordered otherwise" than committed to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. There was no order taken upon it. The bill was upon its engrossment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The rule says, "if not otherwise ordered by a majority of the House." Was it otherwise ordered? What did the House order? Is it competent for the House to make the order?

The SPEAKER. It was competent for the House to do it, but they did not do it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. A motion was made to postpone it two weeks hence. That precluded the reference to the Committee of the Whole, and was virtually "otherwise ordering" in regard to the disposition of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If a motion had been made to postpone to a particular day, a question before the House, and equally legitimate, was to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, neither of which keeps the bill before the House, according to the practice.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, took the floor.

Mr. NABERS. Is the question debatable? I feel obliged to object to the gentleman's proceeding.

Mr. DAVIS. Cannot I have the liberty of referring to some authority upon this question? I will send it up to the Chair to be read. It is an extract from Jefferson's Manual in support of my appeal.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to the authority will be read for the information of the House.

"That the rules require that one hour shall be devoted to reports of committees, &c., each morning; that the report of a committee, under consideration when the hour expires, becomes, on the succeeding morning, the first business before the House, after the commencement of the morning hour; and that the business is to be resumed at the stage where it was left when the hour expired."—Jefferson's Manual—"Arrangement of Business."

The SPEAKER. If it be the pleasure of the House to overrule the universal practice of the House, the Chair has no objection in the world; but he would feel it to be his duty at once to recur to, and present for action thereon, a great many other bills which, in the same form, have passed to the files on the Speaker's table. From the first day of the session they have gone regularly in that way, and taken that course.

The question was then taken on laying the appeal upon the table, Messrs. CHANDLER and ST. MARTIN acting as tellers; and there were—ayes 89, noes 37.

So the House laid the appeal upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, the bill not being before the body.

OAKLAND AND OTTAWA RAILROAD.

Mr. STUART. I understand the question to be upon the engrossment of the bill read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. That is the question.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to detain the House in reference to that bill. I can state, in a very few words, that there are at this time twenty-five miles of road completed from Detroit, northwest to Pontiac, in our State. The object of this bill is to provide for the construction of a road from Pontiac, in connection with this road, to Lake Michigan, opposite Milwaukee. The distance is about two hundred miles. Upon the eastern portion of this road, and upon the western also, the public lands are entirely taken up.

In the central part of the State, east and west, there is a considerable amount of public lands unsold, so that upon the line of this road, if the bill pass, the State would have the benefit of about two hundred thousand acres, according to the statement which I have from the General Land Office. The road, as gentlemen can see by a single glimpse at the country, would form a continuous line in connection with the contemplated railroad from Milwaukee to the Upper Mississippi, and from the Upper Mississippi to the Eastern States of Pennsylvania, New York, and the New England and the Atlantic States. I regard the work as important to these States as to these Western States. It is a work of immense importance to our State, running through the lower peninsula, north and south. What I ask for this bill is nothing but a fair and candid consideration. I shall not detain the House, because I cannot suppose for an instant that I can inform gentlemen upon the general purposes of bills of this character. I have stated a few facts which affect this road. I can assure gentlemen that it is not a visionary affair. It is a road most meritorious in its character, and one which must be and will be built eventually whether the State gets this assistance or not, because the great interests of the country demand it. But it is a bill which falls clearly within the rule which is contended for in regard to these bills; and I believe that the alternate sections of land and the unsold lands in the country adjacent will refund five times over to the Government what they will get without the construction of the road for the public lands. I am desirous that the bill should be put upon its passage; and if any gentleman wishes to have it read through before I move the previous question upon it, I shall have no objection.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish it read. I desire to ask a question, however. Is there any provision in the bill by which the amount of funds furnished by the United States is to be returned to the United States in the shape of stock? or does it go to stockholders?

Mr. STUART. The only provision in the bill is to grant lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of this road. There is no provision for refunding to the United States at all.

Mr. STEVENS. If it contains a provision that the United States, for the amount of funds which it contributes, shall hold stock in common with the other stockholders, I will go for this and other railroads; but I never will give land to enrich other stockholders.

Mr. STUART. There is no such provision. The benefit which the United States Government will derive from the increased value of the alternate sections, and the increased sale of the Government lands in the vicinity, will more than compensate for the land proposed to be granted. If it is desired to have the bill read, I have no objection. I move the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. Is it in order to move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the previous question is demanded.

Mr. CABLE. Is it in order to move to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. CABLE. Then I make that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. Upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 79, nays 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Beale, Bibb, Bissell, Boyd, Bragg, Breckinridge, Burrows, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Cleveland, Curtis, Geo. T. Davis, Dimmick, Duncan, Faulkner, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Goodenow, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Hebard, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Geo. W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lecher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Milson, Morehead, Murphy, Newton, Powell, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Savage, Schermerhorn, Seudder, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Wallace, Wildrick, and Woodward—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Bissell, Bowie, Brenton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Geo. H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, John G. Davis, Disney, Doty, Eastman, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howard, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Miller, Molony, Nabers, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Rantoul, Sackett, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Stuart, Taylor, Thurston, Townshend, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Yates—67.

Mr. RICHARDSON, before the vote was announced, said: I was not within the bar, but I ask permission of the House to record my vote. I should have voted in the negative.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. BARRERE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. CABLE. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the yeas and nays. Mr. SEYMOUR. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It will not expire until sixteen minutes past twelve.

Mr. STUART. I believe I was entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen upon the floor are apt to suppose that they are ahead of everybody else.

Mr. STUART. I ask the Chair this question: Has he announced the name of any gentleman as making a motion since the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BARRERE?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STUART. I addressed the Chair—

The SPEAKER. So did the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CABLE,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STUART. Did the Chair acknowledge either of them by name?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized by name the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CABLE,] who made the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. STUART. I would ask the yeas and nays upon that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Ohio, that he would be gratified if he would withdraw his motion, as it is the usual practice and courtesy of the House to allow the gentleman who reports a bill to control it.

Mr. CABLE. To gratify the Chair, I will withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CABLE,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] were simultaneously upon the floor. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CABLE,] The question, however, to reconsider the vote and lay upon the table is not debatable.

Mr. STUART. That motion is not made. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] withdraws his motion and yields the floor to me.

The SPEAKER. The question to reconsider is not debatable, and therefore the Chair supposed at the moment that it could not be a matter of any consequence to anybody who obtained the floor, as the question was not debatable.

Mr. STUART. I desire, as the morning hour is within some two minutes of being out, that the House will consent to let this motion pass over until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that this matter shall be passed over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. STUART. I ask the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the motion upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. POLK. I move that the House adjourn, and upon that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. DAVIS, of Indiana, and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—aye 7, noes 114.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] to withdraw his motion for a moment, that I may ask the House to take up and pass the bill for the protection of the frontiers. It will take but a moment to dispose of it.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I would be glad to do so, but the hour of debate is limited, and there are a number of gentlemen who wish to speak upon the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BISSELL. It will consume but a moment.

Mr. MEADE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That motion takes precedence of the one submitted by the gentleman from New York.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MEADE's motion, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BISSELL. I would state to the gentleman from New York that the bill which I propose to take up will not consume three minutes' time. There will be no discussion upon it, and there is certainly no bill before the House that requires action more than this. I will renew the gentleman's motion when it is disposed of.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I cannot withdraw my motion.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I hope the House will vote down the gentleman's motion; and upon it I ask for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. SEYMOUR's motion, and it was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 232, making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers; upon which Mr. MOLONY was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MOLONY. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to occupy the portion of the hour allowed me before this debate closes by order of the House. But, sir, from the great interest which my constituency particularly, and the Northwest generally, feel in just and liberal appropriations for harbors and rivers, I feel constrained, contrary to my own feelings, to present some considerations which suggest themselves to me as bearing upon the bill pending before the committee. We have, sir, the usual amount of objections, both as regards the Constitution and expediency, with which we always meet from certain gentlemen whenever measures of deep interest to the Mississippi Valley are under discussion in this body.

All of our railroad bills giving alternate sections to railroads, eminently calculated to settle and develop the boundless resources of that valley, adding at the same time to the value of the public domain and the resources of your National Treasury, have to meet here constitutional objections from a certain quarter. From the same gentlemen the cry of unconstitutionality was raised when the bill giving a home to the homeless and land to the landless was before us. That bill, sir, while it was but just to that class of our fellow-citizens whom it was particularly designed to benefit, was sustained by high considerations of national policy, and eminently commended itself to the favor of the new and landed States, calculated, as it is, to swell the tide of emigration to them, and hasten the development of their vast agricultural and commercial wealth. Yet, sir, it had to encounter, on its passage through this House, all the snags and sand-bars which these strict constructionists could throw in its way; but fortunately it outrode all of these perils, and is now in the hands of the Senate, to whose action upon it the country is looking with the most profound interest.

In relation to the constitutional objections urged by gentlemen to the passage of the bill now pending before us, I have but a little, very little, to say, sir. As the gentleman from North Carolina last evening remarked, so say I, sir. It is utterly in vain to discuss this constitutional question. It is a question so utterly foregone that I am not aware of any American statesman, living or dead, who had a national reputation, or who now has one, who has not and does not concede the constitutional question. This is not, and never has been, a party question; but upon the power and duty of Congress to make these improvements for the benefit of your commerce, inland and foreign, there has been and is a most remarkable unanimity among eminent American statesmen, all recognizing the power and duty. I repeat, sir, I am not aware of the constitutional question ever having been raised by a single eminent American statesman.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is singular inconsistency in the preaching and practice of gentlemen who upon this floor raise these constitutional objections. They are ever ready, sir, to put their hands into the National Treasury for the improvement of harbors, the erection of breakwaters, building of light-houses, for the building and maintenance of a Navy, all for the protection of our Atlantic commerce. Yes, sir, we have been voting annually, for the benefit of your foreign commerce, millions of dollars, which, in the aggregate, from the adoption of the Constitution up to 1852, amounts to $271,000,000! while the amount for the protection of your inland commerce, in the aggregate, is only $8,000,000! For these vast expenditures of your National Treasury gentlemen of the strict construction school uniformly vote. Of their constitutionality I entertain no doubt; but of the expediency of continuing a system of naval appropriations, which has already swallowed up hundreds of millions of treasure, great doubts are entertained, and upon it a grave question arises for the consideration of the American Congress and the country. The constitutional power for these appropriations is derived from the clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to regulate foreign commerce, and the commerce between the States and the Indian tribes. That in the regulation of foreign commerce is involved the right to appropriate money for its protection no one denies; and whatever may be thought of its expediency, all admit the constitutionality of the series of annual appropriations for the benefit of our foreign commerce. Of the vast amount of $271,000,000! no constitutional scruples were ever entertained, no fears of national bankruptcy have ever been sounded in our ears—at any rate by these gentlemen of constitutional scruples, so insurmountable when a bill comes before us appropriating $1,000,000 for the regulation of the commerce between the States, upon the great chain of lakes stretching half way across the continent, upon the vast Mississippi and its navigable tributaries, where floats a commerce of twice the value of that which is carried on upon the Atlantic. All these constitutional scruples are in the very face of that clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to regulate the commerce between the States, as well as the foreign, and giving that power over both, not by an implied, but an express grant. In what I have said I intend not to arraign the motives of any gentlemen who now do, or who heretofore have, occupied seats upon this floor. I take it for granted that every gentleman is governed by his own convictions of constitutional duty, and of expediency, on this question and all others. I accord that much to all, as I claim it for myself.

But while I concede that, I must say that gentlemen are inconsistent, and are giving us but a poor return for the steady and liberal support which has been given by western members to measures of interest, particularly to Atlantic commerce. We, sir, have had no sectional views operating upon our minds, inducing us to withhold our voices or our votes from measures which we acknowledge to be both national and constitutional; but, sir, it may become a question for Western members to decide, whether our support of Atlantic commerce, at the expense of our National Treasury, at any rate with the liberality of former years, is not to cease, since, in return for our liberality, we meet with nothing whenever we move in behalf of western commerce, however modest in our demands, from certain quarters, but constitutional scruples and cries of national bankruptcy!

When the bill was before this body appropriating to E. K. Collins & Co., in the course of the next eight years, not less than $5,000,000 more than a responsible bidder offered to take our mails for, I believe it was both constitutional and highly expedient in the opinion of some gentlemen, who now see in this bill a violation of the Constitution, which appropriates $1,000,000 for the protection of a commerce, in which twelve millions of American people are directly interested, and in which, indirectly, every portion of this Union has a vast interest. I intend not to charge upon gentlemen who sustained that appropriation to the Collins line of steamers, any improper motives. I could not reconcile my support of that bill with my convictions of constitutional duty, and with those views of strict economy in the use of the public money, by which I am guided; still I am well aware that some of the ablest, purest, best men of both political parties, in both Houses of Congress, sustained this appropriation to the Collins line; and whatever I may think of their act, my high respect for those gentlemen forbids a suspicion of the purity and patriotism of the motive. But I do say, that for gentlemen to express here constitutional and other objections to the passage of this bill, or the principle of it, after voting for that, is straining at a gnat, after having swallowed the camel, an illustration of the palpable inconsistencies in which honorable gentlemen will sometimes be found.

And, again, although in the opinion of some gentlemen, the homestead and railroad bills contemplated a use of the public domain, both being in violation of the Constitution, and a diversion from the National Treasury of its resources, yet, sir, when Mr. BENNETT's bill was before us, distributing not less than $60,000,000 of the public lands, and abstracting that vast amount of our national resources, with no equivalent to our National Treasury whatever, there were some Democrats, who, disregarding the objections which they urge to this bill, and others who voted for it, not only in violation of those rules in regard to the Constitution and economy, by which now they profess to be governed, in violation of a cardinal Democratic doctrine, which has been incorporated in every Democratic platform since the days of General Jackson, viz: no distribution of the public lands or their proceeds among the States. But perhaps gentlemen will say that this doctrine of the Democratic party is opposed only to an equal distribution of the public lands, and that since Mr. BENNETT's bill makes not an equal distribution of the sixty millions, but gives it mostly to the old States, hence there is no departure from Democracy, according to their strict construction of our creed.

Mr. AVERETT. I understand the gentleman to make his remarks in application to those who held these constitutional scruples about the Collins line. I beg leave to say here, that those having those scruples are in the majority on that question; and that his remarks fall but upon the minority of our party.

Mr. MOLONY. I do not know that I comprehend very clearly the point that the gentleman makes. I have made no application to individuals of my remarks. I am stating a fact, and that fact is this: that there are many bitterly opposed to this bill, who had no constitutional scruples in voting for a bill which gave E. K. Collins & Co. a bonus of $5,000,000 for carrying our transatlantic mail.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to notice briefly the declarations of gentlemen who rise here in their seats and proclaim to this House and the country, that the support of appropriations for the protection of our inland commerce, is anti-Democratic—that the principle involved in them is appropriated by and belongs to the Whig party of the country. I deny the statement, sir. Gentlemen undoubtedly believe what they assert, but they, in this instance, are committing not an uncommon mistake, viz: the substitution of a few individuals, and those themselves for the National Democratic party.

The founder of the Democratic party, as well as the great expounder and author of the Constitution himself, who were both its strict constructionists and true interpreters of its meaning, sanctioned appropriations for both foreign and inland commerce; and all succeeding Democratic Administrations, and all the great men in our party, among whom stand prominent General Jackson, Silas Wright, and John C. Calhoun, have not only sanctioned by their votes, but have sustained them by unanswered and unanswerable argument; and, sir, President Polk, who, it is known, had very strict, and, by many regarded, illiberal views upon this question, had no doubt of the constitutionality of appropriations of the public money for harbors upon our lakes, and improvements upon our navigable rivers, which were national in their character; and the ground upon which he based his objections to the bill submitted by both Houses of Congress to him, in his celebrated veto message, was not a denial of the power to Congress to vote the money, but its application to objects deemed by him local, not national; also, that the necessities of the Treasury, at that crisis, engaged, as we were, in a foreign and expensive war, made it inexpedient, in his view, for him to sign it. Without meaning to be understood as indorsing all the sentiments of that message, still, I repeat, such were President Polk's grounds for his veto, and no other. And, sir, that General Pierce entertains the same views in relation to this subject that Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Wright, and Calhoun have declared and vindicated by the power of their votes and mighty intellects, I am assured; sir, in that gallant man, and pure and incorruptible statesman, the Democracy of the Mississippi valley have the most unreserved confidence; and, under the glorious standard which Pierce and King now bears triumphantly upon our inland seas, and the mighty rivers of the West, and upon which is inscribed protection to the commerce of our lakes and rivers, are the invincible Democracy of the great Northwest now rallying with an unanimity and enthusiasm in support of Young Hickory of the granite hills, only equalled by their devotion to Old Hickory, in whose footsteps, as regards rivers and harbors, as well as upon other questions, as his illustrious predecessor, will Frank Pierce be sure to follow.

In the great Northwest lies the reliable strength of the Democratic party. There, sir, standing in its true position, that party cannot be defeated. But, sir, if certain gentlemen could succeed in their efforts to throw upon the national Democratic party the responsibility of those views which they individually entertain in relation to rivers and harbors; it would be a responsibility that, in the great State of Ohio, also in Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Iowa, would crush it to the earth. Standing in their true and ancient position, the Democracy, in all of them, will come gloriously out of the approaching contest, with Illinois heading them, as she did in 1844, as the banner State of the Union.

Sir, it is for no abstraction that we are contending, in demanding protection to our commerce. It is a principle of right which applies directly and vitally to us; in it is involved the preservation of the lives of the people engaged in the protection of the property involved in a commerce of $500,000,000 or $600,000,000, which floats upon the great chain of northwestern lakes and the mighty Mississippi and its tributaries. Sir, the Democratic voters of the Northwest cannot be bribed by any considerations of advantage merely to abandon a principle, or their party founded upon a principle; but if the day should ever come when that principle shall be abandoned, when the living faith which is and ever has been in us, shall be denied, then will the people of the Northwest stand to the doctrine of protection to our inland commerce, and deny its allegiance to that party which forsakes it.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact, that during the last fourteen years, upon your lakes and rivers, not less than $2,000,000 annually, and about one thousand lives, have been lost; and if you add the item of insurance against the dangers which this Government should have removed, amounting to not less than $2,000,000 more, you have the startling aggregate of loss of life and property, not less, during the last fourteen years, than $50,000,000 of property and ten thousand lives! Yes, sir; and all, or most of it, in consequence of this Government failing to extend to our commerce that protection which humanity, its own interest, and a high sacred constitutional duty, require it to grant; but for failing to do it, not only has this occurred—this frightful destruction of human life and great loss of property—but widows and helpless orphans, by tens of thousands, have been deprived of their earthly protectors, who, in a moment of fancied security, were hurried from time to eternity, with not one moment's preparation for themselves and for those whom they were leaving penniless and friendless behind them.

In conclusion, I repeat again, that upon the question of harbors and rivers the Democracy are now, and ever have been, sound; and upon this principle, as well as upon all of the time-honored principles of our party, stands the gallant Franklin Pierce; in him the Democracy of the Northwest have unbounded confidence, and the trust we repose in him he will faithfully discharge, and the great interests of our lakes and rivers, which, on the fourth of March next, the American people will commit to his keeping, he will be faithful to, as he has ever been to the duties of every station to which the partiality of a confiding constituency have called him.

Mr. Chairman, I now propose, in the few minutes left to me, to consider very briefly and imperfectly the details of the bill now pending.

I have no doubt, sir, that the committee, in considering this question, did it under all of the responsibility that would attach to gentlemen of high intellect, unimpeached integrity, and patriotism, in a like position; but, sir, it was the misfortune of the great Northwest not to be represented on that committee. We are so constituted, Mr. Chairman, that our convictions of right are one thing, and our convictions stirred up and impelled forward by a deep and living interest in a question, quite another. It is an old saying, and long since admitted as a truthful one in this body in theory, and generally in practice, that a banishing should be committed to the tender care of a watchful and kind-hearted nurse. In the organization of this committee that correct rule was departed from, and no gentlemen from the Northwest are upon it, and some entertaining constitutional objections, I believe, to any bill of the kind. Under such circumstances, nothing better could have been looked for, and it becomes the duty of this committee to so far perfect the bill as will make it acceptable to the river and harbor interest.

A great injustice is done to the Mississippi and its navigable tributary waters in this bill. The appropriations should be increased for the Lower Mississippi, and to the Upper Mississippi there should be a liberal appropriation for the removal of the Rock River Rapids, and one for the removal of obstructions to navigation below and above the Falls of St. Anthony; by the removal of which—which can be effected for a trifling amount, comparatively—great advantages will result to the commerce of the upper river, for which the delegate from Minnesota intends offering an amendment, and to which no well-grounded objection can be urged. The Tennessee should have an appropriation, the Ohio an increase; and, sir, to the Illinois river there should be an appropriation of at least fifty thousand dollars. This river is navigable for two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles; and what renders it eminently of a national character is, that it and the Illinois and Lake Michigan canal connect the navigable waters of the Mississippi with the lakes, forming an uninterrupted water channel for commerce from the city of New York, by the way of Buffalo and Chicago, to New Orleans. One of my colleagues intends offering an amendment in behalf of that river, which deserves, and I hope will receive, the favorable action of the committee. The only amendment which I propose to offer is for the construction of a breakwater and the erection of a pier at Waukegan, Illinois, on Lake Michigan. I called the attention of Colonel Abert, the head of the Topographical Corps, to the necessity that existed for a harbor of refuge at Waukegan for the commerce of the lakes. He admitted the necessity as being great and urgent, and said that he had made a survey of that port, and had made an estimate for the construction of a breakwater, which would give the best harbor for refuge on Lake Michigan, and for about one half the expense of any one on the lake. Since the committee have not made appropriation for this place, I shall submit an amendment to the bill in behalf of it, as the only one which I have to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] is now entitled to an hour to close the debate.

Mr. DISNEY. I trust the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will be kind enough to allow me a portion of his time.

Mr. SEYMOUR. For a few moments.

Mr. DISNEY. I thank the chairman of the Committee on Commerce for extending to me a portion of the time allotted by the rules of the House exclusively to him. I regretted exceedingly at the time that the motion should have been made which was made to limit debate in this committee upon a bill of so much importance as that now pending before the committee. There is no one object which has ever occupied the attention of Congress that has ever so enlisted the attention of the public, or which has created so much excitement among the entire people of the country as the subject of internal improvements.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. SEYmour] has the right to transfer the floor to another person?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the gentleman from New York, after having obtained the floor, has the right to yield it for personal explanation; but he cannot yield it for the purpose of general discussion.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say one word in relation to this matter of closing debate upon this bill. The effect of this operation of limiting debate has been, that a Representative of a larger commercial interest than any other upon this floor has, by the action of this House, been entirely excluded from uttering a solitary word upon the merits of this bill. I have sought the floor from the commencement of this discussion; but I have failed to get it. By the action of this House the most important commercial and navigating interest within the limits of this Republic, so far as any single district is concerned, is prevented from being heard at all in relation to this bill. So much for the action of the House. Now, you will allow Buncome speeches to be made by the hour upon unimportant bills, but—

Mr. SEYMOUR. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Ohio has the right to take a part of my time with my own consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Not without the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. SEYMOUR. If I am entitled to the floor, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio for explanation.

Mr. NABERS objected.

Mr. DISNEY. I appeal to the committee to allow me to proceed.

Mr. NABERS. I presume there are one hundred gentlemen in this House precisely in the same condition with the gentleman from Ohio. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to his proceeding with his remarks. I too, like him, have sought the floor again and again from the beginning of this discussion, for the purpose of expressing my views upon the subject. But by that outrageous vote of this House, (I cannot call it otherwise than outrageous,) our mouths have been shut upon a bill more important in its character than any which has been before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman that this question is not debatable. The gentleman can proceed if there is no objection.

[Cries of "Object!"]

Mr. DISNEY. I move that this committee do now rise, with the view of enabling me to introduce a proposition for the reconsideration of the vote limiting debate upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose, unless the gentleman from New York yields it to him.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. DISNEY. I am in actual possession of the floor, and I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] is entitled to the floor. The gentleman has no right to make the motion.

Mr. DISNEY. Well, this proceeding of closing debate is an outrage, and I protest against it.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order, and will take his seat.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Mr. Chairman, were I called upon to justify the case which a Government unfettered by constitutional restrictions should bestow upon the commerce subject to its control, I should content myself by referring to the extent of that commerce and its demand for protection. If this national interest was everywhere diffused, occupying all classes of citizens, from the man who can supply only the bone and muscle of an iron frame up to the skillful navigator and the merchant prince; if it employed an immense capital, wafted by every breeze and borne on every sea; if it was exposed to the encroachments and depredations of the barbarian, the marauder, the ruthless pirate, or if endangered by the various perils of an extended coast, or the obstructions of mighty rivers, I would at once claim for it, on the score of that parental care, that general guardianship, which any supreme national Government should exercise over the interests of its citizens, the protection and the fostering care of the Government to whom such vast commercial interests pertained.

Protection, in that sense of the term which renders secure the person and property of the citizen, whether upon the land or the sea, is acknowledged by all to be one of the highest duties of every Government. The united suffrages of all nations, ancient and modern, have sustained this sentiment. It has ever been the cardinal rule of the statesman, and the boast of the patriot. It was the maxim of the sages of antiquity that the most perfect Government was that by which the rights of the meanest citizen were regarded of equal sanctity with those of the wealthiest and most powerful. And it may well be the pride of our Government that its legislation and its power regard the rights and the welfare of its humblest citizen—the sailor before the mast—as sacred as the millionaire whose capital puts the machinery of commerce in motion; which regards the bone and muscle, nautical skill, and the capital, each as but links in that golden chain which binds the wealth of commerce fast to our side.

In this general view of the duty of the supreme Government of a nation, the protection of all those engaged in its commerce—extending that commerce—removing the obstacles to its advancement—and protecting it on the high seas, and in the harbors, are most clearly embraced. This consideration will always have a most important bearing in defining the limits of legislation under a constitutional government of limited powers like our own. In all such cases the power to make appropriations for any purpose, must be referred solely to the provisions of the Constitution. That is the great chart by which all its powers are to be measured.

The clause in the Constitution of the United States to which the power of improving rivers and harbors has principally been referred, is found among the express grants of power, and reads as follows: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." The language itself, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," would seem to be so explicit as to leave no doubt and need no comment. Commerce on our large rivers is surely regulated by those improvements which direct its course, facilitate its passage, and protect it from the perils of navigation while floating on their bosom. Commerce on our ocean coasts and inland seas is regulated by those improvements which have for their object its safety from storms by the protection of roadsteads and harbors. Such works regulate it by increasing its volume and insuring the certainty and regularity of its transit from point to point.

But we are not left to a narrow rule of construction. We may safely occupy a higher and more satisfactory ground. The framers of the Constitution intended to confer this power upon the new Government. What had these sages of the Revolution assembled for? To patch up a rickety Confederation? No! They had met to form a new government—a government whose main and distinctive quality should be, that it operated not upon States and communities, but upon individuals. It was designed not to make requisitions of sovereign States, but to command individual citizens of a common country to make and govern a Union, not a Confederation. It was, therefore, clothed with the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excise. It exercised these high powers. It laid tonnage duties, imposed a tariff of duties upon importations, built custom-houses, established port regulations, appointed collectors, and assumed to demand and hold the whole revenue derived from commerce, for the use and support of the General Government. Can it for a moment be pretended that the States surrendered to the General Government the right of collecting a revenue from their commerce, and did not also surrender the power of giving that commerce direction, extension, and protection?

The whole history of our country, cotemporaneous with the formation of the Constitution, forbids such a supposition.

The conflicting commercial regulations of the different States of the old Confederation, was one of the greatest sources of trouble and embarrassment to the National Government of that day. The impossibility of producing united, just, and proper action in extending those facilities, and that protection demanded by the complex commercial intercourse of contiguous States, rendered it necessary to create a superior power, upon which should devolve the duty of regulating, in the most extended sense, this great national interest.

The writers of the Federalist alluded to the want of a power to regulate commerce as one of the principal defects of the old Confederation. It is there said, "The interfering and unneighborly regulations of some States, contrary to the true spirit of the Union, have, in different instances, given just cause of umbrage and complaint to others, and it is to be feared that examples of this nature, if not restrained by a national control, would be multiplied and extended till they become not less serious sources of animosity and discord than injurious impediments to the intercourse between the different parts of the Confederacy."

And Mr. Madison declared that "The defect of power in the existing Confederacy, to regulate the commerce between its several members, is in the number of those which have clearly been pointed out by experience."

Mr. Calhoun, too, in his elaborate report made to the Senate in 1846, upon the subject of harbor and river improvements, says:

"The embarrassments, distraction, and hazard of collisions, growing out of the exercise of the power thus reserved to the States respectively to regulate their commerce with foreign nations and with each other, were so great and alarming as, in the opinion of the reflecting and patriotic, to demand a speedy and effectual remedy, and contributed more than any other cause to the calling of the Convention which framed the Constitution. As is well known, care was accordingly taken to apply effectual remedies as might be expected by delegating to the newly-formed Government the exclusive power of regulating the commerce of the States with foreign nations and with one another, and prohibiting, without qualification, the States from entering into any treaty, alliance or confederation."

The Constitution, then, evidently gives to the National Government all power which the States, under the Confederation, had exercised, or might have exercised, to regulate commerce with foreign nations or among themselves.

It is a well-attested historical fact, that before the adoption of our Constitution, the power of erecting such light-houses, buoys, beacons, and piers, or breakwaters, had been exercised by each State at its own pleasure, and as it deemed the exigencies of its commerce to demand. Each State levied its own duties, imposts, and excises; and from its treasury thus supplied, regulated and protected its commerce by such structures and improvements as were demanded.

Sir, so clearly obvious, so well understood at that day was it, that by the power to regulate commerce, the General Government had the power not only to light up the whole coast, by the erection of light-houses, not only to save commerce by buoys and beacons from destruction on rocks, sand-bars, and snags, but to protect it from the storms of the ocean and our inland seas—that at the first session of Congress after the adoption of the Constitution a law was passed authorizing, to the fullest extent, the exercise of this commercial power. After enacting a law "for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States," and another "imposing duties on tonnage," it passed a law entitled "An act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers." It is worthy of observation, that although there was no grant of commercial power to the General Government, except what was given by the power to regulate commerce, this act provided for the payment out of the National Treasury "for the necessary support, maintenance, and repairs of all light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers erected, placed, or sunk, before the passage of this act, at the entrance of, or within any bay, inlet, harbor, or port of the United States, for rendering the navigation thereof easy and safe." Not only did this act adopt all the public works of this character then in the country, and provide for their rebuilding and repair, but provided for an extension of these works, by directing the building of a new light-house at the entrance of Chesapeake bay.

Here, then, was claimed and exercised the power to erect and maintain, in the bays, inlets, harbors, and ports—public piers. For what purpose was this power exercised? For national defense merely? No; but for the broadest and most general of all commercial objects, fully expressed in the language of the act itself—"rendering the navigation easy and safe." And by whom was this done? Not by the men of a remote generation from the fathers of the Republic, but by the first Congress convened under the Constitution; a body of men embracing many of the most illustrious members of the Constitutional Convention of 1787. Among them we find the names of John Langdon and Nicholas Gilman, of New Hampshire; Roger Sherman, of Connecticut; William Patterson, of New Jersey; Robert Morris, George Clymer, and Thomas Fitzsimmons, of Pennsylvania; Richard Bassett and George Reed, of Delaware; Daniel Carroll, of Maryland; James Madison, of Virginia; Pierce Butler, of South Carolina; and William Few, of Georgia. Nine of the old thirteen States were represented in this Congress by one or more of those who had represented them in the Constitutional Convention, making an aggregate of thirteen men, distinguished for their talents and patriotism, now, as legislators of the nation, claiming the right to exercise this power under the Constitution which they had themselves helped to frame. Neither language nor contemporaneous exposition can furnish stronger proof of the existence of this power in the Constitution.

This construction of the Constitution, so clearly deducible from its language, has been for a long course of years so fully sustained and followed by the legislation of the country, under all political parties, that it is now approved and sanctioned by a large majority of the people. Recurring to past legislation, we find that from the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's administration to the end of Mr. Tyler's, there have been appropriated for the construction and repair of roads, and the improvement of rivers and harbors, $17,199,222. These appropriations were made as follows:

Under Mr. Jefferson.....	$48,400
" Mr. Madison.....	250,800
" Mr. Monroe.....	707,621
" Mr. J. Q. Adams.....	2,310,475
" General Jackson.....	10,532,882
" Mr. Van Buren.....	2,222,544
" Mr. Tyler.....	1,076,500

Although these appropriations during the administrations of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe were made chiefly for the improvement of roads and canals, yet we find in 1802 an appropriation of $30,000 for repairing and erecting piers in the Delaware river; in 1805 an appropriation of $5,888 for the same purpose, and still another in 1806. These acts received the official approval of Mr. Jefferson.

In 1816, under the administration of Mr. Monroe, an act passed making an appropriation for repairing the piers in the harbor of Newburyport and the preservation of Plymouth beach, in the State of Massachusetts, and another appropriating $75,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. Thus it appears that while those distinguished statesmen—Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—did not admit the power of the General Government to enter upon and adopt a general system of internal improvements, embracing roads and canals, they did not hesitate to approve of acts of Congress for the aid and protection of commerce, by erecting piers and other harbor works, and improving the navigation of our large rivers.

There had been, however, ever since the close of the war of 1812, a large party in the country in favor of a system of internal improvements, embracing the construction of roads and canals in the States, by the General Government.

The Cumberland road commenced during the administration of Jefferson, and the gigantic enterprise of New York for connecting the waters with the Atlantic had begun to develop the wealth of the great West. The practicability and the advantages of these avenues of trade and commerce were no longer problematical. The question was settled. The enterprise of the whole country was aroused, and urged capital and legislation to follow these glorious examples. As is usual in such cases, this fervor mingled with political agitation, and the expediency of our Government adopting a general system of internal improvements, extending over the whole country, became one of the leading topics in the political discussions of the day. In Congress the movement took a decided shape and character. In the House of Representatives a committee called "A Committee on Internal Improvements" was formed. The system of improvements by roads and canals thus adopted, was nurtured by this organ of the House, and increased from year to year in extent, in the number and magnitude of the works recommended, and the expenditures increased until it received a check in General Jackson's veto of the Maysville road bill—and was finally prostrated by the prevalence of the doctrines of that celebrated message, elaborated, discussed, and repeatedly applied in his subsequent messages. The extent of the evils engendered by this system will be seen by the character of the bills which they reported. This committee on internal improvements was abolished in 1832; and the contents of the last bill reported by it should be preserved, as illustrative of the system which it represented. It contained, among other appropriations, the following: for a road from Detroit to Grand river; a road from Memphis to Little Rock; a national road from Portsmouth, Ohio, to Lynnvile mountain, in North Carolina; a road from Lower Sandusky to the boundary line; for a canal from the Illinois river to Lake Michigan; for a subscription to the Alexandria Canal Company, and to erect a bridge over the Ohio river at Wheeling. Here, then, are grouped together, in one system, roads, bridges, canals, and joint-stock companies, exhibiting the true character of that class of improvements for which there were, at the time of the Maysville veto, projects before Congress, the completion of which would have required more than $100,000,000. The Maysville road itself started at a point on the Ohio river, and ran only sixty miles to an interior town. It was a strong case of a mere local improvement, not general or national in its character.

The doctrine which finally prevailed, and which was sanctioned by the administration of General Jackson as the true constitutional doctrine, and was followed in the subsequent administration of Mr. Van Buren, is thus laid down by General Jackson:

"There is another class of appropriations for what may be called, without impropriety, internal improvements, which have for their object the improvement of our harbors, the removal of partial and temporary obstructions in our navigable rivers, for the facility and security of our foreign commerce. The grounds upon which I distinguished appropriations of this character from others, have already been stated to Congress. I will now only add, that at the first session of Congress under the new Constitution, it was provided by law that all expenses which should accrue from and after the 15th day of August, 1789, in the necessary support and maintenance and repairs of all light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, erected, placed, or sunk, before the passage of this act, within any bay, inlet, harbor, or port of the United States, for rendering the navigation thereof easy and safe, should be defrayed out of the Treasury of the United States; and further, that it be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide by contracts, with the approbation of the President, for rebuilding, when necessary, and keeping in good repair, the light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers in the several States, and for furnishing them with supplies. Appropriations for similar objects have been continued from that time to the present without interruption or dispute. As a natural consequence of the increase and extension of our commerce, ports of entry and delivery have been multiplied and established, not only upon our sea-board, but in the interior of the country, upon our lakes and navigable rivers. The convenience and safety of this commerce have led to the extension of these expenditures to the erection of light-houses, the placing, planting, and sinking of buoys, beacons, and piers, and the removal of partial and temporary obstructions in our navigable rivers, and in the harbors upon our great lakes as well as on the sea-board. Although I have expressed to Congress my apprehension that these expenditures have sometimes been extravagant and disproportionate to the advantages to be derived from them, I have not felt it to be my duty to refuse my assent to bills containing them, and have contented myself to follow, in this respect, in the footsteps of all my predecessors."

It must be peculiarly grateful to every friend of the judicious and proper exercise of this power under the Constitution, to find it fully sustained and justified by that venerated patriot who never failed, whether in the Cabinet or the field, to stand by the Constitution. The prosperity and advancement of his country in all her varied interests, and especially in the extension of her commercial interests by the improvement of the great natural avenues and depôts of her commerce, were objects which lay near his heart. He repeatedly, in his messages to Congress, declared himself the friend of those internal improvements which were national in their character and designed to advance the great interests of general commerce. And as a permanent proof of his sincere devotion to these interests, he placed his approval upon record to acts of Congress appropriating more money for these objects than the aggregate of all which has been sanctioned by every other Administration, from the adoption of our Constitution to the present time.

Sir, it needed the vigorous mind, the determined will, and the inflexible purpose of such a man at the head of our Government to establish, sustain, and guide this policy. It needed his strong arm, at the same time, to protect it against the attacks of its enemies, and to save it from the excesses of its friends. The nations of antiquity were accustomed to erect statues commemorative of the virtues and achievements of their heroes and statesmen. We, at an humble distance, follow their example, and the gratitude of this Republic will soon be evinced by an equestrian statue to be erected in this capital in honor of the hero of New Orleans.

But, sir, permit me to say, that while the work of the artist shall transmit to posterity the victorious General in the attitude of triumph, there is another work, not less permanent, and equally grand and imposing—the Delaware breakwater, a structure which owes its existence chiefly to the wisdom, firmness, and expanded national feeling of Andrew Jackson. And the tempest-tossed mariners through future years who shall take refuge behind its surge-beaten walls, will ever be reminded of him, the great hero and statesman, whose policy it commemorates, and whose distinctive character it indicates in its silent but impressive majesty. There it stands, and there we hope it ever will stand, as he, its great founder, stood, when in the zenith of his power, firm and immovable, amid the jarring elements of political factions.

Sir, in this review of the policy of our Government on this subject, I shall not omit to notice the veto message of President Polk on the river and harbor bill of 1846. That message presents, in a very able manner, the opinions of that distinguished statesman, whose administration fills one of the brightest pages of his country's history. Those opinions had been long before formed, expressed, and acted upon by him, from the very commencement of his public life in the councils of the nation. They are entitled, as are all the productions which emanated from the pen of that able man, to our most respectful consideration. But when we reflect upon the circumstances which called forth that veto—the preconceived opinions of the President; his hitherto consistent opposition to such measures as he was there called upon officially to prove; an empty Treasury; the pressing exigencies of the Mexican war; the vast amount of debt already incurred in its prosecution; the prospect of a still further and larger increase of this debt; and the great uncertainty which then hung over the issue of the contest,—we cannot fail to see that, aside from any views of precedents and clearly-settled previous policy, there were other reasons, abundant and sufficient to justify the course adopted by the Executive. Indeed, he sets forth, as one of the prominent reasons justifying the withholding of his approval of that bill, the situation of our Treasury, and the embarrassments created by the war with Mexico. I trust that single exception, occurring under such circumstances, will not be allowed by the American people to have unsettled and overturned the well-established policy of the country, for near half a century, on the subject of these improvements.

I cannot dismiss this review of the constitutional power in question, without referring to opinions expressed by two distinguished statesmen of different sections of the country, and each, during his public career, wielding a political influence more potent than the highest official station could give. I refer to John C. Calhoun and Silas Wright.

Mr. Calhoun, in the report to which I have already referred, after pursuing at some length a course of the most luminous and forcible argumentation, arrives at the following general conclusions. After citing the provisions of the Constitution and the subsequent acts of Congress, he says:

"These provisions furnish conclusive proof that the States, under the power to regulate commerce, established light-houses, buoys, beacons, and public piers; that Congress regarded the power as delegated to it, to the same extent; that the object of the power was the increased facility and safety of commerce along the coast; that it appropriated especially to the regulation of commerce among the States, as the portion of the ocean in its vicinity is the great common highway of the commerce of the States bordering on it; and that it embraced navigation as well as trade."

Again he adds:

"Having now shown that the power to regulate commerce, fairly construed, embraces the establishment of light-houses, buoys, beacons, and public piers, for the increased safety and facility of the commerce of the Atlantic coast, your committee will next proceed to consider the question, whether it may not be constitutionally applied to increase the safety and facility of the Mississippi and its waters?"

After pursuing at some length the line of his argument, he concludes thus:

"Having now shown that the power to regulate commerce among the States is as applicable to the commerce of the Mississippi as it is to that of the Atlantic coast, and that the removal of the obstructions which endanger or impede its navigation is as fully embraced by it, as the establishment of light-houses, buoys, beacons, and public piers, your committee are also of the opinion that it extends to the removal of like obstructions in its great navigable tributaries, including such as have three or more States bounding on their navigable waters."

Thus the whole power claimed by the friends of these measures is conceded by this eminent statesman, of the school too of the strictest construction. For the slight exception he makes of such rivers as run between two States only, or are confined to a single State, stands upon a construction most clearly erroneous and inconsistent with the unqualified grant of the power itself.

Sir, Silas Wright, the clear and logical reasoner, the pure-minded legislator, the greatest of our northern statesmen, in his letter to the Chicago Convention written in May, 1847, after reviewing the constitutional question and the many embarrassments which attend the exercise of this power, admits its existence in reference to such improvements as are of a general or national character.

Having expressed these views in relation to the constitutional question, I shall now address myself for a few minutes to one or two considerations which have been urged against this bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] the other day complained of the manner in which these appropriations were proposed to be applied to the western rivers. He urged that the sum of $260,000 named for them all should have been divided and distributed by the bill to the several objects to which it was to be applied. I will say to the committee in reference to that point, that the manner of appropriation adopted in the bill was introduced as a matter of economy, and under the advice of and after full consultation with the Topographical Bureau. Former appropriations have been made to individual works. The custom has been to open an account with each work separately, and in every case to procure for each of these works upon the western waters a separate and distinct company of men to operate, and a distinct equipment of boats and machinery necessary to carry on the operations. It has, however, been found, by experience, more economical for the Government to have a general appropriation, which would enable them to purchase one set of boats and implements in number and equipment sufficient for the work on all the rivers, and to operate upon them as the exigencies of the case might seem to require. Thus, the Topographical Bureau, under whose direction the whole force operating on these waters will be placed, can adapt their movements to the state of the water and other circumstances as may best subserve the interests of the Government. The gentleman has also alluded to what he has been pleased to denominate the apparent inequality of these appropriations between the different sections of the country. I hope gentlemen have examined this subject for themselves, and if they have, they will see that there is no such inequality existing. None surely was intended. I find, upon looking over these appropriations, that for the Atlantic coast there is an amount of $530,000; for the northern lakes, $492,000; and for the western rivers and harbors, $458,000. Such a distribution, if tested by the only proper criterion by which appropriations of a national character should be tried, the actual wants for the operations of the next fiscal year, is eminently just and proper. I will say further, in regard to the western rivers, that in no case have we reduced the estimates sent to us from the Department for these rivers, but we have given them in every instance the full amount asked for by the Government. We have gone further: we have added to the appropriations for the western rivers $125,000, which the Government did not ask for, and for which they sent us no estimates until we called for them. We have recommended a large amount required for opening the mouth of the Mississippi, for the benefit of the great trade not only of New Orleans but of the upper country.

I differ with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] in his view of the character of this appropriation. The appropriation for the mouth of the Mississippi is as advantageous to the Upper Mississippi, the Ohio, or the Missouri, as if it was given to these rivers specifically. No appropriation is more needed than that which opens the mouth of the Mississippi, giving access to the foreign trade, and an outlet for the whole internal trade of the great valley. At the present time the mouth of the Mississippi is so clogged as almost to prevent navigation. I will say to the committee that there is not in this bill a single case which appeals more strongly to the House for the exercise of the constitutional power to improve rivers than this very appropriation. So deeply has it been felt by the people in that quarter, that they have come here in large numbers, representing the mercantile and shipping interest of the city of New Orleans, and they have laid before us statistical information, showing the most alarming extent and injury of these obstructions. The Senate, upon this representation, without waiting for the usual forms of business, passed a bill appropriating this sum of $75,000, and sent it to us asking our concurrence in the measure. The committee, however, have placed it in this bill, deeming it just to the pressing wants of other parts of the country that this appropriation should abide the action of the House upon this general subject—for there are other points suffering for immediate appropriations. I might name the city of Boston, where the main channel to its harbor has been for several years back filling up by the abrasion of the island lying near it, which is not only blocking up that channel, but threatens serious injury to the whole commerce of that port. Indeed, this will demand our action immediately in a military point of view if in no other.

In the last Congress an appropriation was made of $15,000 for the purpose of protecting Great Brewster island. If that island is washed away, (and it is now rapidly going,) it will fill up the only good channel which gives access to the large shipping of Boston, and will deprive the harbor of that city of the protection of the forts and batteries we have erected there to defend the commerce of that great commercial emporium of the North. There are numerous cases of this character demanding the immediate action of Congress. There is a case in the State of North Carolina where this Government has constructed a fort on the Cape Fear river, and established piers. Subsequently the falling down of the walls, and the abrasion banks upon which they stood, have materially obstructed the navigation of that very valuable river—a river in which the great bulk of the commerce of that enterprising State is now finding its way to the ocean. There has been a committee here representing that interest and urging immediate action upon the part of this House. We desire that all parts of the country should be fairly heard, and dealt fairly with.

Allusion was made by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] who is not now in his seat, to the character of the bill in reference to the location of the appropriations, and that the committee had acted most unfairly and unjustly.

He estimated that the planting States had not been fairly dealt by in making these appropriations. Sir, those States lie mainly on the Atlantic seaboard, and if you will look at what we have given them on the sea-board, you will find that it amounts to $433,000, and if you add to that their proportion of interest in what has been given to the great rivers of the West, it makes the sum of $563,000 that is given to the planting States. Sir, no injustice of this kind was designed, and none has happened through any mistake or negligence of the committee. I am satisfied that this committee, on examining the details of this bill, will see that it does ample justice to every part of this country.

Sir, an allusion has been made to my own State—a State which has a vast commercial interest, and a large extent of lake coast and of river navigation as well as considerable sea-coast. Now, instead of the appropriations for that State being increased as western and southern appropriations have been, this bill contains upwards of $20,000 less than the estimates sent to us by the Department for the State of New York. We have also been referred to the important work recommended here for the Delaware river, and though it did not fall within the constitutional ground which we had prescribed for ourselves, yet this and some other improvements on that river stand upon different ground from any other. These piers and some others in the Delaware river were long since ceded to the Government upon the implied understanding and agreement that the Government would keep them in repair. Among these works were the piers at Port Penn. They lie on the east side of Reedy Island, and greatly need repairs.

The Department, however, believed that a better work could be made on the other side of Reedy Island, and that, too, for a small increase of expenditure; and we recommend that object as one of great importance to the vast commerce of the city of Philadelphia.

But, sir, seeing that my time is nearly out, let me say, in conclusion, that I regretted the introduction of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLEY,] which is the old bill of last session. I warn gentlemen who are friends of judicious and proper appropriations of this character against adopting such a bill as that. Gentlemen who were in the last Congress know the character of that bill. The committee had it before them. They went into an examination of its contents, and they found that a large number of appropriations were put in that bill without any estimates whatever from the proper Department, without any surveys, so that when you commenced the work you never could know where it would end, or what would be its utility. I will mention one item in the bill which struck the Topographical Bureau as most extraordinary. It was an appropriation of $20,000 to construct a breakwater at Nantucket, for which there had been no survey or estimate; and when the attention of the Bureau was called to the subject, they found that you might as well construct a breakwater on the broad expanse of the Atlantic as to put it there; and its ultimate expense, instead of being computed by thousands, would absorb millions of dollars. There are other appropriations in that bill of a similar kind, and so numerous are they, and so ill-digested, and of such doubtful utility, that I warn the friends of this bill against the adoption of it. There are many votes in this House which will be given for this bill that, under no circumstances consistently with good policy and with the principles which we have adopted for our guidance on this great national subject, can be given for the bill introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Let me say here, that I am far from claiming for this bill anything like perfectability. I stated, in opening this discussion the other day, that the committee labored under great embarrassment in forming this bill, and I stated the reason, of those embarrassments. I wish now to say to gentlemen on all sides that this bill is the result of great deliberation on the part of your committee, and has arisen out of concessions and compromises of opinion, differing as we did with regard to the extent to which we should proceed in this matter; and I hope for that reason, if for no other, the House will be very reluctant to admit any additions to it. This bill has arisen from a concession of the various grounds and opinions of the members of the committee—all believing that the great interests of the country on this subject were no longer to be neglected by Congress; that it rose above all party considerations and demanded imperiously at the hands of Congress such action under the Constitution as shall protect, as far as practicable, by these improvements, the immense interests of our national commerce.

Mr. DISNEY. I shall make one more attempt to appeal to the good sense of the House, and I therefore move that this committee rise. My object is to extend the time allowed for debate on this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that he cannot effect his object in the House any more than in the committee. A motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the resolution closing this debate was agreed to, and that motion was laid on the table. The gentleman can therefore only get in a resolution to extend the time allowed, by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair has stated. Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman from Tennessee is entirely mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise is not debatable.

The question was then taken on Mr. DISNEY's motion, and it was not agreed to.

And the committee proceeded to consider the bill by clauses.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair relative to the order of proceeding, for it has been differently decided by different presiding officers. I ask when, in the opinion of the Chair, the vote on the substitute, which I offered a day or two since, can properly come up?

The CHAIRMAN. After the committee have perfected the original bill and the substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, moved to strike out the first clause of the bill, which is as follows: "That the following sums of money be, and the same are hereby appropriated to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the superintendence of the Secretary of War, for the following purposes:"

and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the consent of Congress is hereby given to each of the States hereinafter named, to levy a tonnage duty upon the commerce within their respective jurisdictions for the purpose of raising and collecting the several sums of money hereinafter specified, which said sums when so collected shall be appropriated to the works and uses hereinafter designated.

Mr. J. said: It has long been a cardinal principle of the Republican party of this country that this Congress and this Government should not exercise and assume doubtful powers. The exercise of the power of this body to pass this bill is one of a contested character, but the Constitution is clear and unequivocal, that Congress may give its consent to the States to lay tonnage duties. There is no doubt of that. Every person concurs in the power of Congress to give its consent to that, but there is a vast variety of opinion as it respects the power of Congress to appropriate directly from the Treasury, money for the purposes of internal improvement. If we adopt this amendment, we avoid that difficulty; we shall stand by the cardinal principles of the Republican party.

This amendment, sir, is in conformity also with the views of Mr. Polk in his veto message. It is in conformity with the practice and usage of the Government, and if adopted it will check extravagance; each locality and each State will know best what improvements can be made, how they are to be made, and how they will best answer the purposes for which they are designed. Now, the contest is not how the improvements can be best effected, but what section shall receive the largest amount of money. But the amendment will have another effect; it will put the tax upon the persons who are interested in these improvements, and who receive benefit from them; the tonnage duty will be upon the owners of the vessels, and they will then charge the consumers for the use of the facilities afforded by these improvements. These will be the effects of this amendment if it is adopted. If, however, it be not adopted, and if this Government takes upon itself a system of improvements, it leads to extravagance, puts a tax on people who ought not to pay it, has a tendency to form combinations, and to exhaust the Treasury.

Mr. STANLEY. I am opposed to the amendment, but I shall not occupy my five minutes in discussing it. I shall be obliged to the gentleman from Georgia if he will tell me what he means by the Republican party.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will answer the gentleman. The Republican party consists of those who contend that this Government has no powers but those clearly granted in the Constitution, and such as are incidental to and necessary to carry out the granted powers.

Mr. STANLEY. That is, the sensible men of both parties.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the party to which I recently belonged there is as much latitudinous construction as in any other.

Mr. STANLEY. The party to which you recently belonged. What party does the gentleman belong to now?

Mr. JOHNSON. I now belong to the independent order of outsiders. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken on Mr. JOHNSON's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. Is it in order to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The enacting clause is the last thing to be considered. The gentleman can move to strike out the first appropriation if he chooses.

Mr. MILLSON. I move, then, to strike out the first clause in the bill, which is as follows:

"For the construction of the Delaware breakwater, $30,000."

I have not the vanity to suppose that I can shed any new light upon a subject which has engaged for so many years the attention of our wisest statesmen. If I could, it would, perhaps, be idle to attempt it. From the indications already given, I doubt if the most conclusive reasoning that the subject is susceptible of, could defeat the passage of this bill. I cannot even permit myself to hope that it is to be the last of its kind. It has already been decided to rank among the general appropriation bills, and our rules may soon require such a bill to be annually reported, with the bills for the support of Government, within the first thirty days of the session.

Gentlemen on this side of the House insist that there is nothing in this measure at war with the doctrines of the Democratic party. About that, sir, I have nothing to say now. I will not assume to speak ex cathedra as to what may constitute Democracy. Nor do I mean to charge that this bill violates the Constitution of the United States. Whatever may be my own convictions upon the subject, to insist that I am certainly right and other gentlemen unquestionably wrong, may not be altogether becoming. When, however, the gentlemen from Illinois, [Messrs. CAMPBELL and MOLONY,] the honorable chairman, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] and others who have spoken in this debate, attempt to show that these appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, have been the settled policy of the Government from its earliest establishment, I take issue with them; and I refer them to the declaration of Mr. Polk, in his admirable veto message, that the power was not only never exercised, but was never even claimed for more than thirty years after the organization of the Government.

Sir, I have not thought it proper, in addressing statesmen, to urge them to oppose a particular policy because Mr. Jefferson or Mr. Madison believed it to be unconstitutional. We are not now before a court of justice arguing cases upon precedents and authorities. Independent reasons ought to be addressed to the understandings of gentlemen; and that method of discussion which seeks to maintain a favorite theory by citations of illustrious names, is not more complimentary to the hearer than it is apt to be convincing. The Constitution did not exhaust itself in its appeals to the past generation. It speaks to us as it did to them, and it is safer to rely upon the text than upon the commentary.

But, sir, when the authority of Mr. Jefferson is invoked by the friends of this bill, it is allowable to show that they have utterly misconceived his opinions. Gentlemen insist that their views are sanctioned by this great republican statesman, and they lay much stress upon his approval of the bill making appropriations for light-houses, and for building piers in the Delaware river. This bill was passed in April, 1802, and it cautiously provided for a cession by the States to the United States of the land on which not only the light-houses, but the piers were to be built. It is upon this slender foundation that gentlemen rest their argument that Mr. Jefferson acknowledged the power of Congress to expend millions of dollars in this system of internal improvement, prosecuted in utter contempt of the State jurisdiction. But I now propose to read a letter of Mr. Jefferson to Albert Gallatin, written in October, 1802, not only upon the general subject which gentlemen have been discussing, but in reference to this very appropriation for piers in the Delaware river. As I presume they have never seen this letter, I invite their particular attention to it. They will find that Mr. Jefferson utterly condemns the system of which they are the advocates, and that the only ground on which he conceived the appropriation could be considered constitutional was that the piers might be necessary for the protection of our ships-of-war. Here is the letter:

"You know my doubts, or rather convictions, about the unconstitutionality of the act for building piers in the Delaware, and the fears that it will lead to a bottomless expense, and to the greatest abuses. [How prophetic!] There is, however, one intention of which the act is susceptible, and which will bring it within the Constitution; and we ought always to presume that the real intention which is alone consistent with the Constitution. Although the power to regulate commerce does not give a power to build piers, wharves, open ports, clear the beds of rivers, dig canals, build warehouses, build manufacturing machines, set up manufactories, cultivate the earth, to all of which the power would go if it went to the first; yet a power to provide and maintain a Navy is a power to provide receptacles for it, and places to cover and preserve it. In choosing the places where this money should be laid out, I should be much disposed, as far as contracts will permit, to confine it to such place or places as the ships-of-war may lie at, and be protected from ice, and I should be for stating this in a message to Congress, in order to prevent the effect of the present example. The act has been built on the exercise of the power of building light-houses, as a regulation of commerce. But I well remember the opposition on this very ground to the first act for building a light-house. The utility of the thing has sanctioned its infraction. But if on that infraction we build a second, on that second a third, &c., any one of the powers of the Constitution may be made to comprehend every power of Government."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, this power to improve the navigation of rivers and harbors has been so long exercised by the Government, first and last, by almost every Administration, except that of Mr. Polk, that I hardly now think it is an open question. But I have one objection to this bill, which to me is an insuperable objection. It is sectional, eminently sectional in its character—too much so; I think, to command the votes of a majority of this House; certainly too much so to command mine, without considerable modification. Whoever takes up this bill and scans it, will see that it has three prominent objects. It is to appropriate to the great centers where the voting is done, and to leave out all the other sections; substantially, without reference to the merits of the works they present to the consideration of the House and the legislation of Congress.

Now, sir, there were many objections to the bill that passed the House at the last session of Congress. I voted for that bill, though I could not conceal from myself the fact that there were many objectionable features in it; but it had one merit, at least, over this. It was not entirely sectional; it was not confined to Big-Sodus and Little Sodus, and the lakes, and to those places where the voting is to be done which is to pass the bill, as is eminently the case with the one now before the House.

Sir, my own State has a sea-coast of over seven hundred miles, yet, upon that sea-coast, there is not a single appropriation in this bill. It is entirely omitted. The bill of last Congress appropriated $50,000 to her coast. There was an appropriation in the bill of the last session for the improvement of the Rio Grande, made upon survey by an officer of the Topographical Engineers, and estimate, and upon the recommendation of the Administration and of the War Department, that the navigation of that river was necessary or highly convenient for military transportation. The same recommendation was also made by the Secretary of War the present session; but that recommendation has not been regarded. I understand it was upon the pretense that the boundary line had not been run. I say pretense, because the line was being run. The party running it have now reached as far as Laredo, the largest portion of the line, and will be at the mouth of the Rio Grande before this bill can pass both Houses, and that river, if there is a national character in any river, is national in its character, because it divides the two Republics. All that is required, as I understand, to make it perfectly navigable nearly half way to El Paso from its mouth, is $25,700, as estimated by the officer who surveyed it, and the saving to the Government each year, in the cost of transportation, would be more than twice that amount. But, sir, it cannot be expected that in any bill which has the character which has been given to this—a State that has only four votes—should expect to have justice done here, and much less liberality.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLSON. With the consent of the committee I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I object.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation $5,000.

I did not intend to have made a speech upon this bill at all, but to have contented myself with the labors I performed in committee. But on hearing the remarks made by the gentleman from Texas, in which the charge was made that this bill was framed upon sectional grounds, and knowing that at least so far as one member of that committee was concerned, that no such motives operated in reporting this bill, I now disclaim entirely any sectional feeling in the matter. I should have been much better gratified when the gentleman made these charges, if he had pointed out the manner in which the bill was sectional, rather than to have made the charges alone. He says, for instance, that his own State, with a sea-board of seven hundred miles, is passed over. Sir, there is an appropriation in that bill of $20,000 for one river in the State. But he says that Texas has only four votes. Why, sir, my own State has eight votes—double the number of the gentleman's State. We have a sea-coast of thirteen hundred miles in all, and between three and four hundred in a straight line; and yet, although we have double the number of votes, we have an appropriation in this bill of only $15,000, while Texas has $20,000.

Mr. HOWARD. You have got it ever since the organization of the Government.

Mr. FULLER. If that is the sectionality of which he speaks, and on account of which he cannot vote for the bill, I take it, as one member of the committee, I should be exempted from the charge of entertaining any such feeling; for it is to be supposed that I should have the interest of my own State as much at heart as the State which the gentleman [Mr. HOWARD] so honorably represents. The sectionality of this bill, therefore, so far as the two extreme States upon the sea-board are concerned, is, that Texas having four votes has $20,000, while Maine, with her eight votes, has only $15,000. Maine is also the third State in the Union in point of commerce, the extent of which I had something to say in my former remarks. Then, when the gentleman from Texas charges this as being a sectional bill, I hope he will, at least, exempt one member of the committee from that charge.

Now, in relation to the merits of the bill itself, the committee have already had their attention called to it. I, for one, was willing to give my assent to put the sea-board, the lakes, and the Mississippi river upon an equal footing, so that one section of the country should have no advantage over the other. And I think this is as fair a bill in that particular as, perhaps, any gentleman in this House could sit down, with the given sum, and appropriate.

For myself, I do not admit the constitutional right of this Government to go into a system of internal improvement, unless in connection with our sea-board and harbors. There is a difficulty, in my mind, how it is possible to apply the rule that these improvements should be made by the States themselves; for instance, to the Mississippi river.

There are certain improvements to be made, snags to be taken out, and the river to be cleaned out. Now how can any one State bordering upon this river make these improvements? What States would do it? Would Mississippi? would Louisiana? would Arkansas? would any of the other States? The same remark applies to the lakes and to the Atlantic sea-board. Then I say it is wrong to throw upon the commerce of the country the burden of making these improvements. Perhaps there is no species of property which already bears a heavier burden.

Mr. BISSELL. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman [Mr. FULLER] who has just taken his seat. Indeed, I do not know but I shall be opposed to the whole bill. I will not say just now that I shall vote against it, though my present inclination is to do so, unless it receives very essential modifications. Of course I shall not attempt, in the few minutes allowed me, to go into a discussion of the details of the bill. I intend at present to notice but a single objectionable feature—one of the many with which the bill abounds—with a view of directing to it the especial attention of Western men. It is a consideration—that to which I am now referring—which ought, in my judgment, to go very far with all just men in determining the amount of favor which the bill ought to receive. I find here, for continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river above and below Albany, $50,000. That river is navigable, I believe, for about sixty miles.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him? The Hudson river is navigable for one hundred and fifty miles, and the improvement projected upon that river is where the tide ebbs and flows.

Mr. BISSELL. I meant to say one hundred and sixty miles—not sixty. I knew the distance well, having frequently traveled from New York to Albany. But I do not know how far up the tide ebbs and flows; the gentleman can tell me.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Over one hundred and fifty miles, and up to a dam constructed across that river, at least four miles above any portion of the improvement.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, then, call the navigable distance one hundred and fifty miles. And, for that one hundred and fifty miles of the Hudson river, $50,000 is appropriated by this bill.

Now, pass to the next item in the bill:

"For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, below the rapids; the Ohio, including the repairs of the dam at Cumberland island; the Missouri and the Arkansas rivers, $260,000."

Here is an extent of western river navigation scarcely less than six thousand miles—forty times greater than the length of the Hudson—and for all this the bill proposes to appropriate $260,000; a sum only about five times as great as that appropriated to one hundred and fifty miles on the little Hudson. This is the fact to which I call the attention of western members on this floor. Upon what principle can this thing be maintained? Is it equitable? Is it adjusted according to the difficulties and dangers of navigation, or the real, actual necessities of commerce? The Hudson may need improvement—doubtless does—to facilitate commerce. But what are its wants in that respect compared with those of the western rivers? On which of them do the disasters to life and to commerce occur? There runs, nearly the entire navigable distance of the Hudson river, directly upon its margin, one of the finest railroads in the Union; and the time occupied in passing over it is three hours. Besides this, the river itself, in its present condition, is justly regarded as one of the finest navigable streams in the world. Why, then, appropriate a sum for the improvement of the navigation of that river, proportionably greater, by near forty-fold, than for western rivers—rivers whose banks, unlike those of the Hudson, are not lined with railroads?

I ask again, why appropriate $50,000 for the improvement of this little span of the Hudson, and a sum so insignificantly small, comparatively, for this immense extent of western waters? Where are the dangers to river navigation? Are they not in the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and the Arkansas? Where are the snags, and other obstructions, which so often send scores of human beings to their watery graves, and bury in the deep the rich cargoes of our inland commerce? Not on the Hudson—not on the Hudson; but on the Mississippi and its tributaries.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. FULLER, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CASKIE. I move to insert between the ninth and tenth lines the amendment which I send to the Clerk's table.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For the improvement of the James and Appomattox rivers below Richmond and Petersburg, $50,000.

Mr. CASKIE. Inasmuch as an appropriation to these two rivers, in connection with this bill, has been several times alluded to in incidental debates which have sprung up here, and as I have not yet heard from any one an objection to the fairness of the appropriation asked for that purpose, according to the principles of the bill, I do not feel called upon to say anything in reference to the amendment I have offered, save only that my friend [Mr. MEADE] and myself, who represent the two districts interested, are perfectly prepared to give any explanation which may be desired.

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish the committee to understand that this subject was in no way presented to the Committee on Commerce, and that they had no petition, no memorial, no surveys, and no request, in reference to these rivers made to them. The subject was never brought to their notice, except from the circumstance of finding an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of those rivers in the bill of last year, until the subject was presented to the House.

And while I am up, I will mention a curious fact. In the year 1844, there were appropriations made for harbors and rivers; but they were made in separate bills. A gifted son of Virginia, Mr. Tyler, was then in the presidential chair. He saw fit to sign the bill for the western rivers and lake harbors, but vetoed the bill for the harbors and rivers of the Atlantic coast; and he assigns as a special reason for vetoing that bill, that it included the very rivers which gentlemen now present to the committee. He made it a prominent feature of his objection to the bill, that it included appropriations to those rivers in Virginia. I presume, sir, he must be supposed to have understood the interests of Virginia, and that, at least, he had good reason for thus singling out those appropriations, as special objects of condemnation.

Mr. MEADE. I will ask the gentleman whether that veto was not based on constitutional grounds alone? The necessity of the work Mr. Tyler did not controvert. He vetoed the bill upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of such an appropriation.

Mr. DUNCAN. I have the message before me, but I have not time to read it. The veto was not placed upon unconstitutional grounds alone; but the objection was, that if the improvements suggested were made, it would favor one part of Virginia to the exclusion of another.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Before the gentleman appeals to this authority of Mr. Tyler, I ask him whether he assented to the reasons given by Mr. Tyler? whether Mr. Tyler was not acting in opposition to the opinions which the gentleman himself entertains? and whether it is fair to quote his opinions in opposition to the amendment now offered to this bill? And further, I ask the gentleman whether this very appropriation has not been recommended from time to time by the proper department, to which this question is properly referable?

Mr. DUNCAN. I do not concur at all with Mr. Tyler in opinion. I stated his opinions that they might pass in the House for what they are worth.

In regard to recommendations, I say again, that we had no recommendation this year upon that subject, and I am not aware that in former years there has been any recommendation from the executive department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question then recurring upon the amendment offered by Mr. CASKIE,

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The House was then divided on the question, and there were—ayes 50, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope tellers may now be appointed by unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and Messrs. CHANDLER, and PARKER of Indiana, were appointed tellers.

The question was again put upon the amendment, and it was rejected—the tellers (Messrs. CHANDLER, and PARKER of Indiana) having reported—ayes 62, noes 63.

Mr. COBB. I propose to add at the end of the ninth line in the bill, the following:

For the surveying and improving the Tennessee river, $25,000 below, and $50,000 above the Muscle Shoals in said river.

It is not my intention to censure either directly or indirectly the Committee on Commerce for having omitted in this bill to provide for the improvement of the Tennessee river, which is navigable for more than three hundred miles below, and five hundred miles above the Muscle Shoals. I have submitted the amendment by which that omission will be supplied. It will be observed that I do not propose the improvement of the Muscle Shoals, for to do that would require the expenditure of upwards of $3,000,000. The importance of the improvement of the Tennessee river has long since been acknowledged by the Government, for years ago they granted four hundred thousand acres of choice land in Alabama for the improvement of the Muscle Shoals. That is of itself a strong argument in favor of the amendment. We cannot expect that, after the expenditure of four hundred thousand acres of land, and accomplishing nothing, in the improvement of those shoals, to get another appropriation for that object. Below these shoals steamboats are running at all seasons of the year, and there are improvements which can be made there which will add much to the navigation of the river. Everybody on the committee, acquainted with the stream, knows that it rises in the State of Virginia, flows through Tennessee and Alabama, and empties into the Ohio river, in Kentucky. Its importance is admitted by all. If it be proper to improve it, why not begin the work now, when numbers of steamboats are upon the river, running above and below the Muscle Shoals?

Mr. Chairman, I had some constitutional scruples in relation to the improvement of certain rivers and harbors, until my return home about twelve months ago from the Congress of the United States. I got on board the Chattanooga to descend that river to my home, a distance of about one hundred miles. Whilst the boat was steaming down the river it was stove by a rock, which could have been removed for $200, and the lives of the passengers—my family and myself included—were periled. That at once convinced me in regard to the constitutionality of the question, and the importance of the improvement of that river was practically demonstrated to me. [Laughter.] I am well satisfied that there are improvements which should be undertaken by the General Government, and which are strictly constitutional. Of that I have never doubted, although my favorite policy, from the first time I had the honor of a seat here, has been to authorize the States to levy tonnage duties, for the purpose of making improvements of the character provided for by this bill and others. I believe that Congress has the power in certain instances to improve rivers and harbors.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I move the following, to come in as an addition to the amendment:

For the improvement of the Tennessee and its navigable tributaries above the Muscle Shoals, $133,600, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

I offer that amendment in good faith. It is based upon the estimates of the Department made out by the Topographical Engineers.

Mr. DUNCAN. I raise the question, that it is not in order for the gentleman from Tennessee now upon the floor to submit an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. This is only an amendment in the second degree, and therefore in order.

Mr. DUNCAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama has not been opposed. The rule declares that a speech of five minutes shall be made in favor, and a speech of five minutes against the amendment.

Mr. COBB. Why the gentleman seems to suppose there is going to be opposition to my amendment? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. The amendment I have offered is based upon the estimates of the Department. I regret that I did not obtain the new estimates in time to have submitted them with the old estimates of Colonel Long, to the Committee on Commerce for their investigation, and for the insertion of the appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee river in the original bill. There can be no good reason urged from any quarter of this Congress, why that river should not be improved as well as any other river provided for in that bill, and that, too, sir, upon Democratic national grounds. It is as much a national object as the Ohio. A majority of the committee which reported this bill, belong, I believe, to the Democratic party. That they were sincere in putting in appropriations for the rivers they have, I have no doubt, nor will they now say the Tennessee ought not to be improved. And although we oppose a general, wasteful, and profligate system of internal improvements by the General Government, at the same time we have the sanction of every President, from the first Congress down, for a reasonable, judicious, and prudent expenditure of the public money for the improvement of highways which may be necessary to make navigation easy and safe. I propose this amendment, sir, because I believe that the water-course, to which the appropriation provided by it is to be applied, comes under that character of improvements, and is of national importance.

The Tennessee river, I am aware, has not attracted the attention that the Delaware, Hudson, and other northern rivers have. It has not met with the early favor of the Government. Its obstructions are as nature made them, but there is no river more susceptible of being improved. The completion of the great railroad, however, from Chattanooga upon its banks to the southern sea-board at Charleston and Savannah, is fast developing its value and the necessity of its improvement—giving us an outlet for our commerce, which has increased more than a hundred-fold in the past two years. The tonnage on the river is more than doubling itself every year. The increase of the great staple of the Southern States the last season, borne on its bosom, was over twenty thousand bales; an increase of the article of Indian corn, over the former season, of five hundred thousand bushels, shipped to markets abroad. Indeed, sir, I might go on and show from facts and figures that the importance of this beautiful river, as a great national highway, is of the character to merit and deserve improvement by the Government. It has been surveyed by the Government; it has been used by the Government for the transportation of its troops; it is now used for the transportation of the Government mail. Heading in Virginia and North Carolina, it runs in a southwesterly direction through East Tennessee and Alabama, washes the shores of a portion of Georgia, is the line between Mississippi and Alabama, and then, after making an extraordinary curve in a northwesterly direction through West Tennessee, it flows through Kentucky and empties into the Ohio, bearing off the surplus products—limitless in quantity—of the rich and fertile Tennessee valley.

The character of the obstructions to its navigation are such as to be easily improved, consisting principally of jutting rock and shoals, alternating with deep and unobstructed basins, varying in depth from twenty to forty feet, allowing the channel through the shoals to be deepened without injury to it above or below. Its banks, being principally of rock and a different soil from the Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, or Arkansas, are not subject to injury from floods, and any improvement would be permanent. Its obstructions have cost the Government a few dollars. I well recollect that a few years ago, when the Mexican war was raging, troops were raised in East Tennessee, (the nursery of soldiers,) and that the easiest conveyance for them to the seat of war was down the Tennessee river, and I believe, also, that to the steamboats in the service of the Government, there had to be paid a demurrage of $500 a day on account of the delay, caused by the obstructions in that river at low water.

I could still further assign as another reason, why it should be acknowledged by this Government as a national object. When a survey was made by Colonel Long, in conjunction with some assistants in Tennessee, the expenses of that survey were refunded to the State of Tennessee by General Jackson, thereby acknowledging it as worthy of the favor of the Government. If the position is to be taken, whether our river is entitled to improvement—whether it is equal to the Ohio or other rivers—I tell gentlemen that, in navigable extent it is the fourth highway in the United States, and in volume of water the third. I have been asked, by gentlemen around me, where is Tennessee river? I tell them, that it is in the very heart of the Confederacy; and while you are improving your veins near the surface, that convey the national blood in a healthful condition, let us improve the main arteries to the extent their importance demands. I see no reason why western rivers should not be improved, as well as the northern rivers or northern harbors. It is strange and extraordinary logic that admits the right to erect light-houses, piers, and buoys, to point out rocks and breakers to vessels and denies the right to remove the rocks that caused the necessity for them.

Mr. WALSH. I believe it is in order to oppose this amendment. I have no objection to the Tennessee river and its improvement; but there seems to be a wide mistake abroad, particularly upon the part of some gentlemen in this House in regard to the subject of river and harbor improvements. The ascertainment of the amount of money to be appropriated in these cases is almost as nice as arithmetical calculations. We must know the nature of the obstruction—we must know whether it is worth while to begin the improvements; we must know the season at which those improvements are to be made; and all this information we get from the officers of the proper Department. In reply not only to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Churchwell,] but especially in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Moline,] who attempts to make this a sectional matter, by arraying hostile feelings against us, I will say that the appropriations for the Ohio and Mississippi rivers are within a very small amount of the appropriations recommended by the appropriate Department. The items are the same recommended by your scientific men, as the sum of money which ought to be appropriated within a given time and at particular seasons. Gentlemen seem anxious, by going to the Treasury and dragging out its means at once, to realize the fable of the golden goose, whose owner, not satisfied with her laying a golden egg every day, killed her in the vain idea of getting a still greater increase. The appropriation for the Tennessee river was not an appropriation sustained by any estimate at all from the proper Department; nor do I understand the gentleman now to say that it was. He says that there was a local survey in that State; all I understood him to say was, that there was a survey under the authority of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Under the authority of the Government of the United States. The gentleman misunderstood his statement.

Mr. WALSH. All I mean to say is this: that those estimates were never presented to the committee in my presence—they were never there for our action. And if the House will now allow me, I will say that the committee have had no opportunity for their examination.

Mr. HOUSTON. I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce myself, and another member of that committee, to this very improvement; and upon more occasions than one, I have solicited them to take up this subject and incorporate an appropriation for this river in the bill.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I have the estimates of the Department now in my hand. They are the same which were presented to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALSH. I am only speaking from my own personal knowledge. Sir, there is nothing sectional in this bill; and the statement which declares that it is sectional is not sustained by a single fact before the committee. The fact stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Seymour,] shows that there has been an equal division of these improvements to different sections of the country. The charge is wholly unfounded that this committee have acted upon any sectional grounds. We endeavored to promote the interests of all sections of the country. When our attention was called to this matter of the Rio Grande, it was suggested that the boundary question was not settled. We knew that in regard to the harbor and river bill of the last year, the hair-splitters of the Senate relied upon that very item for the purpose of defeating the appropriation. It was in no pretense, but in the very spirit of compromise, and a desire to prevent difficulty, that we did not embrace that item.

Mr. SEYMOUR. As the gentleman has alluded to the Rio Grande matter, I wish to say that I hold in my hand the correspondence upon this subject from the Topographical Bureau, showing that the line had not been run on the Rio Grande, and that no survey could be made upon which any estimates ought to be founded.

Mr. WALSH. You will recollect that this was made the point of difficulty by gentlemen in another branch of Congress in regard to these appropriations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that this discussion about the Rio Grande is out of order on an appropriation for the Tennessee river.

The question was then taken on Mr. Churchwell's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I offer the following amendment:

For removing obstructions from the mouth of Pascagoula river, in the State of Mississippi, $50,000.

Gentlemen belonging to the Committee on Commerce say that appropriations of this kind have not been inserted in the bill because they have not been asked for. I sent to that committee a petition for this very appropriation, and not only has it been left out, but no sort of notice has been taken of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to move that the committee rise, and then the gentleman can make his speech to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. I hope that this talk about the committee's rising will not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course not.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have come to a stand still and can do nothing. I move, therefore, that the committee rise.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I hope the committee will not rise. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LETCHER and RICHARDSON were appointed.

The question was then taken; and there were—ayes 62, noes 67.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. BROWN. I was proceeding to say, that the members of the Committee on Commerce were wholly mistaken, as far as the proposed appropriation was concerned, when they said that it had been left out of the bill because it was not asked for. More than once petitions for this appropriation have gone to that committee through the ordinary channels. I have not, it is true, gone and besought the members of the committee in person, to put into the bill this or any other appropriation. I have neither begged nor bargained for that which I have a right to demand in the name of my constituents. My constituents petitioned, as was their right; and I presented their petition, as was my duty. And I took it for granted, that the members of the Committee on Commerce, like the members of the other committees of this House, would discharge their duty. Still, I find this bill reported, and no notice taken of those petitions. I find, also, and it is that of which I especially complain, that the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor—a State which supplies to this Government one seventh part of its exports, and, by consequence, one seventh part of its imports, and which, therefore, supplies one seventh part of the whole revenue of the Government derived from imports—has not had appropriated to it in this bill one single solitary dollar; not one farthing. Sir, the State of Mississippi has been entirely overlooked in the preparation of this bill.

A VOICE. So has Virginia.

Mr. BROWN. No, I think Virginia has not been entirely omitted. She has something, but Mississippi has not one dollar from the commencement to the conclusion of the bill. This is the only item that has been asked for, and it was due to that State that it should have been granted; or if not granted, the petitions should have had at least a decent and respectful consideration. Why is this? Why are our petitions thus trampled under foot and spit upon? Is it because the Mississippi delegation come here subscribing to the doctrine of a strict construction of the Constitution? Are you going to establish the principle in this country, that money is to be doled out to those only who believe that a liberal construction of the Constitution is right? and are you going to refuse appropriations to those who take a different view of their duty to the Constitution? Are the liberal constructionists—those who believe the Government may and ought to make these appropriations, about to band together, seize the public money and appropriate it to themselves, and will they deny to those who dispute their power to appropriate all particition in a common fund? If that be the principle upon which you are going to act, why, let us understand it. I understand that the treasure of the nation is the common property of the nation, and is not to be distributed to the States according to the opinions of their Representatives on a constitutional question. We hear all around us that gentlemen have not been able to get their items of appropriations put into this bill, because they themselves believe that such appropriations are unconstitutional. Sir, have we fallen upon times like these, that gentlemen band themselves together to seize upon the national treasure and appropriate it to their own use, denying all share to those who chance not to agree with them in their construction of the constitutional power? If that is the doctrine let us understand it.

I have been falsely charged with being a disunionist; but if it be true that gentlemen who believe the National Treasury is subject to the unrestricted legislation of Congress, may seize the common fund; divide it among themselves, and deny all participation to those who will not justify the division, then, sir, I say it would be as honorable to consort with highwaymen as to live in such a Union. When the surplus revenue was distributed, was Virginia and Mississippi denied their distributive share because they opposed the distribution? No; if you have so much respect for our opinions as not to give us our share of the money because we think you ought not to use it in this way, then I pray you carry your respect a little further. We believe that you have no power to tax us as you do under the protective policy. Will you so far respect our opinions as to withhold taxation? No, sir; you will impose taxation whatever may be our opinions; and you do it without stint or mercy. It is only when you come to disburse the money that you are seized with these violent fits of respect for our opinions. If you cannot appropriate money in my district out of respect for my constitutional opinions on the subject of these appropriations, then carry your respect a little further, and quit taxing my constituents until I am satisfied that you are doing it according to the Constitution. If you may take money out of my district without my consent, you may put it back without my consent. If we are to have a partial system of distribution, then let us have a partial system of taxation. If my State is to be thus excluded from the appropriations, let her be stricken from the tax list. Cease to draw money from her, and she relinquishes forever all claim upon the National Treasury. But if the hand that gathers is thrust into her pocket, she calls it robbery if you close against her the hand that distributes.

Mr. McMULLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I rise to a question of order. I understand that the appropriation proposed in this amendment is not to continue any work that has already been commenced, or that is authorized by law. I would inquire of the Chair whether, that being the case, it is in order under the 81st rule, which is as follows:

"81. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, this whole bill is out of order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that this bill is to provide for the carrying on of works which have been already commenced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that that rule has reference to the general appropriation bills reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and not to this bill, which was reported from the Committee on Commerce. The Chair therefore decides that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi is in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. From that decision I appeal, and I believe the appeal is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir, it is not debatable.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Then I simply ask that the Clerk may read the 81st rule, so that the committee may understand it.

Loud cries of "Object!"

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN entertained the motion, and proceeded to divide the committee upon it.

Mr. McMULLIN. I rise to a question of order. That motion cannot be entertained. I was upon the floor to speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi; the gentleman from Ohio rose to a question of order, and I took my seat until that question of order was decided. I insist that no gentleman has a right to take the floor from me to submit any motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is right. The facts are as he has stated, and the motion that the committee do now rise is not in order, unless he yields the floor for that purpose.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. My colleague retained his seat until the committee was actually dividing on my motion. It was too late for him to claim the floor then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that that does not take away from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] his right to the floor.

Mr. DISNEY. Suppose this question of order should be continued for half a day, would it not be competent for the committee to rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal must be decided at once, and without debate.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. ORR. I raise another question of order, that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi is not germane to the amendment to which it is offered. The one is to improve the Tennessee river, and the other is to improve a river in Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is germane and in order.

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield the floor for a motion to rise?

Mr. McMULLIN. I yield it for that purpose.

Mr. ORR. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put, and on a division there were—ayes 60, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. OLDS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 282, "making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to call up the resolution proposing to fix a day for the final adjournment; which has been sent back from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I object.

Mr. EWING. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for one moment?

Mr. EWING. I withdraw it.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope there will be no objection now to taking up and disposing of the bill which I mentioned this morning, to authorize the President to place in the hands of our citizens on the frontier arms for the protection of themselves against the Indians.

Mr. WARD. I object, and move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 24, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the following bill was ordered to be laid on the table, viz: "A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, commencing at the village of Pontiac, in the county of Oakland, and terminating on the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in the county of Ottawa."

Mr. FOWLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a bill, of which previous notice has been given, merely for the purpose of having it referred.

Mr. ORR. Let us first hear it read.

The title of the bill was read, as follows: "A bill amendatory of the several acts regulating the appraisement of imported merchandise, and more effectually to prevent frauds against the revenue."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. DUNCAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present the following bill, to which, I am sure, there will be no objection. I ask that it be read for information.

The bill was read by its title, as follows: "A bill to reduce the duties on certain articles, and to exempt certain articles from duty."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. SCHERMERHORN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, and to which, I presume, there will be no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to any bills being introduced, and call for the regular order of business.

OAKLAND AND OTTAWA RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of House bill No. 290, to grant the right of way and a portion of the public lands to a certain railroad in Michigan. The pending motion is to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone the further consideration of that motion until Wednesday next; and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I hope the consideration of this bill will be postponed longer than that. If a day further off is fixed, I shall have no objection.

Mr. STUART. If it is desired to postpone the consideration to a later day, I have no objection. I do not wish to take up the time of the House with it now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has a motion been made to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. No such motion has been made.

Mr. JONES. Then I make that motion.

Mr. STUART. I apprehend the gentleman could not get the floor for that purpose. I was upon the floor myself.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider not being debatable, unless the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] desired to make a motion, he could not hold the floor, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] had a right to make the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STUART. To make a motion is the precise purpose for which I rose.

Mr. MEADE. Before we proceed further with this matter, I desire to know what the bill is?

The bill was again read by its title.

Mr. STUART. I now hope the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to make the motion to postpone, if that motion can be made. I will not make any other motion with reference to the bill.

Mr. JONES. We are now within a few weeks of the close of the session, and it is necessary to economize time as much as possible, in order to get through with the public business.

Mr. STUART. But it will take but a minute to postpone the bill.

Mr. JONES. I know it will not, but if we postpone it till Wednesday next it will come up again then, and we shall have it all to go over again. I think it is better to dispose of the bill now.

Mr. STUART. If the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table is to be put now, I ask for a call of the House, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HAMILTON, and STEVENS of Pennsylvania, were appointed; and the House being counted, the tellers reported—ayes 31.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put upon the motion for a call of the House, and there were—yeas 44, nays 72, the Speaker voting in the negative to make a quorum.

So a call of the House was refused.

When the name of Mr. COTTMAN was called, Mr. WALSH rose and stated that his colleague [Mr. COTTMAN] had for some time been detained from the House, in consequence of the sickness of a child, and he was now detained on account of her death.

Mr. CLEVELAND stated that Mr. Grow was confined to his room by indisposition.

Mr. STUART. I now move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that motion is already pending, as well as the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. The latter motion must first be put, unless the gentleman from Tennessee withdraws it.

Mr. JONES. I decline to withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the Chair state the precise motion?

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the House, by a vote, laid the bill on the table. A motion was then made to reconsider that vote. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] now moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, which is the motion now pending, and upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then put, and decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Bartlett, Bibbhaus, Bragg, Brockbridge, Burrows, Caldwell, Caskie, Chastain, Cleveland, Daniel, Edmundson, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Goodnow, Grey, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hebard, Hibbard, Hittler, Horsford, John W. Howe, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, McAnallan, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Millson, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Perkins, Powell, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Thaddeus Stevens, Wallace, and Wildrick—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, Barrere, Bissell, Bowne, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Geo. H. Brown, Busby, E. C. Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Chinguan, Cobb, Conger, Cullum, John G. Davis, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Green, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Hasall, Haven; Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Miller, Miner, Nabers, Olds, Orr, S. W. Parker, Penn, Pennington, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Price, Richardson, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Stuart, Taylor, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Wilcox, and Yates—81.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Wednesday next.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I move to amend the motion by striking out "Wednesday next" and inserting "two weeks from next Tuesday."

Mr. STUART. I hope the bill will not be postponed longer than Wednesday next.

The question was put upon the adoption of the amendment, and upon a division, there were—ayes 62, noes 61.

Mr. FICKLIN demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and St. MARTIN were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 69.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Wednesday next was then agreed to.

WHEELING BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the bill "declaring the Wheeling bridge a lawful structure, and for other purposes." The pending motion being to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and print.

Mr. OLDS. I move to postpone the further consideration of that bill till a week from the next Monday. There are other matters from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads which I desire to have come up; and as the bill will be likely to occupy considerable time, I move its postponement till Monday week.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there not a motion pending to print the minority report?

The SPEAKER. The motion was to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to print the majority and minority reports.

Mr. STUART. I hope its consideration will be postponed until a week from Wednesday next, instead of Monday.

Mr. OLDS. I have no objection to that, and will so modify my motion.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope the motion will be so framed as to include the motion to print both the majority and minority reports. All I desire is that these reports shall be printed.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio state what is his precise motion?

Mr. OLDS. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until a week from Wednesday next, and that the two reports be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of the Southern Michigan Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time by its title and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Cornelius Covert, of Michigan; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. CLARK. I ask that it shall take the same course.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a short statement to the House, and then I shall move to put the bill upon its passage. It is simply a bill for the relief of a contractor for carrying the mail, where the contract was entered into under a mistake. It is conceded by the Postmaster General that the mistake was made. His contract should have been entered into for $419, whereas it was entered into, through a mistake, for $219. The Postmaster General examined into the matter, and conceded that it was an error, but he thought he had not the power to correct it, but that it must be done by Congress. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have also examined into the subject, and they are of the opinion that it was, unquestionably, an error, and that the man ought to be relieved. He is running upon the line now, and running at a great disadvantage. Not being a man of means, it embarrasses him greatly to carry out his contract; yet if he does not carry it out, the Department will prosecute him. This is, in a few words, a correct statement of the facts of the case. The mistake was made of inserting $219, when it should have been $419.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? In the proposal, what was the sum named?

Mr. STUART. Four hundred and nineteen dollars. It is merely an error in drawing up the contract. The bill proposes to give him, not what was his bid, but to give him the bid of the next man under him. I know the man very well—I live but a few miles from him, and I know that this delay embarrasses him very much. I hope the House will pass the bill.

The question now being upon the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole House—

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection to the bill being put upon its passage, and will withdraw the motion to commit, to enable the gentleman to make his motion. I will state, however, in this connection, that this bill stands upon about the same ground as a large class of bills.

Mr. STUART. I now move to put the bill upon its passage.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. BISSELL. I am very far from wishing to do anything to embarrass this bill, but I would like to know of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CLARK,] what we are to understand by his remark, that this is but one of a class of cases?

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman is to understand just this—

Mr. KING, of New York. This bill makes an appropriation, and must, except by unanimous consent, go to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STUART. No, sir; it does not make any new appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The bill provides for the payment of money out of the Post Office fund not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STUART. It does not raise any money or make any new appropriation, but simply corrects a mistake.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is evidently an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it must go to a Committee of the Whole, if it is insisted on, under the rule.

Mr. STUART. I hope no one will insist upon it. The case is precisely as I stated; the facts are clear; and there is no dispute about it by the Postmaster General, and none by the committee. It will be seen by the committee that this man does not get what he paid, but simply gets $396 instead of $419; which was his bid. The Postmaster General recommended that amount, because if that man's had not been taken, the one at $396 would have been.

Mr. STEVENS. In consequence of the remark, that this was one of a whole class of cases of this kind, I must ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARK. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] I did not mean to say that there is another case just like this; but—

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill must be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STUART. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to withdraw his objection. He can learn from the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CLARK,] the chairman of the committee, that the facts of the case are just as I have stated them.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. STEVENS. It is a most extraordinary mistake in the Postmaster General, if it be one; and if it be a mistake, it is most extraordinary if he cannot correct it; and if there is a whole class of cases of this kind, I must have time to look into them.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman from Iowa will not say that there is another case precisely like this.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot say that there is another case precisely like this; but there are cases for obtaining pay for carrying the mail, and the cases are alike in this respect.

Mr. BISSELL. I do not wish to be understood as interposing any objection myself.

Mr. STUART. This bill is not for an increase of pay, but is an absolute deduction from what the parties supposed they were to receive, reducing that pay from $419 to $396.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to know of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] when this contract was entered into?

Mr. STUART. It was entered into some year or two ago, but I cannot tell the time precisely. The contract is now in force, and the man is now carrying the mail.

Mr. LETCHER. When was the mistake ascertained?

Mr. STUART. A short time after the contract was entered into. The Department was notified of it by my predecessor. When I came on I went to the Postmaster General. He referred the case to his law officer to examine, and they determined that the mistake ought to be rectified; but that they had not the power to do it, and that the contractor must come to Congress for relief.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to say that I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will withdraw his objection. We examined this case fully in committee, and were satisfied that the mistake ought to be rectified, and if he were to examine it a whole day he would come to the same conclusion.

The SPEAKER. Unless the objection be withdrawn, the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The objection was not withdrawn, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIER.

Mr. BISSELL. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BISSELL. I feel it my duty again to ask the House that they will take up and pass the bill to which I referred on yesterday, which is to authorize the Executive to furnish the citizens upon the frontiers with arms to protect themselves against the Indians. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take it up.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

No objection was made, and the bill was reported to the House by its title, as follows:

"H. R. No. 259. An act to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, Oregon, and the States of Texas and California."

The amendments made to the bill by the Senate were then read by the Clerk.

Mr. STANLY. I shall interpose, Mr. Chairman; no delay to the passage of this bill, but I wish to call the attention of the House to one or two facts before they pass it. This is a very important measure to Texas, and the frontiers, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] tells us. There is no doubt about that, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] thinks so too. Now, sir, whenever there is any trouble on the Texan frontiers with the Indians, amounting to the destruction of a pig, or the killing of a cow, we are threatened with an Indian war, and the expense goes on, we do not know to what extent. We are to have the expense of the Government now increased by the amendments which the economical Senate have put to this bill—the economical Senate, who are very fond of scolding the House of Representatives—and about which I intend to say a word, when that resolution relating to adjournment comes up.

We shall have, I believe, an expense put upon the country of more than $1,000,000 a year, if this bill becomes a law; and the consequence will be, that at the next session of Congress we shall have, besides the regular estimates for the appropriation, a deficiency bill to pay the expenses incurred by this bill. In a month or two after this bill passes, some outcry will be raised about Indian devastations upon the Texan frontiers; a few public meetings will be held; the President will be called upon to authorize the raising of these five hundred mounted volunteers. They will come into service, and then a deficiency of nearly $1,000,000 will be called for, while the Administration for the time being will be held responsible for this increase of expense, caused by this act of Congress, and for which there will be no regular appropriation.

Now, sir, I hold in my hand a document transmitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, at the early part of this session, from the Secretary of the Treasury. The document is No. 29. My honorable friend [Mr. HOWARD] from Texas, writes to the Secretary, and asks for an estimate of the amount required to pay the four companies of Texan mounted volunteers, who have not been paid. The Secretary of the Treasury sends to the House the estimate, and afterwards the estimate for another company, making five altogether.

By referring to document No. 28, to which I have alluded, you will find this estimate:

Estimate of amount required to pay four Companies of Texas Mounted Volunteers, called into the service of the United States by Brevet Major General George M. Brooke, and Brevet Brigadier General W. S. Horney.

Name of Captain	Period of service.	Amount.
H. E. McCulloch.	May 5 to Nov'r 5, 1851.	$18,119 00
A. A. Wallace.	March 23 to Sept. 23, 1851.	17,450 00
D. O. Connor.	March 17 to July 18, 1851.	12,266 00
A. S. Ford.	March 23 to Sept. 23, 1851.	17,950 00
Total.		65,785 00

The estimate for the fifth company was some $15,000 or $16,000, making in all about $80,000, which has gone into the deficiency bill. It will be observed that these estimates are for "pay," and that does not include, according to estimates I have been enabled to make, one third part of the actual amount of expense of these five companies of Texan volunteers. That merely "pays" the men. Now, sir, there is all the forage, there is all the immense cost of transporting those men, and supplies from wherever they may be ordered to the frontier, and which cost will be a great deal more than the "pay" of the men. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars will not pay the expense of those five companies of Texan volunteers called into service at that time.

Now, sir, when all this outcry is made about our expenses—and I do not think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] has indulged in it, but it has come from other quarters—we are not only to have Texas included within the provisions of this bill, but we are to have Utah and California added to the bill by the Senate. We are to have an expense of $1,000,000 entailed upon this country by this bill through these amendments from the Senate, and it is an ungracious task to oppose it. The cry is, "the frontiers are in danger; the Indians are committing devastations; men, women, and children are murdered, and property is being destroyed."

But I want to make a remark for the sake of future reference, and to let the country know how the expenditures are increased. I commend the forbearance and patriotism of gentlemen from the West and North, who give their votes day and day, for these appropriations, without raising any objection. Those who are so anxious to protect the frontiers, turn a deaf ear to the demand of protection by American laborers. Thousands of lives and millions of dollars are lost on the western waters for want of a river and harbor bill, but the Senate will not allow the country to have such a bill. You must adjourn at one or two o'clock on Fridays and Saturdays, and cannot sit five or six hours for the purpose of getting through that bill. Millions of property are destroyed by snags in the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, and life there does not seem to be regarded. Hundreds of men are sunk by a single snag in the Mississippi; and this is all right; but let an Indian kill a white man upon the frontiers, and you go to the expense of millions of dollars. I do not object to all proper expenditure for this purpose, but I wish to see justice done to other parts of the country. These extraordinary expenses have not come from this House. Let the Senate bear the responsibility of this act. We are to be abused and censured for loss of time, and it may be all right to favor the gentlemen who would fasten this immense appropriation upon us, without any committee of this House having passed upon it, or having examined it. I shall not call the yeas and nays upon it, but I shall not vote for the bill as it stands, for I have not had a chance to examine it. Let the responsibility of this immense expenditure, which, in less than twelve months will amount to more than $1,000,000, be upon the heads of those who advocate it, and not upon us.

Mr. BISSELL. It is the duty of the Government to protect its citizens upon the frontiers, or it is not. If it is not, then this bill ought not to be here at all; and, being here, it ought to be voted down—not the Senate amendments only, but the entire bill. If it be conceded that it is our duty to protect those citizens, then we must do so, cost what it may; though we ought, doubtless, to have due regard to the economy as well as the efficiency of the mode we may adopt of performing that duty.

The most important of these Senate amendments contains a well-guarded provision for raising, if, in the opinion of the Executive, it becomes necessary to do so, a force of volunteer mounted rangers, not to exceed five hundred in number, to operate in defense of the frontiers; and, though raised for one year, they are liable to be discharged the very moment the necessity which called them forth shall cease to exist. I doubt whether the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] can devise any better mode of accomplishing the object.

Mr. STANLY. Such a force is three times as expensive as that of the regular Army; and we give the President the power to call them into service when he wants them.

Mr. BISSELL. On the question of relative cost, the gentleman, I think, is clearly mistaken. But has he no confidence in the discretion of the President?

Mr. STANLY. More than you have, I suspect.

Mr. BISSELL. I have sufficient faith in the present Executive cheerfully to intrust him with this discretionary power. I have no thought that Mr. Fillmore will call out the rangers provided for by this bill, unless it becomes indispensable to do so for the protection of the lives and property of our citizens. Nor do I fear that any man likely to be chosen to the Presidency in future will exercise the very plain powers conferred by this bill unwisely. I feel quite sure that Mr. Pierce will not, and I do not think any other man will have the opportunity, at least not for four or five years to come.

It is incumbent upon us, beyond all question, to protect, by some means, those frontier citizens from the hostile savages with which they are surrounded. We ought to protect them effectually. It is a crying sin against us that we have delayed that protection so long. The best, the most effectual, the most economical mode of doing it, is, in my judgment, that provided for by the bill now before us. It is true, we have a regular Army, which, to some, may seem sufficient for all our necessities. But this which we are now considering is a peculiar service, requiring for its proper performance a particular description of force—mounted rangers. The foe is the wild Indian; his mode of warfare that common to his race. He makes his descent upon the settler stealthily and suddenly, and retreats again to his place of concealment as rapidly as his fleet horse can carry him. Of what use are infantry or artillery here? Who but mounted rangers, men living upon the spot, acquainted with Indian habits, practiced in border warfare, and, to some extent, familiar with the country, can operate effectively against such a foe? Nor is it a small consideration that the men liable to be called into service under this bill would feel the additional stimulus imparted by the knowledge that they were fighting for the protection of their own firesides. The comparatively small mounted force belonging to our regular Army is scattered, in detached corps, from one extreme of the Union to the other. They could not, without great expense, be marched from Oregon, for instance, or other remote points, to the borders of Texas; nor is it probable that that could ever be done in so short a time as to answer any good purpose.

Mr. GIDDINGS. With the gentleman's permission I will propound to him a question. I care nothing about these presidential matters. I wish to inquire why the necessity of this increase of the Army? If the troops we have there are not fit for service, in Heaven's name why not discharge them, and secure those that are? My objection is to an increase of the Army, and the consequent increase of expenditure. We have an Army upon hand for the protection of the Union, and if they are not capable of protecting it, why not discharge them and appoint others?

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] considers the regular Army all-sufficient for the purposes contemplated in this bill. I have already explained, in part, my reasons for thinking otherwise. Suppose it were attempted to carry out the views of that gentleman, what, probably, would be the result? An emergency arises, consequent upon Indian ravages, requiring the instant presence of a military force, say on the frontier of Texas. Mounted troops—the only ones that could be of any possible use—might then be ordered from Oregon, and other distant points. The expense of transportation would be enormous, and the unavoidable delay such as to render the movement wholly nugatory. Before the troops could arrive at their place of destination the necessity for their presence would have passed away; our citizens will have been slaughtered, their plantations devastated, and the Indians by whom the outrages were committed will have found safety in their mountain fastnesses.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Why not take the troops from Fort Washington, and the Atlantic coast, where they are of no use?

Mr. BISSELL. Because, first, the cost of transporting them to the points at which troops might be needed on the frontier would more than equal, probably, the expense of raising all the force needed right here in the vicinity of the troubles; and, secondly, because, as I have already said, they are not that description of troops requisite for this service.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Are they of any use where they are?

Mr. BISSELL. Perhaps so, perhaps not. I do not answer for that; and it is quite clear that whether they are or are not useful, our exposed citizens on the western frontiers are free from responsibility on that score.

Although the bill authorizes the President to call for as many as five hundred volunteers, yet it does not follow that in any event which may arise he will call for even half that number. He will exercise a sound discretion, and accept the services of only so many as the exigency of the case may require. Perhaps not more than a hundred will ever be called for under this law; perhaps not one; and those, few or many, who may be received into the service are to be retained only so long as there may be actual necessity for it; and they are only to receive pay accordingly. A sudden incursion of the Indians may make it necessary on the instant to raise a company of fifty or one hundred Texan rangers. In twenty days they may have performed the requisite service, when they will receive their discharge and return to their respective homes. But instead of this simple and natural mode of accomplishing a plain but most important object, gentlemen would have us incur the expense and delay of transporting regular soldiers to the scene of hostilities—soldiers who, from the nature of the service to be performed, are worthless when they get there.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I did not intend any such thing.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois what number of the regular troops of the Army are now stationed in Texas?

Mr. BISSELL. The precise number I do not now recollect. I believe, however, the number to be amply sufficient for the protection of the frontiers of that State if they were the right description of troops; but they are not. Three hundred mounted Texan rangers are worth, for Indian fighting, twice the number of regular troops now in Texas.

Mr. FULLER. I believe there is something like one third of the regular Army now there.

Mr. BISSELL. Very probably. But for any use they are of in the way we are now considering, they might just as well be taken away.

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state a fact. Some time last summer, I fell in company with General Garland, who, I understand, is in command of that frontier. I asked him to explain to me, if he could, why these outrages and depredations continued upon that frontier, what kind of troops were necessary to prevent them, and how many? His reply to me was, "My dear sir, I have troops enough now there, if it is the will of the American Congress, to 'exterminate every Indian between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.'" "What, then," I inquired, "is the cause of them?" "Why, sir," said he, "the whole difficulty lies here: the State of Texas gives license to white men to mingle and trade among the Indians, and they keep them in a state of insubordination." He said, repeating his remark, "I have men enough to exterminate every Indian between the two oceans."

Mr. BISSELL. I should like to know, then, why the gallant General has permitted so many outrages and so much slaughtering to be done by the Indians on that frontier? Surely it were an easier task to protect that frontier, than to exterminate all the Indians between the two oceans.

Mr. DISNEY. I tell the tale as it was told to me.

Mr. BISSELL. Yes, but you were not told the whole tale. The General, if I am not misinformed, is not upon the frontiers of Texas at all—perhaps not within two or three hundred miles of the scene of difficulties. On the contrary he is at a post quite in the interior. Had he been differently situated, and with more experience in Indian warfare upon that frontier, he might have formed a different estimate as to what could be done with the Indians with his small force. Though I doubt not that, with that force, he could accomplish all that any man could, for I regard him as an excellent and brave officer. But the fact that these outrages have continued, notwithstanding the presence of such a force in Texas, is conclusive that something else is requisite to be done. And I repeat the expression of my own deliberate conviction, that that "something" necessary to be done is wisely and economically provided for in the bill now before us. Give the President the discretionary power to call for rangers when the necessity arises, under the restrictions provided in the bill, it being incumbent upon him to discharge them the moment the necessity ceases, and you have done all that is requisite for the protection of the frontiers, and done it effectually.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the amendment does not provide that their services shall not be accepted for less than a year?

Mr. BISSELL. It provides that the engagement to serve shall be for one year. This is the engagement on the part of the volunteer. He is to serve so long, unless sooner discharged. But it is the right and the duty of the President to discharge the volunteers thus raised the moment their services can be dispensed with. They may be discharged within ten days, and even without being marched to the seat of war.

Mr. STANTON. Is it not provided that, if they are called into service, their pay shall be continued through the year?

Mr. BISSELL. Not at all. It provides for their payment for the time they actually serve—no more. If they serve for ten days, and are then discharged, they are to be paid for those ten days, and for them only. It seems to me that there can be no sufficient objection to this mode of protecting our frontiers, if we concede protection to be due them. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] seems to suppose that all these Indian troubles arise from the conduct of mischievous white men, who are permitted to mingle and trade with the Indians. To some extent that may be true; but not, I imagine, to the extent supposed by that gentleman. No doubt there are vicious white men among the Indians, who do sometimes instigate them to perpetrate outrages upon our frontier settlers. But what then? Is the honest and peaceable settler, in the pursuit of his own avocations at home, entitled to no protection from his Government? Are innocent women and children to be slaughtered at the pleasure of neighboring savages, and we raise no arm to save them because the foe has been instigated by outcasts from among ourselves? No, gentlemen; our Government must discharge its duty to all its citizens, especially in the protection of their lives. If it fails in this, it forfeits all claim to protection for itself.

Mr. STANLY. I will call the gentleman's attention to one point. If I mistake not, there is a provision here for the payment of horses lost in the service.

Mr. BISSELL. No, there is no provision of the kind.

Mr. STANLY. Is there not a provision for pensioning those wounded, as though they were in the regular service? I do not think that is right.

Mr. BISSELL. There is not.

At the request of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, the Clerk again read the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to correct one or two mistakes into which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] has fallen. As to the duty of this Government to protect all of its citizens, whether upon the frontier or upon the fishing ground, I presume there can be but one opinion. Now, sir, you have acquired a large territory which you must defend. You have undertaken in your treaty with Mexico to restrain your tribes within the United States. That provision of the treaty has been totally neglected, which every man in this House knows; and the consequence of that neglect will be that a large number of claims arising in Mexico, will be preferred here for payment. I presume that it is the intention of the House to protect the men who live upon the frontiers of Texas, California, Oregon, New Mexico, and Utah. Two methods have been proposed by which this is to be effected. The Administration has called for additional forces. The Administration, through its messages and reports, has told you that the present force is inadequate. They, to be sure, have called for an increase of the regular Army, but no one knows better than the honorable member from North Carolina that an increase of the regular Army cannot be accomplished. You cannot get a bill for that purpose through Congress, even if it were a proper measure. My own opinion is, that it is not necessary. That the regular Army requires reorganization is true; that we have no use for the increase of infantry, does not admit of doubt. That four regiments at least of the eight regiments of infantry now in service, ought to be converted into permanent cavalry, in order to make the Army efficient for the present frontier service, is the opinion of the best-informed officers in the Army.

But the cheapest and most efficient method of defending the frontiers, is the one which this bill proposes, which is to call out the resident militia, who understand the character of the service, who can perform it, and who can undergo the hardships to which it subjects every one embarked in it. General SHIELDS, of the Senate, has made a close calculation with regard to the expense of the two kinds of force, and he shows that the mounted rangers are thirty per cent., and more, cheaper than the regular Army. The whole amount of force contemplated by the bill, is 1,100 men for California, Oregon, Utah, New Mexico, and Texas. Under the estimate of General SHIELDS, if you increased the regular Army to the same extent, the annual cost would be $752,735 per annum for 1,100. The same force as proposed by the bill would cost $531,821 per annum. The pay of the rangers is greater; but you get clear of the expense of transportation of men and horses, which you must incur if regular troops are resorted to. It is these items, together with the expense of recruiting, which make regular troops more expensive than mounted rangers. With this species of force, the only expense is for the pay and rations of the men, and the forage of the horses. In addition to that, if you increase the Army, it will fasten this increase upon the establishment permanently, and you will make it a permanent expense; whereas, if you adopt this plan for protecting the frontiers, they will be strong enough in a very short time to protect themselves; and you will not need a permanent force, and will not incur a permanent expense. The enlistment is for only twelve months, and in a few years the force may be safely disbanded. A great deal has been said about the amount of troops now in service on the frontiers. Every man who has paid any attention to the subject, knows that the regular Army is totally deficient in cavalry, and that the Indian service requires cavalry; that it is as absurd to put infantry upon this service, as it is to put a man on foot in pursuit of a man mounted on a fleet horse on the prairies. If you had ten times the number of men upon the frontier as you now have, they could not give protection, unless they were mounted. An increase of infantry is not an increase of the defenses of the frontier.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. This Administration, at the last session of Congress, recommended an increase of two or more regiments of mounted men, besides the increase of the infantry and the companies of artillery, so as to make virtually four regiments.

Mr. HOWARD. That would make the expense four times as great, and would not furnish as efficient a force as the employment of hardy frontiersmen, who are good riders, accustomed to hardship, and acquainted with Indian habits and character. According to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY], this increase of the regular Army proposed by the Administration to the last Congress, would make an additional expense of $3,000,000 a year; whereas this plan proposed by the bill under discussion, furnishing eleven hundred men for Oregon, California, Utah, New Mexico, and Texas, cannot much exceed $500,000. It must be apparent that this is the efficient mode—the cheap method, and that it will furnish a force which will do some good. As to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] says in relation to General Garland, I would say that he is a very clever gentleman, but he has done as little Indian fighting in Texas as the honorable gentleman from Ohio himself, and not as much, for I believe he did join us there in a fight when we had the Mexicans to deal with. I wish to state to the House, as this matter has been dragged in here, the way the regular Army of the United States makes a campaign against the Indians, as stated to me by one of the Indian agents. Before they leave camp, it is understood about a week, that a party is going out in pursuit of the Indians, and of course the Indians know all about it. Well, then they get ready, take eight or ten days' provisions, blow all their horns, beat the drums, and march out. The Indians go before them until their eight or ten days' provisions are exhausted, and then these regulars start back into camp, returning home at a much faster rate than when they went out, and the Indians generally come back after them at their leisure. The men are not accustomed to and not fitted for the rapid movements necessary to overtake Indians. They are excellent troops for regular warfare, but not adapted to frontier service.

I do not wish to say anything in disparagement of the regular Army, but they are totally unfit for this Indian service, as at present organized. The privates are not the right material. The men whom they recruit from the cities, and from other places, cannot undergo the hardship, and they know nothing of riding. They know nothing of frontier life. The regular officers of the United States Army are equal to any hardships or any service, but you have never given them men who can perform service upon the frontier. Your infantry upon the frontiers are totally useless. They are not put there except to prove the necessity for keeping up these posts. Every man knows that if you have a cavalry force you cannot keep in the saddle at any one time, more than one-third or one-fourth of the force, and there are always plenty of men to keep the posts and guard the forts, if you have only an exclusive cavalry force on the frontier. It is, therefore, idle to talk of increasing the Army by infantry, in the manner proposed by the Administration. If you were to increase it, it would be four times as expensive as this plan, and totally inefficient when done. Regular cavalry, who have been for a series of years upon the frontier, acquire the habits and experience of frontier life. But what you want is immediate service, and it would take two or three years drill of raw dragoon recruits to render them at all efficient.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know of the gentleman from Texas, if he can give us the information; what amount of troops Texas had upon this frontier when she had to guard her settlements against these Indians, and what amount of United States force there is now in the different forts. In other words, I desire to know if Texas did not defend that entire frontier from the Indians with two companies of mounted troops? You have there now some two or three regiments. Can they protect the frontier as well as two such companies?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] if this force is absolutely necessary in order to protect those regular troops? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. I believe the infantry have some horses which they come down to steal. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON], I will say it is true that Texas protected her frontier with two or three companies, but the frontier is now much more extended. It is true that there is a large force of United States troops upon the frontiers of Texas; but as I have said before, they are not a mounted force, and not of that character which will give security to the frontier and perform the service required there. When Texas had her three companies, they were always mounted, and they performed a vast amount of service. They rode everywhere; they could kill the game in the prairies, and supply themselves with food when necessary, and could undergo any amount of hardship. They always moved rapidly, because not encumbered with the baggage which every regular Army will demand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am satisfied from my observation about these things, and some little experience, that the regular Army is not the right kind of force to benefit the frontier against the Indians, and that you must have that kind of force settled in the neighborhood of the Indians who understand and are acquainted with their habits. One company taken from Texas will do more good in their defense than three companies of the regular Army. I do not believe that the regular Army can be equalled, however, by volunteers, where they have to fight a force upon the field; but where you have to hunt up the enemy, as you do the Indians, the men who settle upon the frontier are the best troops in the world to defend the frontier. I am clearly of the opinion that Congress should pass some act by which you will make the people who live upon the frontier defend themselves and pay them for it.

Mr. HOWARD. As to that feature of the bill which provides for arming the citizens of the frontiers, I have only to say, that the arms are here rusting in the arsenal, and they would not cost the Government one dollar except for transportation. There can be no sound objection to making that disposition of the arms.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman I wish to say, that in the report of the War Department I find a letter of Captain S. G. French, of the Quartermaster's Department, in the first part of the President's message and accompanying documents of the present session, page 233. Captain French says, speaking of the Indians in Texas, in the eighth military department:

"Their numbers appear to have been considerably overestimated, if the reports of men who have been among them can be relied on, and the information gained by Lieutenant Colonel Hardee, in his expedition to their country, be correct. It is believed that the entire numbers, including all ages and the different sexes, of all the tribes that frequent the border settlements of Texas in the eighth military department does not exceed 4,000.

"The respective numbers of the different bands may be set down, by their own computation principally, about as follows: Delawares, 63; Shawnees, 70; Tonkaways, 300; Quapaws, 200; Caddoes, 160; Anadokes, 200; Joneses, 113; Keechies, 48; Tawacuoos, 140; Wacoos, 114; Lepanses, 350; Lower Camanches, 700; and the Northern Camanches at 1,500."

If this statement be correct, there are not exceeding 4,000 Indians of all ages, sexes, and conditions in the eighth military department, composed of the State of Texas. I should think that they would not number more than 800 or 1,000 warriors. By the Report of the Adjutant General, in the same book, page 201, giving the strength and condition of the Army, their actual returns and their location, he says—

"That when this report was made to Congress last November, there were stationed in Texas, as present, 1,837 troops."

He put down the aggregate force of those who were present and absent, and which they had in Texas, as 2,319—one man, if this report be true, for every two Indians of all ages, sexes, and conditions in that country. I understand that they have taken some troops from Oregon; and I believe it is shown by this same report that in all California and Oregon at this time we had less than 750 troops.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Will the gentleman state also the number of troops that are located in New Mexico?

Mr. HOWARD. I will say a word in relation to Mr. French. It is very easy for a United States officer to go out to New Mexico, dressed in regimentals, and run through that country, and then send a report to the Department. Such loose information is not entitled to any weight on such a subject. The former agent who resided among these Indian tribes for years, reports the actual number of Indians, resident in Texas, about 10,000. It is well known, in addition to that, that there are tribes who penetrate into Texas from the Territory of New Mexico, and other Territories of the United States; so at some seasons there are probably 20,000 Indians in Texas, during the winter season, committing all sorts of depredations. If they will give us what we ask for in this bill, I should be quite willing that the infantry should be withdrawn from Texas altogether. I say that this force is entirely useless, and worse than useless. It is absurd to suppose that such a force can be made available for the defense of the country against the inroads of mounted Indians. How is a man on foot to run down an Indian on a fleet horse? It is preposterous to say that such a force can do anything for the defense of the frontier in Texas, Oregon, or New Mexico.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] I will state that, according to the report of the Adjutant General, made last fall, there were in the ninth military department (New Mexico) 1,459 troops, and in Texas and New Mexico some 3,500 troops.

Mr. STANLY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] one question. I wish to ascertain whether the State of Texas does not refuse to let the United States exercise any jurisdiction over the Indians in her territory at all? If that be so, Texas, before she calls upon us to authorize her to take men to protect herself, ought, at least, to consent that the United States should exercise jurisdiction over those Indians, and make treaties with them, or remove them, or otherwise exercise authoritative influence over them.

Mr. HOWARD. The State of Texas has consented to every jurisdiction which this Government has asked over these Indians. The Government has never pretended that the Indians owned any fee, or right of occupancy. This Administration, as well as all past Administrations, take the ground that they could not make any treaty of limits without the assent of Texas, but whenever they have applied to the State of Texas for any regulation giving them the right of control over the Indians, it has, so far as I know, up to this time, been granted. The fact is, that the Government of the United States has left the subject too much at loose ends.

Mr. STANLY. Does not the State of Texas forbid the traders of the United States from going there, and has she not refused to give any reservation to Indians inside her borders?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir. The facts of the case are these. I was of the opinion, and still am of the opinion, that the United States Government has a right, under the Constitution, to regulate the commerce with the Indians, and that it is a power conferred upon the Federal Government.

I made an application myself to the Indian Department under the present Administration to exercise that power, because I considered it proper that the United States should regulate the traders and the trade with the Indians; but the Department declined, upon the ground that they had no jurisdiction over the subject, which, in my opinion, is as clear a mistake as ever was committed. It is a jurisdiction expressly given by the Constitution over all Indian tribes. Texas, by her legislation, has permitted the Indians to reside temporarily and hunt north of a certain line, but with no right to pass south of it, without express permission. The line has been recognized and acted upon by this Government. The State has dealt liberally with the Indians, considering that they have no right of occupancy in Texas. And as to the other suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina, Texas has never opposed the General Government in its right to make treaties with the Indians. The State has admitted the right as to everything but that of negotiating about occupancy, and the line between the Indians and the whites, and that power this Government has never claimed. The Indian agents of the United States, as to all other subjects, make treaties with the Indians without any opposition or question from the authorities of Texas.

Mr. STUART. I only wish to say a word or two upon this subject, and then I intend to move the previous question, believing that the matter has been sufficiently discussed before the House. I wish, in the first place, to enter my dissent, as one member of this House, with regard to the assertion made by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] that the treaty between this country and Mexico has not been complied with in regard to protecting their frontiers against the depredations of the Indians. However proper that may be argumentatively, I do not think the facts justify the conclusion, and I do not think this House ought to do an act which can be quoted against the Government at a future day in support of any such claim. Therefore, as a member of this House, I dissent from the proposition, so that, if the record is ever to be used, it shall not be said that the gentleman from Texas made the assertion, and that it was acquiesced in by this body.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to state that the Administration has made the same assertion, and called for additional forces.

Mr. STUART. Now, sir, in reference to this bill, the whole subject seems to me to resolve itself into a single question, which is this: Is the executive department of this country the proper depository of the discretion provided for in this bill? It seems to me that it is, not only by the Constitution, but by the practice of the Government.

Mr. CLEVELAND. As the gentleman from Michigan has given notice that he proposes to call for the previous question, will he allow me to say a word?

Mr. STUART. If the gentleman will be brief, I will, with pleasure.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to call the attention of the House to the importance of the bill now under consideration. We know very well at the time this bill was introduced here, at the solicitation and suggestion of the Representatives of these Territories and States, who feel particularly and specially interested in the matter, that they only asked of us an appropriation of money to purchase arms to be distributed to men to be used in case of emergency. That was as far as they went in their request, as every member of the House will recollect. Then, sir, in order to give them the protection sought, and save to the Government the unnecessary expenditure of money, an amendment was offered, by which provision was made that the arms not needed in the old States might be sent there for this purpose. That amendment prevailed, and in that shape the bill passed this House, to the entire satisfaction of every man who had charge of the matter from that section of the country. Now, I ask, whether any new feature has arisen which renders it important that this addition should be given?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I had the honor of introducing this bill for the benefit only of the people I represent. It was referred to the Committee on the Militia. As the bill came from the committee, it provided for the distribution of arms among the people of New Mexico, and authorized the President to call out troops in New Mexico and also in Oregon. When it came into the House, it was amended by the addition of California and Texas, so far as regards the distribution of arms, but it did not give authority to the President to call out troops, in cases of emergency, in California or Texas. The Senate amendment gives that authority to the President in reference to California and Texas.

Mr. CLEVELAND. When the bill passed this House, it gave to the men of Texas and New Mexico, wherever there existed danger from the incursions of Indian parties, arms; and it gave power to the President, through his authorized agent, to call out this force at once to repel an invasion, and then retire. That was all that was asked for. When the bill got into the Senate, this amendment was made to it, which I take the liberty to say is a regular addition to our regular Army of one thousand mounted men. All agree that the Army is too numerous now, not properly mounted, and not of a proper character; and really, some information fell from the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] that it was a nuisance in his State, and that Texan rangers were almost needed to protect our infantry there. But if you will examine the amendment of the Senate, you will find that it is a permanent increase of one thousand mounted men to our regular Army, for which we shall have to bear the expense through all coming time, and which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] says will be one million of money or more. This is an important matter, and I beg to call the attention of the House to it. Valuable as time is, I believe we can spend a little time profitably here in examining this matter, before we are called upon to increase the Army. Is there any man who has a vote in this House, who is bold enough to stand up and say that the Army which now exists, with a proper reorganization, is not all sufficient?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to make one remark? Does not this bill propose to pay the soldiers there double what the present troops receive?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. STEVENS. Why, it proposes to give them $22 a month.

Mr. HOWARD. No; it gives them the pay of volunteers. An estimate from General Shields shows that it is seven per cent. cheaper, and for this reason: These men on the ground furnish their own horses and clothes—everything but their arms; whereas, if you send regular troops there, you must pay the expense of transportation.

Mr. CLEVELAND. In the little time allowed me by the courtesy of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] I wish to expose to the House the character of this amendment. The original bill which passed this House had my support. No man is more ready than I am to afford additional protection to the frontier settlements, and I believe that is the common sentiment of the House; but in the amendment to this bill, you are clandestinely to get an additional increase for a regular army of one thousand mounted men, at an enormous expense. No man who has examined the bill will deny that assertion.

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman overlooks the fact altogether that it authorizes these troops to be enlisted for only a single year.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Surely; but let us examine this, for it seems to me that my friend from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] does not understand it, or I do not understand it. I beg to know whether they may not be reenlisted for a new year, when their year expires, and reenlisted through all coming time, in precisely the same manner of our regular Army? and no gentleman upon the floor understands it better than the gentleman from Illinois. Disguise it as you will, in point of fact this is a permanent increase to our regular Army of one thousand mounted men, for the benefit of a particular region, at an enormous expense, greater than any one corps we have. Gentlemen may say that they must be disbanded at the end of a year; that the enlistment expires at that time; but in no instance will that take place, for there never will be a time when there will not be Indians there to meet and repel. I deny that it is good policy for this House thus, not understanding what they are about, to make a regular increase of this character, or any other, to the Army; and especially one of this description. I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] in reference to this kind of legislation coming to us from the Senate. It has already carried $8,000,000 into the pockets of a private concern in New York, and millions in other directions. I think we ought to be careful how we make this addition to our Army, which all agree is now sufficiently numerous and expensive, by an amendment of the Senate to a bill which was asked for here by men who knew as well what was needed as any gentlemen now here, although they might not have had friends who wanted to get commissions.

Mr. STUART. I was proceeding to state, when I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLEVELAND,] that it seemed to me that, both under the Constitution and the practice of the country, this discretion has been vested in the Executive Department; and, sir, if the arguments used by gentlemen in opposition to this bill be true, why, the troops will not be raised, because there is no necessity for them; and if there is a necessity, they will and ought to be raised. I am willing to leave it there. I am perfectly satisfied, from the little I know about such subjects, that nothing short of a mounted force is worth anything at all in hunting down mounted Indians.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Have you in your experience ever known an office created by the Government where there were not plenty of men, and friends enough to provide for them?

Mr. STUART. I, sir, fortunately, or unfortunately, never enrolled myself in that list of men who suspect everybody.

Sir, the Constitution of the country vests certain powers in Congress, and certain in the Executive Department, and I am opposed, in the first place, to trenching upon them from any source; and, in the second place, I am willing to leave this responsibility where the Constitution has placed it, and let that Department assume and abide by the responsibility.

Now, sir, believing that this question has been discussed so far as discussion can be valuable, I move the previous question.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question, I desire to offer an amendment and make a motion, and I will renew his motion myself. I promise not to make a speech of more than two minutes in length.

Mr. STUART. My object is, sir, to terminate discussion. If I can, sir, without yielding the floor, allow the gentleman to submit his amendment and his motion, I will do so.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STUART. What amendment does the gentleman propose?

Mr. ORR. I propose to add to the Senate amendment this proviso:

Provided, That the President shall, before ordering out any troops authorized by the preceding sections, disband one of the regiments of infantry now in the service of the United States.

I then desire to move to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the bill and amendment be printed, so that the House can understand the action.

Mr. HOWARD. I appeal to the gentleman from South Carolina not to embarrass this bill with that amendment. The regular Army bill is the place for that. We have news every mail from California, Texas, and New Mexico, that the Indians are committing depredations, and butchering men, women, and children.

Mr. STUART. I cannot withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the gentleman from Michigan to withdraw his demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has declined to do so upon several applications.

Mr. STUART. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say that I wish to test the sense of the House upon this subject. I should be very glad to oblige the gentleman, but I think this matter has been already sufficiently discussed.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wish to remark—

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order. The gentleman from Michigan absolutely refuses to withdraw his motion.

The House was then divided upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and there was not a second.

Mr. ORR. I propose to amend the Senate amendment by adding the proviso which has just been read. I understand that the amendment of the Senate is in single sections.

The SPEAKER. The first pending amendment will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

"After the words New Mexico, in the first section, fifth line, insert the word Utah."

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] will not be in order to the first amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. ORR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to commit the bill and amendment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they may be printed. It is very evident—

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow the Chair. The first amendment proposed by the Senate to this bill is of a character which will not allow the amendment proposed as an amendment to the Senate amendment. The gentleman's amendment will be in order to the second amendment of the Senate, but not to the first.

Mr. ORR. This bill originated in the House of Representatives, to provide for arming citizens upon the frontiers. When it went to the Senate, an amendment or amendments were put into it, providing that additional troops should be raised, rangers and troops of that description. The proviso that I desire to insert is to come in at the end of that portion of the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order at that place, but not in order as an amendment to the first amendment of the Senate.

Mr. ORR. Will the Chair entertain the amendment now?

The SPEAKER. It cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think this is a very important bill. It goes to create a large force of eleven hundred or twelve hundred men, if I understand it, and it is going to be a permanent tax, not only for these men, but for their pensions for all future time. Now, it ought to be deliberately considered, and the idea that because these Indians have burnt villages, this bill must pass immediately, is one that I do not understand. I understand these popular appeals, the effect they have, and how little effect they ought to have. Now, I would suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] to move to refer this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, and let any amendments that may be suggested by gentlemen be considered there, and the bill reported back, which can be done in the course of three or four days, and the House can then act deliberately upon it. The plungings that we make are those which involve us in all the difficult and dangerous schemes of this Government, and every other Government, and are always brought upon us under the cry of some pressure. I have no doubt that some murders have been committed in Texas; but will the passage of this bill this day bring those who have been murdered back from their graves, or is there any danger that those murders will be renewed instantly? Why, the raising and organization of these troops will take some time, and three or four days will not make any difference. I hope gentlemen will not, therefore, act on this appeal which is made, and which seems to appeal to our feelings. It is a great permanent system—for it will be permanent. As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] said, it is not for a year, but a lease from year to year, enduring forever, and fixing upon the country a great military system. We gave all that was asked in the bill that passed this House. We gave arms to all the people upon this frontier, and we authorized the calling out of these people when they got those arms, whenever emergency should require it. This is nothing but an additional large army, to be permanent from year to year, and not when emergency requires it. We have authorized already, as I said before, the arming of all these people who are now to be converted into regular troops, and we have authorized them to be called out whenever there is occasion. What more is necessary? If a permanent addition to the Army is to be made, let it be made in a regular way. Let the country know it. Let us change the character of our forces if they are not good for anything. Let us disband them and convert them to some other species of troops which will be of service, and enlist, if you please, those who are accustomed to hunt down Indians. Let us do this in a regular way. I hope the gentleman will move to refer this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCURRY. With the permission of the gentleman from South Carolina, I desire to say a few words. This is a subject of considerable interest to the State which I have the honor in part to represent—although it does not so particularly interest that portion of the State to which I belong as it does the district of my colleague. I am satisfied, from the demonstrations that have been made in this House, that there is no possibility of passing this bill.

A MEMBER. Not now.

Mr. SCURRY. No, nor at any other time. I am convinced of that, and have been for some time past. All we want to know is, whether the Congress of the United States intend to afford that protection which is due from this Government to the people of Texas. If you do not intend to pass, kill this bill without evasion, and we shall then necessarily be compelled to rely on ourselves for our own protection. When that hour arrives, believe me, that the sons of Texas will be found at their posts and true to their trusts. When the people of Texas learn that the Government of the United States will stand quietly by and see their fellow-citizens massacred by the Indians and Mexicans; when they find that those depredations on the frontier, costing hundreds of lives a year, are passed by and totally disregarded by the Congress of the United States; they will feel and know that the period has arrived when they must rely upon themselves, and become their own protectors.

I know the officers of the United States Government stationed in Texas are all opposed to this kind of force; nor has the time ever been when the officers of the United States Army favored the employment of volunteers. The Government itself prefers the discipline and subordination of the regular Army, however inefficient to a volunteer force, even though that volunteer force were the most efficient that was ever employed in any species of warfare.

Now, as to the expense of this mode of defense. During the bloodiest period of the Mexican war, the United States stationed on the frontier of Texas, from the Rio Grande to the Red river, a regiment of volunteers, commanded by the present Governor of Texas. That regiment cost the Government less than any other regiment of mounted men in the service; and I state as a fact, without the fear of contradiction, that the frontier of Texas was better protected by that single regiment than it has ever been since Texas was annexed to the United States. During the time that regiment was upon the frontier, Indian depredations were unheard of; and why it is, with the enormous force, (a force represented here to be equal to the whole Indian population of Texas,) does not give equal security, is alone to be accounted for upon the ground that it is unfit for the service in which it is employed.

Much credit is due to the officers and men composing that regiment of volunteers, for the activity and energy which they displayed in giving security to the whole frontier. Their success arose, in part, from the system adopted, which converted the regiment into a daily moving column, extending from the Red river to the Rio Grande. This kind of service cannot be done with the regular infantry, even if they were disposed to undertake it; and I will be excused for questioning their disposition.

Sir, I earnestly desire that this bill may pass. I have spoken upon this subject from the fact that I am cognizant of the difficulties under which the people of Texas have labored; and I feel equally well satisfied that if this force is placed upon the Rio Grande, that it will not only repress the Indian and Mexican marauders, but it will also suppress and keep down those inroads of which gentlemen so loudly complain here as having been made into Mexico.

Give us a force from the citizens of the frontier, who are acquainted with the habits and warfare of the Indians and Mexicans, and who have been accustomed to fighting and pursuing them, and they will not only prevent filibustering expeditions into Mexico, but will check and put down depredations upon our own border. But let the infantry remain there unaided as it is; and our ears will continue to be saluted with the cry of woe from the scalped of the wilderness, and the most cruel massacres will still continue to be enacted.

Mr. ORR. I have occupied a good deal more time than I anticipated, but I hope the House will bear with me a little longer. I do not understand the gentleman from Texas, who has just resumed his seat, to charge directly that this Government has manifested any indisposition to protect the people of Texas. Whilst I am not very thoroughly informed as to the history of the present Administration, and as to how it stands affected to the people of Texas, I think that he might have spared the Government an imputation of that sort. There are now, Mr. Speaker, two thousand five hundred troops within the limits of Texas, or about that number. One of the gentlemen from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] tells us that they are utterly inefficient for the purposes for which they have been posted there. In addition to that large number, I am now just told that seven hundred more troops have been recently sent there—the rifle regiment.

Mr. HOWARD. The whole force there never has been over eighteen hundred men; and I will state another fact, that more than half of those are engaged in the duties of the Quartermaster's Department, cutting hay and wood.

Mr. ORR. Whether the force there was three thousand two hundred men, according to the official report of the Secretary of War now before me, or eighteen hundred, according to the gentleman from Texas, his argument shows very conclusively, that numbers is a matter of no consequence, for he says that the troops are utterly inefficient, and that it would be better to have no troops there at all.

Mr. HOWARD. I spoke of the infantry.

Mr. ORR. The Government has certainly shown a disposition to protect the people of Texas, and to protect the people of Mexico from the forays of the Indians, carrying out in good faith the stipulations of the treaty with Mexico, by posting some four thousand soldiers in the Territories of Texas and New Mexico. If the troops that have been sent there have proved inefficient for that purpose, then the amendment that I have presented should be adopted. Now, I have no prejudice against the plan which the gentleman from Texas has indicated as the proper one to defend well and efficiently the Texan frontier—none at all. If that is the best description of troops, mounted volunteer rangers—and I am disposed to concede very much to the experience and knowledge of the two worthy Representatives from Texas—why, then, give them that description of troops. But if the troops belonging to the regular Army now stationed on the Texan frontier, are doing no service at all, then if you raise five hundred mounted men for the purpose of frontier defense, disband an equal number of regular troops. I have no desire to kill this bill by indirection, or through a covert assault. It has been intimated to me since I indicated the motion that I proposed to make, that it might have the appearance of hostility to the bill, to send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

With a view of showing to the friends of the bill that I desire in good faith, that their frontier shall be efficiently protected, and in their own way, but at the same time without such an enormous tax on the Treasury of the United States, I will change the motion that I originally proposed to make, and move that the bill and Senate amendment—including my own, if in order—be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee will be enabled to report back the bill in a few days—perhaps in a week or ten days.

Mr. HOWARD. When will that committee be called for reports, at the rate we are going on now?

Mr. ORR. I have no doubt the committee will be called in due season; but if not, and if the case so urgently requires the action of Congress as the gentleman represents; two thirds of the members can be found upon any Monday to suspend the rules to enable that committee to submit their report. I do not at all desire to kill off the bill, but I am utterly opposed to having the regular Army increased eleven hundred men by this ingenious device; and that is the practical effect if the bill should pass without some such amendment as I have indicated. I am utterly opposed to any such policy as that. If our infantry regiments cannot subserve the purposes for which they are in the employ of the Government, convert them into cavalry troops; and if they are then still incompetent or inefficient on account of the personal incapacity of the soldiers for this arduous service, disband them and take those who can serve the Government efficiently. Now, I think the gentlemen from Texas are asking a good deal of this House in requesting them to pass at once, without consideration, reference to a committee, or printing, a bill occupying so many pages as this does—a bill which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLEY] tells us will involve an expenditure of $1,000,000 annually, and a permanent increase of the regular Army of more than one thousand. To ask the House to take such a bill upon trust, or on the recommendation of the Senate, without referring it to any committee, is really asking a good deal. It strikes me that the request is not at all signalized by its modesty. I am therefore in favor of sending the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. Let them devise some plan to obviate the objections which have been made here, and then report the bill back to the House. If they are not called for reports, we can suspend the rules, and the bill can be reached in that way; and if eleven hundred additional troops are to be raised for service on the western frontier, let us have a provision in the bill to reduce the existing force by disbanding an equal number. I now move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that the bill and amendments be printed; and if the House concur in the views which I have presented, they will sustain the previous question which I now demand.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there any amendment pending?

The SPEAKER. There is no amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senate pending.

Mr. JONES. I have one that I wish to get in, and I think it will certainly meet the approbation of the friends of the bill. I should like my amendment to go to the Committee on Military Affairs, for perhaps it is not drawn with as much care as it should be.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw the call for the previous question?

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from Tennessee desires to make a remark or two, and I will therefore withdraw the call for the previous question if I do not lose my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

The amendment of Mr. JONES was then read, as follows:

Provided, That the horses and horse equipages furnished by the troops mustered into service under this act, shall, at the time of being mustered into service, be valued in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and each man mustered into service as herein provided, shall receive payment from the United States for their horses and horse equipages respectively.

The SPEAKER. That amendment is not in order to the first amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My experience in these matters is, that nearly all the horses that are mustered into service, belonging to the volunteers, have, sooner or later, been paid for by the Government; and it would be better, in my opinion, that the value of the horses at the time they are mustered into service, should be paid by the Government; and then, in case the horses are lost in the service, you will save the volunteer the trouble and expense of coming here for his relief, and will save us the trouble of making out his claims and having them audited at the Department.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman desire that the Government should pay for the horses in advance, and then pay the soldiers double wages also?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. I want the whole subject to go to the Military Committee; but I wish to have that committee provide that the horses shall be paid for at the time they are mustered into service, and then that the troops shall be paid as dragoons, mounted upon Government horses.

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. If I understand it, this bill contemplates bringing these troops into service for a very limited time.

Mr. JONES. For twelve months.

Mr. DUNCAN. And they are not to be kept in service for that time even unless wanted. They may be dismissed within thirty days, if their services are not necessary. Now, if the Government is to buy horses for them all, when they are mustered into service, what is to become of the horses after the troops are dismissed?

Mr. JONES. They will not be dismissed until their time is out, and by that time there will be but few horses left.

Mr. MEADE. If I read the bill correctly, these soldiers are to provide their own horses, for which they are to be paid an additional sum—some ten or twelve dollars a month above the ordinary wages, I think. This was intended not only to pay for the hire of the horses, but to pay also for the risk they run of losing them. That being the case, I should much prefer, rather than buy the horses, which will be valued at a very high price, to give these ten or twelve dollars per month, and let the soldiers run their own risks as to loss of horses.

Mr. JONES. I understand all that. We always give forty cents per day for this risk. But it is usually the case, that after we have paid the forty cents per day for the risk, we pay for the horses too. That is what it comes to at last.

Mr. HOWARD. They have no legal claim for the horses; and if you adopt the amendment which the gentleman proposes, you cannot tie the hands of Congress, so that they cannot pay for the horses afterwards.

Mr. JONES. Well, I hope the bill will be referred to the Military Committee, and that they will take the whole subject under consideration, and make the bill conform to that provision for buying the horses, and then giving the troops the same pay as dragoons mounted upon the Government horses; for you will at least save the forty cents per day while they are in the service. I call for the previous question.

Mr. SCURRY. I hope the gentleman will permit me to call his attention to this provision of the bill. It expressly provides that the troops shall receive no compensation whatever for the loss of horses.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. But that is not a finality. That may be repealed. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to make one suggestion before the gentleman moves the previous question. I wish to provide that the committee may report at any time, because we shall never get the bill back unless that provision is made.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KING, of New York. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order if objected to.

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. JONES. I now again demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to be committed to the Committee on Military Affairs—ayes 75, noes not counted.

TOWN OF BELLEVIEW.

Mr. CLARK. I should now be pleased if I can get the consent of the House to call up Senate bill No. 316; the object of which is to relinquish to the town of Belleview, in the State of Iowa, a certain narrow strip of land bordering upon the Mississippi river, and have it passed. It is a bill entirely local in its character, and one to which there can be no objection. I hope the House will allow it to come up. I ask that it may be read, and I have no doubt it will pass.

Mr. DUNCAN. I object.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw that motion for a moment, in order to allow me to introduce a resolution in relation to the publication of the obituary notices which were ordered to be printed a few days ago. My resolution provides that they shall be bound. I hope there will be no objection. It will take but a moment.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I decline to withdraw the motion.

The question was then put, and the motion agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 282, making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday an amendment was pending, offered by the gentleman from Alabama, making appropriations for the improvement of the Tennessee river. To that amendment the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] offered an amendment making an appropriation for the improvement of the Pascagoula river. The question now pending is therefore the amendment to the amendment; upon which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN], because I think it will have the effect to render the bill more acceptable to the House. It occurs to me that the bill as it stands is so wholly objectionable in all its features, that it cannot receive the votes of a majority of this House; but if you adopt this amendment, it will serve to render the whole bill more palatable to some gentlemen. Now, sir, the bill that passed this House at the last session of Congress was one highly objectionable to me. But, notwithstanding the fact that that bill appropriated twice the amount which this bill proposes to appropriate, according to my recollection, it bore upon its face something approximating to even-handed justice. But, Mr. Chairman, when you examine this bill, what do you see? Why, sir, you find, in the first place, that the committee that reported this bill, headed as it is by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR], has taken especial pains to provide well for that little, unimportant State, New York. [Laughter.] You find, when you come to look into this bill, New York introduced in a good many different places.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. Dog-days have already commenced, and I feel it my duty to insist that this discussion shall be confined within legitimate limits. The amendment under consideration is an appropriation for the improvement of the Pascagoula river, in the State of Mississippi. The point of order which I make is, that the gentleman must confine his remarks to showing why the appropriation should not be made for the improvement of that river. We shall not get through the discussion on this bill in three weeks, if we go on in this manner. I raise the point of order, that the gentleman from Virginia is not discussing the amendment before the House; and I intend to appeal to the committee to sustain me, so as to see whether we are disposed to go on with the public business or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the gentleman in opposing this particular amendment, will have the right to show why other portions of the country provided for in the bill, are not deserving of the same appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg to suggest that this one appropriation is now under discussion. When the items relating to Ohio or New York come up, the gentleman can then oppose them if he chooses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is well aware that, according to a strict construction of the rules, the gentleman from Virginia is not in order. He would gladly enforce the rule if he supposed the committee would sustain him, but he is unwilling to enforce them, strictly upon one member of the committee, and not upon all.

Mr. BOCOCK. I would state in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS], that the remarks of my colleague [Mr. McMULLIN] were strictly in order, and upon this ground. My colleague was contending that the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] would tend to make this bill more acceptable, and thereby increase the chances of its passing; but this bill ought not to pass, and therefore he contended that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi should not be adopted, because it would increase the chances of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman does not understand my point of order. I wish to restate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that this point of order is not debatable.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it not in order for me to restate my point?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already sustained the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, and decides that the gentleman from Virginia is out of order. The Chair now states to the committee, that in future he shall strictly enforce the rule in this respect. The gentleman from Virginia will proceed in order.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman over the way [Mr. BROOKS] has given conclusive evidence that the position I took was right. His conduct shows conclusively that there was something in the point I was making upon the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. SEYMOUR.] Now, I ask that committee to tell this committee and the country, upon what principle it is that they have put in some twelve or fourteen appropriations, in different items, to the State of New York, amounting in all to $250,000, or thereabouts. Now, sir, if you pass this amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, you add, probably, his vote to the bill, and perhaps the votes of others. I consider the bill to be unjust in itself, and desire to see it defeated if possible.

The course pursued by this committee has been so perfectly disinterested that it reminds me of an anecdote I once heard. There was an old lady who, being very self-righteous in her prayers to high Heaven, asked God to be merciful to all the world, and more particularly to herself. This committee, in dealing out the favors of this Government, are anxious to do justice to all the States, and more particularly to the State of New York. I expect to offer an amendment or two in favor of the Old Dominion.

Now, sir, I ask this House to pause before they adopt either the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, or any other amendment to this bill. This bill, in my judgment, ought to be rejected. You have here a House, composed in the main of Democrats. Now, sir, I ask this House, and I ask the committee, if they can in justice to themselves go forward and vote for a bill which is so partial in its operations? The last river and harbor bill of the last Congress appropriated $50,000 to Virginia, but the Virginia vote was cast against that bill, and, sir, it is likely to be cast against this bill also. I do not mean to charge upon the committee that they designedly overlooked Virginia.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. Is it in order now to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is already an amendment pending to the amendment, and it would not be in order.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. BROWN.

Mr. BROWN demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. GENTRY. Is that amendment open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. GENTRY. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama proposed to appropriate how much?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five thousand dollars below, and $50,000 above the Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee river.

Mr. GENTRY. I move to change the sums proposed to be appropriated to $10,000 in each case.

An estimate has been made by the Engineer Department, Mr. Chairman, of the sums needed to improve the navigation of the Tennessee river. I think it would be inexpedient for this committee to amend the bill, by adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB], and inconsistent with the estimates from the proper Department. Those estimates contemplated an appropriation of upwards of $100,000 above the Muscle Shoals. The river is navigable below the shoals. A railroad runs around the shoals, and the estimates confine the improvements below the shoals. There are a few obstructions to be removed, and which being removed, will make that stream one of the best in America. The Engineer Department has estimated for the removal of those obstructions to the navigation of that river above the shoals. If it is the pleasure of this committee, and of this House, to make an appropriation for that river at all, I think the appropriation ought to be made in conformity with the estimates of the Department. Extensive systems of railroad improvements have been made south of the Tennessee river, connecting with the Chattanooga; and extensive systems are being completed, connecting the Northwest with this stream. There is no point in America, in my opinion, where it is so important to remove obstructions from navigation as that of the Tennessee river. If you intend to have a system of improvements, it ought to be a system all-embracing in its character. Why exclude this important tributary to the Mississippi when all others are embraced? Repeated estimates and reports have been made by scientific engineers, showing that it contributes a larger volume of water than the Ohio itself, to the Mississippi river. Any gentleman who looks at the system of improvements already completed south to the Chattanooga, and those in progress of completion north of that point, will see in a moment that there is no stream in America where so much good will be accomplished by small appropriations for the removal of a few obstructions and rocks, easy of being removed, and which being removed, make it at once one of the most navigable streams, and one which conduces to the welfare of a larger extent of country than any other stream, except the Mississippi river itself, embraced in the provisions of this bill.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] will not be adopted, and that the proposition which will be presented by my colleague, who represents the Knoxville district, [Mr. CHURCHWELL], founded upon estimates coming from the proper Department—the Engineer Department—will, at some stage of the proceedings, be adopted.

I will never vote for any bill that fails to embrace that stream, and I hope no man from the region of country I represent will sustain a bill that excludes a provision for that stream.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish to inquire in regard to those estimates, whether they were made by any officer upon the ground, and upon an examination of the obstructions to which he refers.

Mr. GENTRY. There have been repeated surveys and estimates made at various periods. The Chief of the Corps of Topographical Engineers was directed by the Secretary of War to examine those previous estimates, and to make out a new estimate therefrom, which is just as well as if a new survey had been made. There is no difficulty upon the subject at all.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Then the estimate was made from the old estimates?

Mr. GENTRY. The nature of the stream has not changed, and they are as good as if they were made yesterday. They were made by scientific men, and have been repeatedly made, and the reason why that stream has not heretofore been embraced in such bill is, that those representing that section of country have had constitutional objections in regard to the power of Government to make appropriations for such objects, and instead of struggling to obtain appropriations for this stream, they have discouraged every effort to make appropriations for it.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman's amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. GENTRY. Then I withdraw it. [Laughter.]

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. FREEMAN. I move to amend the amendment, by inserting $30,000 for the removal of the bar at the mouth of the Yazoo river. It is very clear that this bill is a partial one upon its face. While appropriations are made for streams which pass through the interior of almost every State in this Union, not one single dollar is appropriated to rivers or harbors in the State of Mississippi, nor on its gulf or river coast. The chairman of the committee [Mr. SEYMOUR] admitted the other evening, that two bays, the Little Sodus and the Great Sodus, entirely within the jurisdiction of the State of New York, had large appropriations to them in this bill, and that the State of New York had the right to improve them, thereby excluding the Federal Government. On the second page of this bill is another appropriation of $50,000 to the Hudson river, at Albany. This place is also entirely within the jurisdiction of the State of New York; and such is the case with regard to most of the items of this bill; yet not a dollar is appropriated to the rivers of Mississippi, emptying either into the Gulf of Mexico, or into the Mississippi itself. Just at this moment, an amendment of my colleague [Mr. BROWN] for an appropriation to clear out the mouth of the Pascagoula river, which empties into the Gulf of Mexico, has been voted down without ceremony. We have the Tombigbee river, running through the States of Alabama and Mississippi, long enough, according to the definition of certain gentlemen here, to be called a national stream, also the Pascagoula and the Chickasaw; yet not a dollar is given either. We have the Pearl river, passing from the Gulf of Mexico to Jackson, the capital of the State of Mississippi, and thence to the interior, which is navigable for six months in the year for large steamers, and not a single dollar is appropriated to that. Here, also, is the Yazoo river, for which I offer an amendment, and to which not a single dollar has been appropriated. Yazoo City, a large and thriving commercial town upon this river, has more commerce than nine tenths of the rivers and harbors included in this bill.

Why, sir, the second appropriation in this bill, instead of being an appropriation to improve rivers and harbors, as professed in its title, proposes to construct a harbor upon the east side of Reedy Island, in the Delaware; and there are several appropriations for the same purpose.

Instead, therefore, of making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and natural harbors, this committee have recommended appropriations to build harbors, where nature never intended they should be.

Mr. WALSH. I would say to the gentleman that that is one of the harbors in the Delaware river, which the Government is under a solemn contract to keep in repair.

Mr. FREEMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. The appropriation is to build the harbor, and not to repair or improve it. The gentleman will have to amend the bill, if it is an old harbor.

I want $30,000 to be appropriated for the improvement of the mouth of the Yazoo river, emptying into the Mississippi river, which latter is admitted, upon all hands, to be a stream entitled to improvement. The Mississippi river is a great national highway, a stream not within the jurisdiction of any single State, but the common boundary of nine States, and over which no single State has exclusive jurisdiction, and therefore as strictly within the power of Congress to improve as the Atlantic coast. The Yazoo river runs from the interior of Mississippi, through one of the most fertile cotton regions in the world. It bears away the cotton, and brings, in return, the annual supplies for the planters. At the mouth of this river, in the bed of the Mississippi river, is a bar, of equally as much importance and magnitude as the bar in the Hudson river at Albany. Why not cut it away? The bar at Albany, as I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. SEYMOUR], requires $300,000 to improve it, and they have been improving that bar ever since I can remember. They have actually expended $375,000 upon it, and yet the bar is just as bad as when they commenced appropriating for its improvement. It feeds with a growing appetite; the bar gets larger as the public treasure is lavished upon it, and, at the same rate of improvement, by the time the whole estimate of $300,000 is expended upon the work, the river will be wholly impassable.

Mr. FULLER. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. FREEMAN]. Gentlemen oppose this bill because it does not contain appropriations for every harbor and every river in the Union, which is susceptible of being improved, and which may be done constitutionally. Unless, therefore, you get up a bill large enough to do the whole at once, shall we do nothing? You can do a portion this year, and a portion another year. I do not suppose any gentleman expected the committee to report a bill large enough to do the whole at once.

Mr. FREEMAN, (interrupting.) The gentleman is a lawyer, and a good lawyer, too. Now, I ask him what he thinks of that provision of the Constitution which provides that no preference shall be given to the port of one State over that of another? We have some ports in Mississippi; but you have given preference to the ports of other States to the exclusion of those of Mississippi.

Mr. FULLER. I will respond to the gentleman that his State is not precluded from having an appropriation some other year. To provide during one year the appropriations for all the States would swell the bill too large.

Mr. FREEMAN. What year are we to come in, I should like to know? I fear it will be after the day of judgment.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. BROWN] said that the State of Mississippi was the only State upon the Atlantic sea-board that was not provided for in this bill. In that the gentleman is mistaken. He then went on to assume the reason why the State of Mississippi was omitted by the committee. He assumed that the omission was owing to her peculiar political opinions. Now, New Hampshire, which is a jewel in the galaxy of States, I presume all will concede, with a sea-board of fifty miles, and a very fine port, has not had a dollar appropriated to her. The gentleman is therefore mistaken in that fact. He was quite as much mistaken in the inference which he drew. The committee did not omit to give an appropriation to the State of Mississippi for the reason he assigns.

Now, sir, as has been remarked heretofore, the committee went around the frontier of the country, endeavoring to deal out equal and exact justice to all portions of it. There is not gold enough in the mines of California to improve all your harbors. Are gentlemen going to take the ground that because their particular river is not appropriated for, they are going to oppose the bill? The result of that argument would be, if it have any force at all, opposition against any bill. The gentleman, as his State borders upon the Mississippi, ought to be satisfied with her share that has been appropriated for that river. These are all the remarks I desire to make.

The question was then taken on Mr. FREEMAN'S amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. YATES offered the following amendment: For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois and Cumberland rivers, $100,000; $50,000 of said amount to be expended on each of said rivers.

Mr. Chairman, I must confess, that I am very much surprised at the report of this committee. How it happens that a committee, aiming to frame a system of improvements and to do equal justice to all parts of the country, to provide for the protection of life and property on the sea-coast, on the inland lakes, and the important navigable rivers of the country—how it happens, that that committee should overlook and omit the Illinois river, I do confess I am at a loss to imagine. This, sir, is an unpardonable oversight.

I am not disposed to find fault with this committee. I must say I like the men who compose it well, and I must exonerate them from any deliberate design to do injustice to any portion of the country, or any desire to claim for their several localities larger appropriations than they would award to the West or any other section. But, sir, the fault is here: there is no representative of western interests on that committee, favorable to the construction of internal improvements. It is unfortunate for the country and unfortunate for the symmetry of this bill, that several members from the West had not been appointed on that committee to present the wants of the ten millions of people of the valley of the Mississippi. I have discovered the fact, to my great regret, that many eastern men, have but faint conception of the extent of western interests, of western wants and western progress; and while honestly disposed to do us justice, yet for the want of this knowledge, they fall far short of it. And; while they deal out to the West with a sparing, reluctant and parsimonious hand, they seem astonished that our hearts do not overflow with gratitude for what they consider the most unbounded liberality. You speak to them of improving the Illinois river, and their replies are absolutely provoking. "Oh!" say they, "if you make appropriations for the improvement of the Illinois river, then you must make appropriations for every other river." These same gentlemen have appropriated by this bill, $50,000 for the Hudson river. Now, I wish to inform you, sir, and this committee, and I speak emphatically, and from personal knowledge, that the Illinois is as large and fine a navigable stream as your far-famed Hudson. While, sir, it is navigable at most seasons of the year for boats of the largest size, from its mouth to LaSalle, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, your Hudson is navigable for only one hundred and fifty miles. If you will look at your geographies you will find this out.

I had the pleasure, a short time since, of traveling upon the Hudson, and it was a pleasure. I saw a picture of life and animation there which delighted me. I saw the waters there moved by every sort of craft. Steamer after steamer, and sail after sail floated in the beautiful prospective, while along its banks the iron horse dashed by us at the speed of forty miles an hour. Mansions of elegance and splendor, and a numerous succession of beautiful cities and villages passed in review before us. But, sir, while I admired the Hudson and its beautiful scenery, and viewed the evidence of wealth and prosperity upon its banks, yet I found that, for the purposes of navigation, it was not a better stream than the Illinois. And yet, sir, for that river there is in this bill an appropriation of $50,000, although it is within the limits of a single State, and although a railroad runs on its banks parallel with it from its mouth to the highest point to which it is navigable. Is this equal and impartial legislation? Is it fair to lavish the public treasure in appropriations to a State powerful in resources, commanding the commerce of the ocean, and abounding in capital and wealth, for the improvement of her rivers, while a single dollar is denied to a young and needy State, for her rivers, equally national, and deserving of improvement?

If the Illinois river is not a national stream, then there is none. The doctrine that a river, to be a national one, must flow between two or more States, and not be comprehended within the limits of a single State, is becoming obsolete, and is yielding to the more intelligible and sensible construction that if it is needed and used for the transportation and travel of many States, then it is national, whether it is contained within a single State or washes the shores of a dozen. The Hudson is a national thoroughfare upon this very principle. Its source and its mouth are in the State of New York, but its head-waters are connected with other States and with the lakes by railroads, so that it floats the commerce and travel of many of the States of this Union. The Illinois stands upon the same ground. Its head-waters are connected with the lakes by the Illinois and Michigan canal; and railroads from its head-waters to the lakes, and to the Upper Mississippi, are already projected, and several are, at this time, in the process of construction.

I say, sir, if the Illinois river is not a national work, then the Mississippi is not. It is, in a strong sense, a direct extension of that river to Lake Michigan. It connects the great lakes with the Father of Waters. It connects New York with New Orleans. Nearly all that trade which finds its way over the lakes, and on that long line of railroads which sweep around the lakes on its way to the West, seek its natural and almost only channel down that stream. And this is no secret. I am speaking what is known to the country, although it may have escaped the attention of the committee. The rapid increase of the commerce upon this stream, its statistics, and the immense amount of business, travel, and transportation upon it have been the constant subject of newspaper correspondence and comment in every part of the country, and occupies no unimportant part in the printed reports and communications of executive officers to the two branches of Congress. It is one of the most important of all our western waters. There is not a traveler from the East to St. Louis, or to any part of the interior of the West, whether he travel down the Ohio and up the Mississippi, or by the northern lake route, who does not take this river in his route, either going or returning.

In a speech which I made in April last before this House, I exhibited some statistical facts showing the importance of this stream. I then showed, what seemed to surprise some members of the House, that the trade and transportation upon this river was greater than that upon either the Missouri or Upper Mississippi. I showed that the number of arrivals at the city of St. Louis of steamboats from the Illinois was greater than from the Upper or Lower Mississippi, the Missouri, or the Ohio; and that of the staple articles of wheat, corn, &c., the amount transported on this river in the direction of New Orleans and by the northern lakes, was considerably greater. I mention this, not to disparage the Missouri and Upper Mississippi, for the amounts appropriated to them by this bill are too small, and they are each deserving of larger appropriations than the Illinois river, because they are longer, their obstructions are greater, and their navigation far more perilous and difficult.

But, sir, we are not without the highest sanctions in favor of the nationality of this stream. The Government of the United States, acting upon the proper assumption, after the usual surveys, that this connection between the lakes and the Mississippi was a great national thoroughfare, made a handsome grant of lands to the State of Illinois for the construction of that magnificent work, the Illinois and Michigan canal. It also caused a survey and plans and estimates, of the Illinois river to be made, and on the 6th March, 1838, Mr. Poinsett, then Secretary of War, communicated to the Senate, in obedience to a resolution calling for the same, the report of the Topographical Bureau of Engineers, showing, at length, the national character of the stream, its capacity, obstructions, and plans for its improvement. I shall call the attention of the committee to a few extracts from that report:

"In an agricultural, commercial, as well as a military point of view, the Illinois river is destined to occupy an important rank amongst the rivers of the West. Embracing in its arms its principal tributaries, the southern shores of Lake Michigan, it traverses more than two thirds of the State of Illinois from north to south, and waters, by its branches, more than half its width, an extent of country unrivaled for the fertility of its soil, perhaps, in the world."

"By means of the Illinois and Michigan canal (less than one hundred miles in length) its waters will be united with those of Lake Michigan, thus completing the connection of the internal navigation of the country from New York to New Orleans."

"In a military point of view, the uninterrupted navigation of this river cannot be overlooked, as it will afford facilities for the transportation of troops and munitions of war with certainty and celerity, and will enable the Government, should it at any time become necessary, to concentrate upon the frontier, with rapidity and ease, any amount of force, while, at the same time, the capacity of the valley of the stream to furnish supplies for their use is unbounded."

Upon the subject of the capacity of the stream, the report says:

"When compared with other streams in the West, the Illinois, even in its present unimproved State, is superior to most of them in the depth of its waters. The improvement of the Tennessee contemplates, at the utmost, the attainment of a depth of only twenty-four inches, and that of the Ohio, between Pittsburg and Wheeling, a depth of thirty inches; whilst the Illinois in its natural state has at no time (with the exception of two or three bars) a less depth than two feet, and that only in extremely dry seasons, and for a short period in midsummer."

As to the obstructions, the report remarks:

"The Illinois river, from Peru to its mouth, flows over a bottom of sand and alluvial matter with a current so very gentle and uniform as to cause but a few hours' difference in the time occupied by steamboats in ascending or descending its stream, an estimated distance of two hundred and fifty miles." "The obstructions consist entirely of bars, formed for the most part by the deposit of sand and alluvial matter brought down by the tributary streams, and in some cases by the widening of the bed of the river itself." "A few logs and snags are here and there to be found, but the obstruction from this cause is much less than in other fresh-water streams. No danger is apprehended from them, as they retain their positions from year to year, and being few in number, and their localities perfectly known, they are easily avoided."

The report, after referring to several plans for removing these obstructions, adopts the following, which, in my opinion, is the best:

"The only plan which is likely to prove of any advantage is the second one proposed, viz: To excavate channels through the bars, and that only to a limited extent. This mode is believed to be peculiarly adapted to this river, as the deposits form very slowly, in consequence of the alluvial matter brought down by the current being unusually small."

"The plan recommended is, to purchase a dredging machine, to be constantly employed during the summer months, first in excavating channels through the bars, and afterwards in keeping open the passages thus formed. It is believed that a depth of three feet would amply accommodate any probable amount of transportation upon the river; and from the fact that two feet water is already found (save on one or two bars) an excavation of one foot in depth, and in many cases of six inches only, would effect this object."

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a navigable river; one of the greatest of our national thoroughfares, and it is believed that an appropriation of $50,000 will render it permanently navigable for years to come, at all seasons of the year. Now, sir, for two or three months in the year its navigation is obstructed, except for boats of the very smallest size, which work their way over these bars with great difficulty and after long detentions. At this very time, from the mouth of the river to its source, steamers and canal boats in great numbers are aground, unable to proceed on their journeys. Now, you will observe that no Representative from the West has proposed to reduce the appropriations for the benefit of the East. We do not complain of them. They are necessary and proper. We only propose to increase in a proper ratio the number and amount of the appropriations for necessary objects in the West. It is but poor encouragement to western members to vote millions for the benefit of the East and for the protection of foreign commerce, while, for the want of small appropriations, we are compelled to see millions of dollars' worth of western agricultural production obstructed in their way to market. I do confess, sir, I shall be very loth to support this or any bill which makes such distinctions against the West.

I hope to see the bill properly amended; and when it is so amended, I shall support it most cheerfully. And I shall support it for reasons very different from those which influenced gentlemen on the other side of this House, whose platform says they are opposed to a general system of internal improvements. I shall support it because it is a general system of internal improvements. We cannot do without a general system, and at the same time do justice to all parts of the country. What is a general system? I call that a general system which appropriates for the Atlantic coast, and for the lakes and rivers in every section, according to their absolute necessity, and having a due regard to economy. Look at your broad extent of territory, your extended coast, your great lakes, and your Mississippi and its tributaries, all requiring the fostering hand and support of the Government. Two millions of dollars, properly expended, would be no great burden on the Treasury; it would revive your commerce; it would start the West upon a new tide of prosperity; it would stimulate the enterprise and industry of the whole country, and the Government would have accomplished one of the objects of its creation, the promotion of the good of the people. Our commerce has floated over snags long enough; our citizens have found watery graves in our western rivers long enough, in carrying out your narrow platforms, your straight-jacketed constructions, and your salt-water abstractions. We are called upon by every consideration—the saving of hundred of lives and millions of property annually destroyed, cheapness and expedition in getting to market, exemption from heavy insurances, and by every consideration of the general welfare, to pass at this session a river and harbor bill, liberal in its provisions to every section of our common country.

Mr. NABERS. I am opposed to the amendment. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that the progress of the debate upon the general merits of this bill, so far, ought to convince every candid member of this committee that the system contemplated is improper. But why? Simply because it seems we can never determine what is a national work, or what is a local one. There is the difficulty. Every gentleman appears to argue that his particular river, or his particular harbor is a national river or harbor; but not so with the rest.

Again, sir, gentlemen are advocating this bill upon the Democratic side of the House. And I will take occasion to say that I have no purpose of delivering a lecture here. They tell us that while they are in favor of this bill, they are at the same time opposed to a general system of improvements. Now, I wish some of them to tell me if this be not a system, what is a system? If this bill be not a system of improvements, what is it?

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. The proposition under consideration is to make an appropriation for the Illinois and Cumberland rivers, which it is the duty of the gentleman from Mississippi to oppose, whereas he is discussing the question of internal improvements.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the remarks of the gentleman in order as opposing any appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS. But it is his duty to oppose this particular one.

The CHAIRMAN. Opposing all appropriations is opposing this specific one.

Mr. BROOKS. We have had discussion of the general principle before, and it is utterly impossible to get through with the bill in this way.

Mr. NABERS. I am very much obliged to the chairman and committee. As I made no allusion to New York, I had supposed the gentleman would not have raised his point of order. I have no hostility to New York, or to any other State; but I was trying to ascertain, if I could, if this bill does not propose a system of internal improvements. What am I to understand by a system? Perhaps I cannot illustrate my meaning better than by an anecdote. Mark you, I tell it not for amusement, but for the purpose of making the committee understand my exact meaning, and of adding to the standard literature of the day. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen think that while they favor this bill they are against a general system of improvements. Well, sir, a colored gentleman in my region of country became intoxicated on very bad whisky. The next morning he swore that he would never drink another dram. The next opportunity that offered, he answered: "I have said that I never would take another dram, but stop—I believe I will take two or three swallows!" [Laughter.] Now, I submit to this committee, whether, if this bill does not propose a general system of internal improvements, it does not take two or three swallows in that direction? [Renewed laughter.] It is absurd to talk in that way. Again, if gentlemen are opposed to a general system of improvements, should not the very same process of reasoning which induces them to oppose a general system induce them to oppose a partial one? I ask with what consistency gentlemen can oppose a general, impartial, equitable system of internal improvements, and yet go for one that is partial in every feature?

Gentlemen have been exceedingly guarded in getting up this bill. They have informed us that they have guarded against any infringement of the Constitution of the United States. We would be led to infer from the general tenor of their observations upon this bill, that they have fixed the Constitution precisely in the midst of the heavens, and that they fear if it were let go to one side or the other, the universe might be upset. But, sir, I ask any candid man to tell me why, if it be thus fixed in the center, its rays fall partially? Why does it not shine equally upon every portion of the Confederacy? It does not do so. While its light concentrates with almost killing force in some particular localities, in others all is dark as midnight.

The question was then taken upon Mr. YATES's amendment, (Messrs. CHANDLER and MOLONY acting as tellers,) and there were—ayes 63, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I offer the following amendment:

For a survey of the Alleghany river from Pittsburg to Olean Point, with a view for further improvements, $30,000.

The Alleghany river takes its rise in the State of New York, runs into Pennsylvania, flows back again into the State of New York, and at last finds its way into the Ohio. It is the Ohio at Pittsburg, and therefore, if it does not wash three States, it washes two States three times, and, of course, comes within the constitutional rule South. [Laughter.] An appropriation for this river, I consider, then, as germane to this bill. The committee will see, if they will listen to what I say, that the appropriation I ask has as much merit as any one provided for in the bill. A canal runs from Rochester, in the interior of the State of New York to Olean Point, connecting with the river at that place. From Olean to the point where the Allegheny meets the Monongahela—and the two form the Ohio—the distance is about two hundred and twenty miles. All I desire is, that a survey for improvements should be made. A steamboat ascended this river three miles above Olean Point more than eighteen years ago. About six months in a year steamboats ply regularly for the distance of one hundred and thirty miles upon that river, and for three months in a year a distance of about two hundred miles; and it would be capable of plying the whole year between Pittsburgh and Olean in case the proper improvements were made. All we ask for at this time is a survey, in order to see what improvements can be made.

I will state that, about twelve or fifteen years ago, a survey was ordered by this Government, with the view of improving this river. A survey was made with great care, and at reasonable expense, of course, and a favorable report was made to Congress in regard to this improvement, but nothing was done. The report and the survey have been lost or mislaid, and now we can get no trace of them at all. It is for this reason that we ask for this appropriation of $20,000 to have a re-survey, with the view of improving it hereafter, if in the wisdom of this Government it should be thought proper to do so. I am for a general system of internal improvements, and I am a Democrat in that respect. [Laughter.] I am for a general system of internal improvements of all rivers, with which I stand immediately connected, [laughter:] which is the case with most members. I think that no one will dispute this. New York and Ohio are interested, as well as Pennsylvania, in this improvement, and so are the whole United States, because this river is the great connecting link between the waters of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, and it would be the most direct route, if it was improved, by which you could go from New York to New Orleans at any season of the year. It may be improved so that at all seasons it would be navigable for steamboats of some two hundred or three hundred tons burden. It is so in its natural state, except in a dry time, when the bottom of the river rises too near the surface of the water. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman really believes that this is a work which is general and national, according to the Whig resolutions?

Mr. HOWE. I am confident that it is according to both platforms. I should say according to the letter of one, and the construction put upon the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I hope that we may soon get to a vote upon this bill; and I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Howe,] that I shall speak against this appropriation. It is probable, within a few months, at the next session of Congress, that we shall pass another bill for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and before it be possible for us to expend, in a proper manner, the moneys appropriated by this bill. I contemplate that we shall have another bill to supply the deficiency. We have had, in my district, but one appropriation in fourteen years, and that was merely for repairs. In diffusing among the people of our country the benefits of commerce, we have been niggardly in making appropriations from the public Treasury, while we have squandered $200,000,000 to keep our Army and Navy, for no other purpose than to kill, destroy, and butcher mankind. We have, in times past, and are now standing here and contending against giving to the people the prosperity which this bill would carry to them. I am not a little astonished at the tenacity with which every attempt to appropriate moneys for the benefit of the United States is opposed, while every attempt to squander the funds in any other direction is met promptly, and our treasure is poured out profusely. Let me say here that the estimates in my district have been cut down more than in any other part of the Union; but I ask for no additional appropriation, unless it be to repair, in one instance, these works. I am anxious to see a wise and liberal system of internal improvements commenced, established, and put in successful operation. Now, let us begin, and let us adhere to the committee; for they have given this subject great consideration. They have, in my opinion, acted according to their best judgment, although I wish they had appropriated double the amount to these objects that they have appropriated.

The question was then taken on Mr. Howe's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. RICHARDSON offered the following as an amendment to the amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois and Cumberland rivers, $50,000; $45,000 of said amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended upon each of said rivers.

Mr. Chairman, there is not in my road the constitutional difficulty that lies in the way of some gentlemen who have expressed their opinions before this committee, in regard to the powers of this Government. I hold that we have the constitutional power to make a road, to use and improve one already made, to make a canal or improve one already made, to improve the navigation of a river wherever it is necessary to transport mails, troops, munitions of war, or the supplies of provisions for those troops. In other words, we can do any of these things where it is for the use of Government; and it is clearly constitutional, in my judgment. It is wholly immaterial whether that river runs through two, three, or a dozen States, or is wholly within a single State.

The amendment I propose most clearly comes within the class of cases I have laid down. I propose to give $45,000 to improve the Illinois river. That stream is one of the links in the chain of communication between the Atlantic sea-board and the valley of the Mississippi. The arms that are used on our western frontier have of necessity to be carried upon it. A large portion of the provision for the troops is carried there. The mails are or should be transported upon it. During the war with Mexico troops were carried upon it, and both in war and peace the Government interest requires the improvement of that river. In high water the entire stream for three hundred miles is one of the best for navigation. In low water there are three or four obstructions which can be removed at a small expense, and these being removed the river would at all times be the very best for navigation of any in the United States. It is most certainly true that commerce would be greatly benefited by this improvement. The products for transportation are nowhere so great as along the banks of that river. It traverses for its whole extent the richest and most fertile country that the sun shines upon, settled by an enterprising and industrious people.

Gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate have characterized this bill as sectional. Sir, it is eminently so. The bill proposes to give $50,000 to improve the Hudson river, after over $300,000 has been expended by this Government heretofore for the same object—a river that has now no obstructions, only navigable one hundred and sixty miles, with a railroad along its banks its entire length; and nothing to the Illinois, navigable over three hundred miles, with all the claims and reasons I have stated.

It is true, the bill gives something to the Mississippi river; but only enough to send agents out to make contracts, buy boats, and exhaust the sum to favorites—not enough to do anything to improve that river, or any other West. The bill is eminently Atlantic and eastern. The western rivers, upon whose bosoms float four times in value all our foreign commerce, gets by this bill less than $400,000, while the East takes, in her modesty, only a little over $1,000,000.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that I had no constitutional difficulties in supporting a fair and just bill, to carry out the objects necessary and proper to be carried out in improvements. The bill now under consideration I regard as a better one than the one presented two years ago. It is better only in a few particulars; it leaves out a few improvements east that had no claims under any circumstances to be improved; it leaves out the appropriations for the improvements of some towns that were in the bill one or two years ago. In other particulars it is very objectionable. The appropriation for the improvement of the rapids of the Mississippi is not enough by full one half. It is of no importance and no benefit to the Government or the people to appropriate enough to get ready to go to work upon the rapids; and the appropriation is just about enough to buy boats, &c., to begin the work, and not enough to do anything more. I concur with my colleague, [Mr. Bissell,] that it needs many amendments.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I am desirous of calling the attention of the committee to the opposition which I shall make to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois; but I am more anxious to call the attention of the country, and especially of the Democratic party, to it. The people of this country are a reading people, and they will see that gentlemen have already urged upon the committee millions of dollars of appropriations that should have been provided for, as they claim, in this bill, and before we get through it will be, millions upon millions.

Now, some gentlemen say that this is not a general internal improvement bill; but, sir, no man can be so willfully blind, or so blinded by political prejudices, or by a desire for victory at the coming election, as not to see that this is but the entering wedge, and that it will ultimately, if persisted in, drain the Treasury of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. There is no way to escape it. Log-rolling is a common practice in this House, and there is no way in which it is possible to guard against it, if the Democratic party incorporate this Whig policy of internal improvements by the General Government into its creed. Gentlemen, if they will go back a few years, will remember that this was the great and dividing question between the two parties of the country. James K. Polk, when in the presidential chair, with his clear head, saw the danger there was to the country from beginning such a system, and had the nerve, in imitation of "Old Hickory," to set not only his face but his pen against it. What has been the result? There is not a well-informed man in America but what knows that the action of that Democratic President has saved to this country hundreds of millions of dollars. Now, Frank Pierce is nominated by the party that sustained the course of President Polk, and he is to be reproached by some of my Democratic brethren in this House because he is opposed to this very system.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. Will the gentleman let me ask him one question?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I cannot. I have not time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will allow me to propound to him one question?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I must decline, for I desire to express my views, so far as I can, within the five minutes allotted to me. In my judgment, those gentlemen are abandoning the ground on which the Democratic party have so successfully stood for years and years, and caving in to Whiggery, for it is caving in, and everybody understands it so; and there is no use trying to disguise it. They may think that the passage of this bill will end in the coming election of President, but they will do it at the expense of the best interests of the country, and the entire destruction of the party. Such may be the result. It would be better to go back and take the advice of "Old Hickory," and James K. Polk—the men who dared to stand upon the principle that this Government is a Government of limited powers.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I observe that the gentleman from Connecticut is quoting General Jackson; I ask him whether he is willing to abide by the doctrine of Jackson?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I answer that I am. I was about to say that I am half inclined to try the experiment that the committee have proposed. I am free to say I think the committee deserve great credit for the power of resistance they have shown. They have given us a very moderate bill, and I am tempted to give the country this bill and let them try it. I forewarn the real Democracy of the country, however, that they may, and I fear will, find bitter consequences flowing even from this; but at the same time, I think the Committee on Commerce deserve credit for not reporting a bill containing appropriations to the amount of three, five, or ten millions of dollars, as will probably be done at the next session, if this bill passes. We ought to set our faces against any kind of amendments to this bill. Let one single amendment come in, and there is no security; the Treasury will be robbed to the amount of millions of dollars, at this session. The only security we can have is to have the Democratic party in power, and have them live up to their principles. Sir, we must guard against the Whigs getting their old notions into our new platform.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is in order, inasmuch as it embraces two distinct propositions, not at all connected with each other?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see that that makes any difference.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Then he might put a hundred different propositions in one amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the amendment is in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. GREY and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 57, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MEADE. I now offer, as an amendment, the section offered by my colleague [Mr. CASKIE] yesterday, changing the sum from $50,000 to $49,500, so as to read as follows:

"For the improvement of the Appomattox and James rivers, $49,500."

Mr. Chairman, I have a few facts to state to this committee which will, I think, enlighten them to some extent upon this subject. Upon this river four of the most important towns in the State of Virginia are situated. They annually contribute to the General Post Office a revenue of $40,000. The city of Richmond $23,000; Petersburg $6,000; Lynchburg $4,000; and Norfolk $7,500. They are all either situated directly upon this river, or connected with its commerce. The city of Petersburg, which I represent, is situated upon tide-water, about ten miles from the confluence of the James and Appomattox rivers, and may be called a James river city.

Now, sir, we ask an appropriation of $49,500, being about the amount reported to be necessary by your own engineer about ten years ago.

Mr. Chairman, I stated to the committee on a former occasion that the State of Virginia had been entirely overlooked in this bill. Having the finest harbors and the most extensive sea-coast of any State upon the Atlantic—in the face of all this, it has been entirely neglected. I find that there are thirteen towns in the State of New York whose aggregate post office revenue is only $52,000—only $12,000 more than that of the four towns I have named in Virginia, which have appropriations amounting to $258,000 in this bill. But in connection with this fact let me state, moreover, that these towns in the State of New York have already received from the hands of the General Government $1,122,000; the towns which I have mentioned in Virginia having all of them received in this time but $25,000; which was all given to the city of Norfolk. The city of Albany, on the Hudson river, yielding a post office revenue of $23,000, has an appropriation in this bill of $50,000, and has already received from the General Government $370,000. But I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLEVELAND,] who started out with a very good speech against internal improvements, but yet indicated a mitigated hostility to this bill, to the fact that the Committee on Commerce has, in this bill, made appropriations to every little town in New York having a creek that could be called a navigable stream. For the little harbor of Oak Orchard creek this bill contains an appropriation of $10,000, having already received from the Government $20,000, and such is the smallness of the population that it pays into the post office treasury but $76 per year. A port called Port Jefferson has an appropriation of $1,200, which pays into the post office treasury $150 per annum. The harbor at the town of Dunkirk has an appropriation in this bill of $30,000, and pays only $779 into the post office treasury, and having already received $93,000 from the General Government. The thirteen places in the State of New York which are provided for in this bill have altogether received more than a million of dollars from the General Government, and have in this bill an aggregate appropriation amounting to $258,000, while the whole revenue paid by them into the post office treasury is only $12,000 more than that paid by the four towns for which I ask this appropriation. Nothing indicates more truly the commercial importance of a place than its post office revenues.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I am happy to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE,] to allude to the appropriations for the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, and which have so often been the subject of invidious remark. I regret that the gentleman from Virginia should have taken the course he has in holding up to this committee a comparative view of the revenues of certain post offices in New York with certain others in Virginia, instead of comparing the commercial returns of the two States. Anything connected with the commerce of my State, or the importance of the Hudson river, I shall at all times be ready to meet, whenever gentlemen shall invite the discussion.

I stated in my remarks at the opening of this debate, the principle upon which this bill was framed. I instance the very case of Oak Orchard creek on Lake Ontario, to which the gentleman has alluded, as an illustration of that principle. We have made an appropriation for that place, not with reference to its local commerce—we expressly repudiated that as a criterion for appropriation—but with reference to the general commerce of the lake upon which it is situated, and for the purpose of providing for that general commerce a harbor of refuge. But in reference to this particular case, a better appropriation is not contained in this bill. The fact was brought to the notice of the Committee on Commerce, that a harbor of refuge was especially needed at that point during the storms which prevail upon the lake. We have not sought to make these appropriations for the purpose of building up towns at any particular points, but to make them where the general commerce of the country demanded. The same is true with regard to Dunkirk and Port Jefferson harbors in New York. The latter, on the northern shore of Long Island is intended as a harbor of refuge, and is the only harbor of that kind upon a coast of one hundred and forty miles in extent, covered by a large commerce.

As to the Hudson river, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] yesterday seemed to consider it a small river, of very little importance—altogether a trifling affair, compared with the western waters. Have these gentlemen considered that this is the only outlet for a trade as large as that of which they so continually boast of, upon the Mississippi and its tributaries? It is, like the mouth of the Mississippi, an outlet for that great chain of Mediterranean lakes which stretches from Lake Ontario to Lake Superior, the natural avenue for the whole trade of those lakes except the comparatively small amount which passes through the St. Lawrence. This trade comes down to the tide waters of the Hudson by the Erie canal and the several lines of railroad, and then finds its way to the great emporium of our commerce. The official returns of last year show that produce to the amount of $54,000,000 came by the canals alone to the tide waters of the Hudson, of which three-fourths at least came from the West, and a great portion from Illinois itself. The ascending trade will make nearly as much more; and when you add the other trade upon the river, coming by railroads and other ways, you will swell it up to the amount which gentlemen are claiming for the Mississippi itself. But this appropriation has been denounced as extravagantly large. It is $50,000; and it is only the fourth appropriation the Government has made for that work, which was begun in 1834. This is the smallest appropriation that ever passed this House for that work; smaller by one half than those passed during the administration of General Jackson. It is a case of the most urgent necessity; so strong that the Legislature of the State at its last session appropriated $10,000 to be employed in affording temporary relief to the navigation, until the National Government should resume this important and truly national work.

With regard to the particular case upon which the gentleman from Virginia has offered this amendment for the James river, in which the city of Richmond is principally interested, I explained to the committee the other day the situation in which the committee were placed. The committee would have recommended an appropriation to a national work in Virginia as cheerfully as in any other part of the Union. But we had no memorial, no estimates for this work. We heard nothing in relation to it until the bill came up in this House for consideration, when gentlemen get up and denounce the action of that committee for not inserting it in the bill, and claim that it should now be inserted without estimates, without surveys, and without data.

The question now being upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN W. HOWE and BARRE were appointed.

Mr. CASKIE. Is it in order for me to ask the unanimous consent of the committee to say a very few words upon the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order for the gentleman to ask the consent of the committee, though it requires unanimous consent to give permission. Several Members objected.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put, and the motion was not agreed to.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question being taken upon the amendment to the amendment, the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 59—no quorum voting.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, moved that the committee rise, which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having taken the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 283, making appropriation for certain rivers and harbors, and had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion by Mr. ASHE the House then adjourned until Monday at eleven o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 26, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate calling for information in relation to the Commission appointed to run and mark the boundary between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. WELLER. I presume it will be utterly impossible to print the whole of this document in time for the use of the Senate during the present session of Congress. It is necessarily a voluminous document. Whether it has been retained in the Department for the purpose of preventing its publication, I shall not undertake to say. Certain it is that there are some of us here who will be very unwilling to vote for appropriations for the continuance of this boundary survey until we have had an opportunity of investigating the mass of testimony now submitted to the Senate. It was for the purpose of facilitating this business that I went to the Department at the verbal request, and not in accordance with a written note, for the purpose of selecting those documents of which it was wholly unnecessary that copies should be made. I spent two or three hours, not in selecting papers to be sent to the Senate, but in selecting those which I considered it was wholly unimportant should be copied. They consisted of invoices of goods turned over from one Department to another, which were wholly useless so far as regards the determination of the question to be settled here. Well, sir, that is the document sent to the Senate after a lapse of four months. In the present condition of the public printing, I take it for granted that it will be impossible to print this document during the present session of Congress. The object of the Secretary, however, may be attained by sending the document in, if delay was desired. There is much of this document, however, which may be printed at once. It may be possible that if the document be transmitted to the Committee on Printing, they may make such a selection from it as will enable the Senate to understand the manner in which this Boundary Commission has been managed when we are called upon to make an appropriation to meet its expenditure. For that purpose, I move to refer it to the Committee on Printing, with the view of determining how much of it should be printed. I think it may be probable that much of it will be found unnecessary to be published at any time. There may be many papers which the committee may decide they will not publish. But, certainly a large portion of this document ought to be published before the Senate is called upon to make further appropriations for the continuance of the work.

Mr. CLARKE. I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from California. There are a great many of these papers which are very necessary to be seen by the Senate, before they can act upon this question. There are a great many papers, as I understand, that relate particularly to the initial point which has been partially agreed upon, if not finally decided upon by the Commissioners of the Boundary Survey. I think that all the papers which relate to the initial point should be published. I merely suggest to the Senator from California, whether it will not be better to amend his motion, so as to carry with it instructions to print everything which relates to the initial point of the surveys, which were made in the neighborhood of the Rio Grande, so that everything may be before us previous to the time when the subject will probably come up for discussion.

Mr. WELLER. As that is the practical question which the Senate will be called upon to decide, of course the Committee on Printing will decide that everything relating to that point should be published at once. On these matters which we are called to pass upon, the Committee on Printing will see the necessity of having this matter published.

Mr. CLARKE. I merely wish to say, that I do not desire to interfere with this in any degree whatever; and with the understanding that the committee will select everything relating to these points; but the difficulty is, that the Committee on Printing might not know what it would be necessary to publish.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me to interrupt him, I will make a suggestion which I think will obviate all difficulty. I would suggest that the matter should be referred to a select committee consisting of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] my colleague, [Mr. WELLER,] and the Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK.] I think by adopting such a course, every necessary document could be selected.

Mr. CLARKE. I very much doubt whether such a suggestion would be of any use. The Senator from California will have much other business to attend to. I have little time myself, and the Senator from Texas, we all know, is engaged from early morning till late at night in the public service. No Senator devotes himself with more alacrity and zeal to the public service than that Senator. Under these circumstances, therefore, I think such a committee could do very little towards the accomplishment of the desired object. On the other hand, if the Committee on Printing should undertake it, they, understanding what would be wanted, could make the selection. I have no objection, however, if gentlemen think proper to refer this matter to a select committee, but I think the other course would be the best.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concur in the suggestion of the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN.] The papers on the table relate to a subject in which the gentlemen he has named have, very appropriately, an interest, and of which, perhaps, they have a better knowledge than any others in the Senate. They would, therefore, readily select such papers as would bear upon any of the various points in controversy, and there would thus be no necessity for printing any others. I hope the action of the Senate will take that direction. The selection and printing of the papers will be done much more readily, and a much better disposition will be made of them than could be otherwise attained.

Mr. COOPER. I do not rise to oppose the reference moved by the Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] but to answer a remark which I understood to have been made by that gentleman, and which, in my opinion, was unkind and unjust to the Secretary of the Interior. I am not certain that I understood that remark, but I took it to be that, by the delay which had occurred in transmitting to the Senate the papers which had been called for, the Secretary of the Interior had, perhaps, answered the object which he had in view. That I believe was the substance of the remark made by the Senator from California.

Mr. WELLER. With the permission of the Senator, I will say this: I remarked that there had been an unusual and unaccountable delay in answering the resolution of the Senate; but, whether the Secretary of the Interior had designed to prevent publication by withholding the documents until this late period of the session I did not say; although there are suspicions connected with some gentlemen in his office that might induce such a belief. I did not say that the object of keeping the documents back so long, was to prevent their publication, but, at all events, such is the inevitable effect.

Mr. COOPER. I understood the Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] to say that the object of the Secretary of the Interior might have been attained by this delay; and I still understand that that is the substance of what the gentleman did say. If I am correct in so understanding the Senator, I think his remark is unkind and unjust to the Secretary of the Interior. I do not believe that when a call for documents is made by the Senate, that gentleman would willfully and purposely cause a delay in transmitting those papers for the purpose of subserving any object of his own—any improper object. I do not think that the character of that gentleman would warrant any imputation of the kind. I do not understand it as having been made directly against the Secretary; but I am sure from what I know of him that he would not lend himself to any conduct of the kind alluded to by the Senator from California. So much, I think, it is proper to say.

Mr. RUSK. The sending of this matter to the Committee on Printing at this late period of the session will in all probability delay the proper action of the Senate on the question to which the papers relate.

There is another difficulty. The papers will have to be considered, and their contents discussed probably in the committee; and thus the committee itself may be involved in a difficulty in selecting the proper papers to be printed. It might be said or supposed that some papers bearing on the question had not been ordered to be printed. The object of this call was that we might have before us the testimony in regard to a question of vital importance to the United States. I regret extremely, from whatever cause it may have occurred, that four months of the session should have been consumed in responding to this call. I am not prepared, nor do I intend, to make either charges or insinuations in relation to this delay, though I regret that so much time has been lost since the call was made before we have received these papers. They relate to a question of vital importance to the interest of the United States in relation to this boundary line.

I contend that the Commissioner has departed from the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to the loss to the United States of a large territory, and in a position where it is remarkably important. The Commissioner and the Secretary of the Interior insist that they have carried out the treaty. I insist that they have palpably departed from it. I desire to arrest this proceeding where it is; but I do not desire to do anything which might fall upon parties engaged in the survey, who have not fallen into this error. These parties are very far from home, and depending upon appropriations to be made, or already made. I could see no place where we could get up the question better than the present, where we could have it properly and fairly discussed.

I should dislike to interfere with appropriations for carrying on this survey; but if driven to that, and no other means are afforded of arresting what I believe to be a survey which will be greatly injurious to the United States, I shall be bound to resort to it. This is a grave question, one that I regard as a violation of the treaty. An initial point has been established on the Rio Grande, above that where it was established by the treaty, at least thirty-four miles. The extent of territory included in the running of that line will be thirty-four miles by about one hundred and eighty, and that at a most important point for communication between the Atlantic and Pacific portions of this country. What I am anxious to do is, to get this question before the Senate and Congress, in such a form that this mischief may be prevented. What I fear is, that if there is to be delay, the Commissioner may go on and complete the line between the Gila and the Rio Grande from an improper point. It seems to me, therefore, that to reach this question in the shortest possible manner, and bring it before the Senate in a proper form, with all the facts bearing upon it, the best plan will be to refer these papers to a special committee of five Senators. And I will say that I desire not to be placed upon that committee. I have considerable feeling in reference to this matter. I believe I would do justice, but I confess I have considerable feeling on the subject. I think that if this initial point, which the Commissioner has fixed upon, is retained, we shall sustain an injury irreparable, one which will be more mischievous in its consequences than any which we have sustained for a long time. Having these views, I desire, from feelings of delicacy in relation to this matter, not to be placed upon the committee. I hope, however, that the Senator from California will modify his motion in such a manner that these papers may go to a select committee. Such a committee can, in a short time, make a selection of what they consider necessary to have printed, as bearing upon the question to be considered by the Senate. The Printing Committee could take no action except with reference to the question of printing, and would not have the whole subject before them as the select committee would have. I hope, therefore, the Senator from California will modify his motion as I have suggested.

Mr. CLARKE. I was about to say, in reference to this incidental question, that I was very desirous indeed to see the papers, in order that I might be better enabled to discuss the question involved in the resolution. I felt a special interest in investigating the conduct of the Commissioner of the Boundary Survey. Finding the papers did not come in, I ventured to go to the Department and inquire when we might expect them. That was on Thursday last. The Secretary told me they would be here immediately. He said that when the resolution of the Senator from California was adopted, he saw at once that a vast mass of papers would necessarily have to be examined. He spoke of having given an invitation to the Senator from California to make a selection of papers which he desired to have sent. He stated that he at once set two clerks to copying papers, and finding that their progress was slow, he engaged another, and the three were constantly engaged in copying and examining the papers. The papers, after they were copied, had to undergo a particular and thorough examination. That was the reason given to me why the papers had not been sent in sooner after the call of the Senate. I did not expect that the question of the initial point would be brought incidentally into the discussion in the Senate; on the contrary, I did hope that it would not. I had been apprised, and the Senate had been apprised, sometime since, by the open and manly declaration of my friend from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] that upon another occasion, and at another time, he should bring up that question distinctly for the consideration of the Senate. That Senator believes, sincerely, no doubt, that there has been an error on the part of the Commissioner in determining upon the initial point on the Rio Grande from which to proceed on the westward line. From an examination of the subject, I have come to a different conclusion. That, however, is only a difference of opinion between friends, and can have no further effect. My own impression is, that it is a question which does not involve anything now before the Senate, and that until we see the papers now sent in to the Senate, we shall not be prepared to enter into a discussion of a question which the Senator says is of so much importance to the country, and to those who have been engaged in the commission for running the boundary line.

My purpose is to confine myself in the remarks I shall make hereafter, to a defense of the private character of the Commissioner, and, incidentally, to charges made against others, following, with the limited means in my possession, the transit of this commission, and of its re-formation in 1850, up to the time when these charges were prepared and sent here; together with the other evidence which has been furnished. My object in doing so is simply this: to vindicate the character of an individual far away from this place—an individual who is not here to refute the charges brought against him, and who is not afforded an opportunity of speaking for himself. It is the private character of the Commissioner which I propose to vindicate, and, by the blessing of God, I shall be able to do so.

As regards this initial point, I shall beg my friends, who are so anxious to pursue this investigation, not to force on a discussion at this moment, when no one is prepared to take part in it, or to say what is right or what is wrong. The Senator from Texas [Mr. Rusk] has his opinion; I have mine; but I am not prepared to vindicate that opinion to-day. I merely say this for the purpose of begging my friends to withhold an expression on one point, and let us get through the discussion on some others.

I think that the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] relative to the printing of the papers, is a good one. Let a special committee be appointed to select such papers as it is ascertained apply to the charges against the Commissioner; also, such papers as relate to the charges against others; for let us recollect that the charges laid before us are not made against one man alone. Let all the papers referring to these charges, and connected with the boundary line, and the initial point on the Rio Grande, be selected and printed. There are many papers which it would be folly to think of printing; for, even if they were printed, they would not be worth the paper upon which they were printed.

I concur in the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] for the appointment of a select committee, to whose care the selection of the documents for publication may be left.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will take occasion to say that the discussion with regard to the initial point of the boundary line is not now under consideration. It is simply a question of reference to a committee.

Mr. PEARCE. I do not wish to say anything on the subject of referring this matter either to the Committee on Printing or to a select committee. I did not hear the remarks of the Senator from California, [Mr. Weller,] but if I understood he remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cooper,] some suspicion had been expressed by the former named Senator that the Secretary of the Interior had withheld these papers with a special design. It is to that point I wish to speak. I have before me a communication from the late chief clerk in the Department of the Interior, to the Secretary of that Department. In this communication he says, that when the call was made it was his duty to prepare these papers and send them to the Senate, and that the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior to him were to have them prepared with all possible dispatch. He further says, that the force in the Department not being sufficient, it was necessary to obtain clerks elsewhere; that two clerks were transferred from the Census Bureau, and that part of the time three clerks were employed. After they had made copies of the papers which were supposed to be necessary, it was considered essential that these copies should be compared with the original documents. The communication to which I have referred further says, that these clerks devoted to the work of revision and correction all the time that could be spared from other duties which imperatively required their attention, being frequently engaged upon it till a late hour of the night. It also goes on to say:

"After the comparison and the correction of errors, and the supplying and copying of such papers as had escaped attention at first, it was necessary to arrange all these papers—an immense mass—in intelligible order; a work which required an intimate knowledge of their contents, and much intelligence and skill, and, of course, to be intrusted to one clerk only. It will be remembered, also, that the records of the Department on the subject are embraced in a bound volume, and fill many pages folio. But one clerk at a time could be employed upon this, and that fact occasioned some delay after the other papers were prepared.

"This statement will show some of the causes of the delay complained of. The resolution might have been responded to sooner, if you had seen proper to pursue one of these two courses, viz: either by taking the regular clerks of the office from their regular duties, and thus practically putting a stop to the operations of the Department; or, 2d, by employing a large number of extra temporary clerks, who would not have done the work so well, but would have done it—a proceeding not looked upon with much favor by Congress, and which the contingent fund at your disposal would not very well bear."

That, I believe, is a fair explanation. It is evident that the Secretary of the Interior could not be perpetually engaged in supervising the work of the copying clerks. He gives his orders, and reiterates these orders, from time to time. That he has done; and, having done that, I think he is exonerated from all complaint on the subject.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, I know that much of what the honorable Senator from Maryland has stated in regard to the Secretary is true; because upon more than one occasion upon which I have been at the Department, I have heard him tell his chief clerk that he must increase his force to get this report sent to the Senate. But as far back as the 10th of June, I received a letter from the Secretary in which he informed me that the papers would be sent in in a very few days; that they were then comparing them. I had called myself at the Department some four or five times, in regard to the answer to this call, and was constantly imploring the Secretary to increase the force, in order that we might have the answer in time to have it printed. Notwithstanding all this, it has been delayed. Whether it was the intention of the Secretary to prevent its publication at this session or not, I do not undertake to say. There is no man connected with the administration of public affairs here for whom personally I entertain a higher opinion than the head of the Department of the Interior. I would be slow to impugn his integrity. But there are persons connected with that Department who were also connected with it under the administration of a late ex-Senator, [Mr. Ewing,] and I confess I do not entertain as high an opinion of them as I do of the head of the Department. There may be some gentlemen connected with that Department now who were engaged in the performance of duties there when certain letters were suppressed by the then head of the Department for the purpose of injuring me. If there be any fault on the part of the Secretary of the Interior, it has been, in my judgment, because he did not give his personal attention to the subject, although entreated by me on several occasions to give it. He knew I had no confidence in some of his subordinates. That is what I have to say; and I still think the resolution could have been answered much sooner, and under different circumstances would have been answered much sooner. I hope I am now understood. An answer to the resolution was necessary to the vindication of my own reputation against infamous charges made upon this floor; and for this reason I may have shown more than a usual degree of anxiety.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to interpose again, and remind Senators that the question is simply on referring the communication to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WELLER. In answer to the suggestion made in regard to the appointment of the select committee, if it is thought advisable by any considerable portion of the Senate, I will not interpose any objection to it. I will not make the motion myself, because I do not desire to be placed on the committee, and under the parliamentary rule I might subject myself to be put on it if I should make the motion. I hope, therefore, my friend from Texas will introduce it in the form of a proposition to amend my motion. I would accept it as an amendment to my proposition.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition is to refer the communication to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GWIN. I move, as an amendment, to refer the subject to a select committee.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order. The question must first be taken on the proposition to refer to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. GWIN. I move that the communication be referred to a select committee of five, to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate for the Chair to appoint the committee.

No objection was made; and the President appointed Messrs. WELLER, CLARKE, RUSK, COOPER, and TOUCEY, as the committee.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Morrow county, Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to present a petition of certain publishers of daily papers in the city of Boston. They represent that there is a bill before the Senate, which has come from the House of Representatives, regulating the postage of daily papers; and I desire to get the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the subject. They complain that, by the provisions of that bill, they are oppressed, and ask the Senate to look into those provisions, and see whether they are just towards the publishers of daily papers that weigh more than two ounces. I understand, from the memorialists, that they are the publishers of papers falling within that category, and that it imposes what they deem to be a very unreasonable burden upon them. They say that the former postage was a cent within certain limits, and that it is now proposed to raise it to two cents. They think the Senate ought to take cognizance of the subject, and make some more equitable legislation. While the bill reduces postage everywhere else, they complain that it raises it on them. I move to refer the petition to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the following memorials of widows of soldiers who have been on the pension roll, but whose pensions have expired, praying a renewal of their pensions, ask to be discharged from their further consideration, for the reason that the committee have reported a general bill, which will embrace the cases presented by the memorials:

Memorial of Sarah A. Watson;
Memorial of Augusta O. Boyd;
Memorial of Mary Ann H. Ridgeley;
Memorial of Mary Robb;
Memorial of the widow of Orlando Pierce; and Memorial of Elvira F. Smith.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the petitions of John Cripps, Orson Young, and the children of Hannah Scott, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Lavinia Taylor, widow of Isaac Taylor, a private in the United States Army, praying a pension, reported a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Silas Champton, of New York, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the petition of John H. C. Mayer, praying that a sum of money paid by him on land subject to entry may be refunded with interest, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of Samuel H. Hampstead, praying compensation for services as district attorney in defending claims to lands in Arkansas, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on the Post Of-Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the petition of the administrator of Isaac L. Battle, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the bills from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Catherine Clarke, and for the relief of David Murphy, reported them back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Sarah Crandall, praying a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred a joint resolution relating to pensions, reported back the same with an amendment.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1853, reported back the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. UPHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the memorial of John R. Jefferson, praying compensation for carrying the mail, and damages for the annulment of his contract, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Van Rensselaer Morgan, praying to be allowed compensation for his traveling expenses while returning from the Sandwich Islands, by order of the Navy Department, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of citizens of Pensacola, praying that measures may be taken for the construction of a ship-of-war at that navy-yard, and that it be prepared for the construction, equipment, and repair of all classes of vessels-of-war, submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

GEORGE R. C. FLOYD.

Mr. GWIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back the joint resolution for the relief of George R. C. Floyd, late Secretary of Wisconsin Territory, and sureties, and offer a substitute to the joint resolution. Inasmuch as it is a matter which has been adjudicated before by the Senate—as it merely refers the accounts to the proper office for adjustment—I ask for its consideration now. I presume there will be no objection to it.

No objection was made, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution. The amendment of the committee is, to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert the following:

"That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be authorized and directed to settle the accounts of George R. C. Floyd, late Secretary of Wisconsin Territory, upon principles of equity and justice."

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SETTLERS ON THE CENTRAL RAILROAD, ETC.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up House bill entitled "An act to protect actual settlers upon the land on the line of the Central Railroad and branches by granting preemption rights there-to." My reason for making this motion is, that it is a bill of such a nature that unless it passes within a few days, it will be of no avail to the persons whom it is intended to benefit.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion to allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I will suggest to the Senator from California that it will take but a short time to act upon the bill. The necessity for its passage is great.

Mr. SHIELDS. The parties intended to be benefited by the bill are preëmtors on the line of the railroad, and they will lose their little improvements unless it passes within a few days. It is only intended to enable them to enter the land at $2 50 per acre, the Government price. The lands are to be sold, and they will get into the hands of speculators unless this bill shall pass in a few days. That is the only reason for asking the Senate to take it up now. It will be of no avail in two or three days.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill. It was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That each and every person now an actual settler and occupant, and who, on the 20th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1850, had made such an actual settlement and improvement as would have entitled him to a right of preemption under the act of September 4th, 1841, but for his failure to give the requisite notice under that law, or to file proof within due time, on any tract of land now owned by the United States, and situated within the limits reserved from sale by order of the Government, because of the grant of alternate sections to the States of Illinois, Mississippi, and Alabama in aid of the construction of the Chicago and Mobile railroad and branches, by virtue of an act of Congress approved September 20th, 1850, entitled 'An act granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Illinois, Mississippi, and Alabama in aid of the construction of a railroad from Chicago to Mobile,' shall have the right to purchase, at the price established by law in regulating the sales of said lands, a quantity of the tract so settled on and improved, not less than forty nor more than one hundred and sixty acres, in legal subdivisions, on which said improvements may be situated: Provided, That any person claiming the right to purchase under this act shall, before the actual offering of the tract at public sale, file with the register of the proper land office a notice describing the land by its numbers, and make the necessary proof, affidavit, and payment for the land, within twelve months from the date of this act: And provided further, That the right of way upon and across any tract of land claimed under the provisions of this act, not exceeding two hundred feet in width, shall be reserved and retained for the said railroad and branches, as the same may be located and constructed."

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the correction of errors in the location of military bounty land warrants, and entry of lands; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JAMES C. WATSON.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James C. Watson, of Georgia. I will explain, in a few words, why I make that request of the Senate at this time. My colleague, [Mr. Dawson,] whose presence on the occasion of the debate on the bill is absolutely necessary, may be detained from the Senate by unavoidable circumstances for many days after this. I ask, therefore, as an act of courtesy to him, that this matter may be taken up at this time, to enable him to leave the Senate Chamber to attend to duties which are more pressing upon him, a knowledge of which, perhaps, is familiar to most of the Senators present. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up that bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I regret very much, but I am constrained by a sense of duty to insist upon taking up the Indian appropriation bill. I think, after having sent a resolution back to the House of Representatives proposing to adjourn on the 31st of August, we ought to take care to transact the business as fast as they send it to us, especially the general appropriation bills. The Indian appropriation bill was reported this morning, and I hope the Senate will take it up, and consider it in preference to other subjects. Other gentlemen have special subjects which they wish to have considered, and if we begin with this, I do not know where it will end. I presume the Senator can have his bill taken up on next private bill day.

Mr. SUMNER. I certainly have every disposition to treat my friend from Georgia with every courtesy, but the bill which he seeks to take up out of its course is a private bill. Naturally, therefore, it should come up on Friday. But there is another circumstance on account of which I may certainly appeal to the courtesy of the Senate. It is known to all that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Chase] has expressed an intention to discuss the bill. It is within my personal knowledge that he has made elaborate preparation for that discussion. Now, it so happens that this very day he has left the city to be absent some days; and his last request to me, as he left, was to appeal to the Senate to have that bill, if it should be brought forward, put aside until his return. On that ground, as a courtesy to the absent Senator, and as this is a private bill, and therefore does not properly come up with our public bills, I must join with the Senator from Virginia, and ask that it may not be considered to-day.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I certainly do not wish to interfere with the desires of any member of the Senate, with regard to the order of business that should be taken up. I have no inclination to interfere with the wishes of the honorable Senator from Georgia, but, sir, after the explanation made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, it would be hardly courteous to the Senator from Ohio to take up the bill named by the Senator from Georgia, in his absence, inasmuch as he has prepared himself for its discussion. But, incidentally, in this discussion upon the motion of the honorable Senator from Georgia, my friend from Virginia [Mr. Hunter] has intimated his wish—and his wishes are almost always law with us—that the Indian appropriation bill should be taken up for consideration by the Senate. Now, I submit in opposition to that incidental suggestion, and in opposition to the motion of the Senator from Georgia, that there already has been in this Chamber a discussion upon a resolution that was introduced by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. Weller,] in relation to certain charges that were made against the Commissioner to run and mark the boundary line between this country and Mexico. The Senate will recollect that that discussion, so far as it proceeded, was entirely of a violent and personal character. It falls to my lot to undertake to defend an absent man, and so far as the limited materials within my possession have enabled me, I am ready to enter upon that defense now, and I certainly will ask the Senate not to supersede, by any new subject, the consideration of the regular order, which was expected to come up to-day, but that the motion of the Senator from Georgia, and the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Virginia, may not prevail, and that I may be allowed to go on with my remarks, following the honorable Senator from California.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to know whether I understood the Senator aright. Did he charge me with having made a violent personal attack on the present Commissioner?

Mr. CLARKE. I said that the discussion, as presented by the honorable Senator, was of a violent and personal character. I believe that was the expression, but I retract the word "violent." It was only personal. I meant nothing offensive.

Mr. WELLER. It was not personal so far as the Commissioner was concerned.

Mr. CLARKE. The Senator will allow me to explain that I meant no discourtesy to him, and I ask him now, in advance, not to get angry with one who does not intend to offend him, or anybody else, any further than in the line of duty prescribed as a Senator on this floor. So far as that goes I shall do my duty. But I would observe that, in the remarks made by the honorable Senator upon his resolution, he referred to a former Senator upon this floor. With that, except as an incidental thing, I have little to do; but in those remarks there were charges preferred by him—for the first time they ever came to my knowledge—against the Commissioner. It was to these charges that I referred as being of a personal character. I retract the word "violent," and beg the Senator not to think that I meant anything discourteous.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing the prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill named by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSK. It seems to be a matter of courtesy all round. A motion is made by the honorable Senator from Georgia to take up, as a matter of courtesy to his colleague, the bill which he has named. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts desires, as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Ohio, that it should be postponed until he has an opportunity to come back and discuss it. As I understand the Senator from Rhode Island, he desires that he shall have his rights, by going on with another discussion. Now, sir, I have to choose between these three gentlemen to whom I should extend courtesy.

Mr. DAWSON. If my friend will allow me, I will ask my colleague to withdraw his motion.

Mr. RUSK. I hope the Senator will not do so. The bill was once up, and would have been discussed and passed, but the honorable Senator's politeness then withdrew the motion in order to give the Senator from Ohio an opportunity to investigate it. I know something of this bill, and it is clearly just, legal, and right. It is for money paid by General Watson years ago, which is now owing to his heirs. I know the question which is desired to be raised by the honorable Senator from Ohio. He desires to raise a question where, in fact, none can be raised, and to fasten to the bill a question as to the right of property in slaves. I have examined the facts in the case. The whole claim arises, to be sure, in relation to some slaves that were captured from the Seminole Indians. Under an order of one of the officers of the Government they were to be turned over to the Creeks.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will be under the necessity of saying that the bill is not under consideration.

Mr. RUSK. I will then confine my remarks to this. The question is, whether this motion shall not prevail out of courtesy to the Senator from Ohio. Now, I know the claim to be a just one. I feel sure that it does not involve the questions supposed. I know the condition of the honorable Senator from Georgia to be that which must be extremely embarrassing. He has a son at the point of death. This bill has been delayed and delayed; and one day in its order, when we were upon private bills, it was, as a matter of courtesy, postponed. And now that Senator has to choose between going to the bedside of his sick and dying son, or extending his courtesy, and not discharging his duty to his friends and constituents. Under such circumstances, I hope the Senate will take up and dispose of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I have received a communication from one of the parties interested in this bill, insisting that it shall not be taken up in the absence of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS,] who is not now present. I am not acquainted with the merits of the bill. I have no reason to believe but that it is just; but there is some difference among the parties as to the propriety of taking it up now, which I do not understand. But I am requested to state this much to the Senate, that one of the parties is desirous of having the Senator from Alabama present when it is considered.

Mr. SUMNER. I would take the liberty of correcting my friend from Texas, so far as he has undertaken to state what the honorable Senator from Ohio would say, if he were here to discuss this question. I understand that the Senator from Ohio has made an elaborate examination of the facts and documents in the case. He is desirous of presenting his conclusions on that examination, to the Senate. This case is one which has been some ten or twelve years before Congress, and now for the first time has reached this body; and when a Senator has set himself apart and made that preparation for an examination, may he not expect that the bill will, at least, take its regular place on the Calendar as a private bill, and then be called up, and he have an opportunity to present the results of his examination to the Senate? I think it is not claiming too much for that absent Senator—after he has made his preparation, when he has authorized me to make that known to the Senate—to ask this indulgence.

Mr. RUSK. I know this indulgence was once extended to the Senator from Ohio. I am not disposed to be wanting in courtesy to anybody; but I know this case. I have investigated the matter. My moral perceptions may be wrong; but I do not think I have seen a stronger case of justice presented before the Senate. I know very well that the honorable Senator from Ohio did request the Senator from Georgia to postpone it on a former day; and now, under the circumstances, it is a question whether or not we shall indulge the Senator from Ohio, as a matter of courtesy to him, in raising an abstract question, or indulge the Senator from Georgia, who is called away from the Senate by an afflicting circumstance.

Mr. WALKER. The last remark of the Senator from Texas does not seem to present the case properly. My friend from Massachusetts, but an instant before, denied that the object of the Senator from Ohio was to raise a mere abstract question here. He assured us that the object of that honorable Senator was to present an argument upon the facts of the case. I know nothing at all about this claim. If any Senator has investigated it, and can elucidate it upon the facts, I shall be glad, for one, to hear him. I regret exceedingly not to extend any courtesy whatever which may be asked, to the Senator from Georgia, under the circumstances; but we have a request that this case may not be taken up to-day, on account of another Senator, [Mr. CLEMENS,] who is also absent. This being the state of things; it being desired by the Senator from Ohio to give an argument upon the facts, not upon an abstract question; and the Senator from Alabama desiring to submit another argument, I suppose, or at least to be present, I think we had better not take up the bill now, out of its order, when it is not private bill day.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sorry that I cannot accede to the request of my colleague to withdraw my motion. I recollect to have read in an old play of a man who made up his mind that he would never again do another courteous act as long as he lived. If I were my colleague, I would make up my mind not to do another courteous act during my life, if this request should be refused. When the case was called up before, the Senator from Ohio requested that it might be postponed, stating that he desired to make some remarks upon it. My colleague, with his usual courtesy, acquiesced. He was ready, and able, and willing at that time to debate the whole question, and present it thoroughly and accurately to the Senate. It was simply through his courtesy to the Senator from Ohio that it was postponed. How is he situated now? Here is a solemn duty which he is called upon to perform. Whether he shall not have another more solemn duty to perform, is a question I hate to entertain, but which he may have to entertain. Now, between these two courtesies, between these duties, can the Senate hesitate for a moment? The Senator from Ohio has had ample time to prepare himself. He is not called away, as far as we know, by any extraordinary circumstance. My colleague has prepared himself for the case; and his presence is indispenably necessary to the safe and effectual vindication of the claim just as it is. I ask the Senate if they will hesitate between these two different courtesies? I am as ready to hear the Senator from Ohio upon the abstract question of slavery, which we are just as ready to meet as any other question involved in this case; but the Senate have intelligence and information enough before them to act upon the case without the Senator from Ohio; and I ask, under the circumstances, that the Senate will take up the bill as an act of courtesy, and an act of justice to my colleague.

In reference to the absence of the Senator from Alabama, I have only to say, that his absence—although perhaps it may be important to have him here—cannot affect the merits of the case. There may be a question, after the Senate shall have passed this bill, which of two legal representatives shall be entitled to the money. With that question the Senate has nothing to do. It will be referred to the proper Department to pay the money to the legal representatives of James C. Watson; but that is a question which is not at all to be agitated here. All the Senate have to do is with the abstract justice of the claim; and now I make an earnest, and I hope, effectual appeal to the Senate, to relieve my colleague from the unfortunate predicament in which he is placed—placed, too, by his courtesy to the Senator from Ohio. I hope, therefore, the Senate will agree to take up the bill and pass it.

Mr. WADE. My colleague [Mr. CHASE] has left the city for to-day, not supposing that this bill would come up out of its regular order, it being a private bill. He has been guilty of no negligence in preparing himself on the question, as I know. He expected it would come up on the last private bill day, and was then ready to meet it. It is not true that he has been negligent in preparing himself; he is prepared, and was prepared then. But the bill was passed by the Senate being occupied with other matters. He went away, believing that it would not come up again until next private bill day, and had not anticipated at all any movement to take it up out of its regular order. I know that he thinks it a very important bill, and believes that the claim is not well founded, not on account of any abstract principle that I know of. I have understood from him, that it depended on a great variety of facts, and investigation of documents of considerable magnitude, requiring considerable labor to go through their investigation. I know he has come to a conclusion directly opposite to that which the Senator from Texas thinks is very clear. He has prepared himself, he has investigated the case, and he wishes to state to the Senate the result of his investigation. He did not anticipate any movement to take it up out of its order. Were he here to-day, he would be ready to discuss it; for he did in good faith proceed to inform himself of the facts, and he immediately prepared himself for the discussion. I think, out of courtesy to him, the bill should not be taken up to-day. I think, in justice to all, that we may understand it, it should not be taken up.

Mr. CLARKE. I had designed—and my papers are before me—to go on to-day; but after the appeal which has been made by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. CHARLTON,] and the particular circumstances under which that appeal has been made, I withdraw all claim I may have upon the courtesy of the Senate to proceed to-day, and will vote for the motion of the honorable Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DAWSON. I trust I may be permitted to suggest to my colleague to withdraw his motion until to-morrow, and let the Senator from Rhode Island go on this morning.

Mr. CLARKE. It makes but little difference to me whether I proceed to-day or to-morrow. I have the evidence before me; it is nearly all either written or printed. I have very little myself to say, except to submit the evidence.

Mr. CASS. As the Senator from Rhode Island is perfectly willing to postpone his remarks, it certainly appears to me that the appeal, presented by the Senator from Georgia, is such as to justify the Senate in going on with the bill which he has moved to take up.

Mr. CHARLTON's motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Treasurer of the United States to pay to the legal representatives of General James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia, deceased, $14,600, with six per cent. interest per annum, from May 8th, 1838, till paid, being the amount paid by him, under the sanction of the Indian agent, to certain Creek warriors, for slaves captured by said warriors while they were in the service of the United States against the Seminole Indians in Florida.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I move that the President of the Senate appoint an additional member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, as one of the members of that committee is now absent on account of indisposition.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. CHARLTON was appointed.

NOTICE OF A RESOLUTION.

Mr. TOUCEY gave notice of his intention to introduce a joint resolution, transferring from the office of the Attorney General to the Solicitor of the Treasury the duty of examining titles to lands proposed to be purchased or taken by the United States for custom-houses and other public purposes.

THE BOUNDARY COMMISSIONER.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution, submitted by Mr. WELLER on the 28th of June, proposing the appointment of a select committee of five to investigate the charges preferred by Colonel J. McClellan, of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, against J. R. Bartlett, Commissioner to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. CLARKE addressed the Senate for some time in defense of the official conduct of Commissioner Bartlett, but, without concluding, gave way—

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 26, 1851.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the resolution fixing the day of adjournment.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!" all over the House.]

Mr. OLDS. Agreed, if it does not come out of the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. I will then propose to take up the resolution before proceeding to the execution of the business of the morning hour.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object to taking up the resolution previous to the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to, and the resolution cannot be taken up until after the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. OLDS. I would inquire if there is not some unfinished business pending before the House for the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that there is not. Reports are now in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to pay to Nathan Rathburn, at the same rate of compensation that other clerks of the House are paid, from the first day of January, 1851, to the 4th day of March, 1851, for services as clerk of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. OLDS. I send to the Chair a letter directed to the chairman of the present committee, from the chairman of the same committee during the last Congress, which I desire to have read.

The letter was then read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, 7th May, 1852.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Nathan Rathburn was employed as clerk of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, of the House of Representatives, Thirty-first Congress, from the first of January, 1851, to the close of the session. The committee reported a post route bill, an unusual thing at a short session, which made it indispensable to employ a clerk. Very respectfully,

E. D. POTTER, late Chairman

Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Hon. E. B. OLDS, Chairman, &c.

Mr. OLDS. I have only a word to say in relation to that resolution. At the last short session of Congress, there were so many petitions for post offices and post roads, which is a very unusual thing, that it became necessary to report a bill in reference thereto. The chairman of the committee being engaged in other duties, as members of the House generally are during a short session, and in attending to the sittings of the House, had not the time to attend to the drawing up of that bill, and he employed a clerk for the time named in that resolution—that is, from some time in January to the close of the session in March. All I have to say is, that the House have the power to pay the clerk employed by that committee. If they do not do it, the chairman of that committee will have to pay him out of his own pocket.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to know of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] if his predecessor, the chairman of that committee, did not ask permission of the House to employ a clerk, and the House refused to grant it? I do not wish to object to this small matter, but I do not want to set a bad example, by allowing a committee to do what the House forbids. My recollection is, that the gentleman asked authority to employ a clerk, and the House refused it. If so, it is improper for us to pass this resolution.

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the chairman of the committee acted in opposition to the wishes of the House. He employed this clerk with the expectation that he would have to pay him out of his own funds. I am aware that there was no resolution of Congress authorizing the employment of a clerk by that committee. Now, it is a question simply whether Congress will pay that clerk, or whether the chairman of the committee shall do it?

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman has not answered my question. My question was: Did not the House refuse to authorize the employment of a clerk?

Mr. OLDS. I have already stated that I suppose there was no authority from the House for the employment of a clerk; but the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads found it absolutely necessary to have a clerk, and if the House does not pay for the services of that clerk, the chairman will be obliged to pay it himself.

Mr. STANLY. Did not the House refuse? That is the question.

Mr. GENTRY. It seems to me that this principle is involved in the proposition now before the House—namely, whether the House will confer indiscriminately upon all of its committees the discretion of employing clerks whenever they choose without its authority? If we adopt the principle of paying when they employ a clerk without the authority of Congress, we may expect every committee to employ a clerk, and the House be called upon to pay them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] why his predecessor did not ask for authority to employ a clerk, if a clerk was necessary?

Mr. OLDS. I am informed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] that the committee did do so, but the House refused.

Mr. CLINGMAN. In what position is this question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I regret that any question has been made about this matter; but, as it has been made, I think the House had better settle the principle right. I remember, that in the last Congress, there were repeated applications from several committees for clerks, and the House refused its consent. Now, we understand that the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads thought proper to employ a clerk, and he did so, according to my recollection, upon a distinct refusal of the House to pay him. I do not think, therefore, that there is any principle which will justify us in paying him. I would rather give ten times the sum for some other object.

I hope the House of Representatives will not allow itself to be trifled with in this way. I have known repeated instances, in my experience, of this kind, when attempts have been made to get clerks, but more frequently in the executive branch of the Government, where we have refused expressly to allow them, and where, notwithstanding they were employed, we have been called upon to pay them. There are several instances now, which I hope will come up during the discussion of the appropriation bills, where it will be found that executive officers have asked for appropriations of money for particular purposes, such as the building of houses, offices, or something else, which were refused, but where they have gone on to spend the money notwithstanding. Now, with what propriety can we refuse to pay any debts they choose to contract if we allow this system to go on here? This is a small matter, I admit, but the chairman of the committee, whoever he was, thought fit to employ this clerk, and I think he ought to pay him. We have all to employ clerks. I do, and every member has to for our private business, and without them we cannot get along with our public and private business both. I hope the House will reject this application. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. OLDS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion, to allow me to say a word.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw it.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to say, in relation to this matter, that this applicant stands in precisely the same condition as the Secretary of War in asking appropriation for the deficiency bill. Congress had refused appropriations for purposes asked in that bill, but the War Department went on and made the expenditures. But here is a poor man, with his wife and children depending upon his daily labor for their subsistence. He has given his services for sixty days to the country—services absolutely necessary to be rendered—and he asks pay for those sixty days at the usual rate of compensation, and this House, in its magnanimity, refuses to pay him, and yet gives $3,000,000 to the War Department, in the deficiency bill. I told this applicant that although I believed his claim a just one, it was too small a one for the House of Representatives to pass, but if he could come and ask for half a million, as for the Collins line, he could get it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] if he did not oppose the deficiency bill upon that ground? That is my recollection.

Mr. OLDS. I did, and ask the gentleman if he did not vote for it?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will state this distinction between the two cases. There is this important distinction: The expenditures in this deficiency bill were generally of a character authorized by law. We are bound by law to maintain our Army and Navy, and Congress said they could be maintained at a less rate than the Secretary thought they could be, and the House has become satisfied that a larger sum than was appropriated was necessary to do what the law required should be done. But we have no law authorizing the employment of these clerks. If we had such a law, and had voted a certain sum of money which was found insufficient, then there would be a similarity in the two cases.

Mr. HART. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. OLDS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Barrere, Beale, Bibbhaus, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caldwell, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Daniel, John G. Davis, Duncan, Eastman, Faulkner, Ficklin, Gaylord, Gentry, Grey, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hebard, Hendricks, Houston, John W. Howe, James Johnson, George G. King, Preston King, Letcher, Martin, Millson, Minor, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Ross, Smart, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Taylor, Thurston, Tuck, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Wilcox, and Wildrick—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Ashie, Bissell, Albert G. Brown, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, Dawson, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Edmundson, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Green, Sampson W. Harris, Henn, Hibbard, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, McNair, Murray, Nahers, Newton, Olds, Peaslee, Penn, Polk, Porter, Powell, Price, Richardson, Robbins, Robie, Schermerhorn, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Townsland, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—72.

Mr. OLDS. I move the previous question.

The House was divided on seconding the previous question, and there were 75 in the affirmative, and 30 in the negative; no quorum voting.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask that the House may be divided by tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FULLER, of Maine, and CHANDLER appointed.

Mr. OLDS. If there be no objection, I will withdraw the call for the previous question.

No objection was made, and the call was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the adoption of the resolution, upon which tellers have been ordered. The same gentlemen will act as tellers.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 43.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. OLDS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

CORNELIUS COVERT.

Mr. STUART. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House referred the bill for the relief of Cornelius Covert to the Committee of the Whole. I stated the contents of that bill to the House, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] also stated that the committee had examined it with great care. It is simply to correct an error in a contract.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill is in the hands of the printer, in compliance with the order of the House. The gentleman's motion may be submitted for consideration and postponed.

Mr. STUART. I will then submit the motion, and give notice that I will call it up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call it up at any time in the morning hour. Reports from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are now in order.

POSTAGE ON THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. OLDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution providing for the distribution of the laws of Congress and the debates thereon.

With a view to the cheap circulation of the laws of Congress and the debates contributing to the true interpretation thereof, and to make free the communication between the representative and constituent bodies:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the present session of Congress the Congressional Globe and Appendix, which contain the laws and the debates thereon, shall pass free through the mails so long as the same shall be published by order of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the circulation of the Daily Globe free of postage.

The resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. OLDS. I ask that the resolution may be put upon its passage. It is not necessary that I should explain it, as its object, I presume, is understood by every member of the House.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. When shall it have a third reading?

[Cries of "Now!" "Now!"]

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether these laws cannot be now distributed free by the frank of the Clerk?

Mr. OLDS. There is no doubt but what members of Congress have the right to frank the Congressional Globe. It is printed by order of Congress and is, therefore, a public document. It is the only publication which does any justice to this House before the country. The proceedings of both the Senate and House of Representatives are reported in the Congressional Globe; and the country, by the circulation of that publication can understand precisely the relative importance of the two Houses, and precisely what is done in the two Houses; but take, sir, the Union or National Intelligencer, and you find a full report of the proceedings of the Senate but a very meagre account of the House proceedings, inasmuch as the House pays nothing for the insertion of its proceedings in those two papers.

A MEMBER. These papers contain a wretched skeleton of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. OLDS. Yes, sir, as a friend near me says, they are but wretched skeletons. Members of Congress have received communications from all portions of the country with regard to the unfairness with which the proceedings of this House are known or represented in the country. The people know nothing of what is going on here, and the only way they can know is by the circulation of the Congressional Globe. Mr. Rives does not propose to raise the price of the Globe at all. If it can be circulated free, without the frank of members of Congress, to subscribers, it will be taken into the country, and we shall be fairly represented. The Appendix to the Globe will hereafter contain all the laws passed at each session of Congress. Thus, we will not only give greater circulation in the country to the proceedings of both Houses in an authentic form, but the laws themselves, which those debates and proceedings serve to illustrate and explain.

Mr. DUNCAN. The object of the resolution, then, is that the subscribers of the Congressional Globe may receive it free of postage.

Mr. OLDS. Yes, sir; but not the Daily Globe.

Mr. DUNHAM. I certainly shall not vote for the resolution. While I am perfectly willing there shall be such a modification of the postage law as shall put the Congressional Globe upon a footing with the other newspapers of the country, I can see no reason why it should be put upon a more favorable one.

Mr. OLDS. I have but a word to say in relation to that. We do not know the new postage bill will become a law. We have no evidence of it at all. The Congressional Globe now goes through the mail as transient matter, and the postage upon it for a long session of Congress is more than nine dollars.

Mr. DUNHAM. That was the very thing to which I was coming. I understood that point perfectly well. My opposition to the resolution is this: while I am willing to take away the objection to which the gentleman alluded, and to provide that the Congressional Globe shall go as a regular newspaper, I am not willing that it shall go free through the mails of the country. There is no more propriety in allowing this publication that privilege than any other newspaper in the United States. The Globe is for the information of the people, and so is every other newspaper published in the country. It should be simply put upon a footing with other papers, and not privileged over that of others. If the gentleman will so modify his resolution that the Congressional Globe shall pay the same rate of postage as other newspapers, as if it were a regular and not an irregular publication, I will vote for it; but I will never give my vote that it shall go through the mails of the country free.

Mr. CARTTER. I do not wish to discuss this proposition, but it occurs to me there is a good reason for distinguishing between this paper and others. The matter here proposed to be sent free of postage is exclusively Congressional, and in that particular unlike any other newspaper publication; but I do not wish to discuss it. I think it ought to be passed, and with a view of facilitating that result, I call for the previous question.

[Cries of "That is right!" "That is right!"]
The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was passed.

Mr. CARTTER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted, and that that motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. OLDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report "a bill to establish certain post routes."

The bill was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to say with reference to that bill that we have endeavored to make it satisfactory to all the members of the House. It is not necessary that the bill shall be read, as each member has examined it and ascertained that it contains what he desired. I therefore move to dispense with its reading, and that it be put upon its passage. It contains nothing but post routes.

Mr. MACE. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to say one word in regard to offering amendments to this bill. I gave notice in the House more than five weeks ago, and again about two weeks since, to members to have their post routes all before the committee, that they might be embodied in this bill when it came before the House, and to obviate the necessity of having the bill printed, or taking up the time of the House in submitting amendments. If it is now to be opened for amendments, we may spend two or three days in its consideration. Let the amendments go over to the short session, and let another post route bill be then reported.

Mr. MACE. I will ask that my amendment be read.

Mr. OLDS. I will make the suggestion that the bill go back to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and gentlemen can then go to the committee room and see that their amendments are inserted.

Mr. MACE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. OLDS. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CORB. A great many members have amendments to offer. I have no doubt that when it gets to the Senate it will be amended. I do not see why it should be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Do I understand the previous question as being called?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not heard the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the motion is to recommit the bill. I called the previous question, with a view to have the bill recommitted, if it is possible, without any further discussion at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must state that the call for the previous question was not heard at all. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHN-SON] was recognized, and if he claims the floor is entitled to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I made the demand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand the proposition is to recommit the bill, or to put it upon its passage under the operation of the previous question, without having it read. There are a great many gentlemen here interested in the establishment of post routes running through their districts, and it seems to be a strange proposition to come forward with a long bill establishing post routes all over the country, and ask that it be put upon its passage without even having it printed or read. It is true that the chairman of the committee informed the House sometime ago that the bill was in course of preparation, and called upon gentlemen to present to the committee their amendments.

Mr. HOUSTON. The proposition is to recommit the bill, for the purpose of allowing members to go down to the committee room, examine, and see if their routes are in the bill. My object was simply to accomplish that end, and get through with this matter. I understand from the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that it has been usual, with a solitary exception, to pass this bill without printing, and the committee always allowed members to see whether their routes were in the bill. That is the proposition now.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire that the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads may withdraw his motion to recommit, and that we may pass this bill at once. I think I can satisfy the House that there will be no injustice done. Every post route has been carefully examined by the committee, and, I believe, in every single instance, the committee have referred to gentlemen in this House who have entered petitions. All have been consulted already. I believe it is usual to pass the bill without reading it. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion to recommit.

Mr. JOHNSON. In this connection I am sorry to inform one of the members of the committee that his information is incorrect. I have had various petitions and applications forwarded to me, and, under the rules of the House, I have referred them to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but I have never received any information from the chairman of any meeting of the committee, or as to whether any of the routes based upon these applications were embraced in the bill or not.

Mr. OLDS. Will the gentleman allow me to inform him that, unless he received notice that there was some dispute about his post routes, they have been embraced in the bill? In all cases where gentlemen have received no notice, their routes have gone in.

Mr. JOHNSON. How do I know, in referring those petitions, that they ever reached the committee? How do I know, or how do the members of this House know, that the Clerk, in making out and transcribing the bill, may not have omitted some post routes? How easy is it to commit mistakes? I cannot see any objection to the postponement of the bill to a day certain, and having it printed, so that each member may examine it for himself, and ascertain whether his routes are embraced in the bill or not. To report a long bill without even having it read to the House, and to say that we must take it, volens volens, upon the mere ipse dixit of the chairman—and this, too when we ascertain the fact that members who have referred petitions to the committee have not been consulted, and do not know whether their routes are in the bill or not—is a most extraordinary proceeding. And it seems, if you wish to get information, you must go in person to the committee, for the bill is not printed, as bills usually are, for the inspection of each member.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that we take up the resolution fixing the time of adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Mr. STANLY. I object.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. HARRIS. Then I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion already pending to suspend the rules. The proposition made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] on last Monday, is the question pending at this time.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for that question.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the motion pending now to suspend the rules, the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HARRIS. I call, then, for the regular order of business.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I have a resolution which I am directed to report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order, while a motion to suspend the rules is pending.

BOOKS FOR NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for the question upon the resolution which I submitted.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives furnish and deliver to each of the members and Delegates of the House of the present Congress, who have not already received them, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House, such books as have been furnished to the members of the Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth, and Thirty-first Congresses: Provided, That this shall not authorize the reprinting of any of said books: And provided further, That no work thus authorized to be furnished shall be obtained or delivered by the Clerk, unless he shall be able to procure a sufficient number of copies thereof to furnish a complete set to each member and Delegate entitled thereto.

Mr. DUNCAN. I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House. The question is upon suspending the rules to admit it.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. FOWLER. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to offer an amendment. I will promise to renew the previous question, if the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. FOWLER. No, sir.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and Messrs. PENN and CHANDLER were appointed.

The House was then counted, and the tellers reported—yeas 32, noes 105.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Before the Clerk commences calling the roll, I desire that the 40th rule of the House shall be read.

The Clerk read the 40th rule, as follows:

"No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested."

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know from the Speaker if this rule debars any member from voting on this resolution? I think it does not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the gentleman if the rule does not exclude all members from voting who are personally interested in this affair? That is the law of this House.

Mr. FOWLER. That is a question for every member to decide for himself.

Mr. ALLISON. If it be the pleasure of the House, I should like to say a few words on the resolution as I am interested in it, according to the 40th rule.

Mr. FOWLER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the previous question.

Mr. FOWLER. It is not in my power to do so.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Barrere, Bibbhaugh, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Cleveland, Cullom, George T. Davis, Disney, Doty, Eastman, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Goodenow, Hart, Haven, Hebard, Hillyer, Horsford, Howard, John W. Howe, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Mace, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McLauchan, McMullin, McNair, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Peaslee, Penn, Polk, Powell, Price, Richardson, Robbins, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Sutherland, Taylor, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walsh, Welch, Wilcox, and Yates—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Thomas H. Bayly, Bockock, Brenton, Brooks, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Caskie, Churchillwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Curtis, Daniel, J. G. Davis, Duncan, Dunham, Edmundson, Ficklin, Floyd, Gaylord, Green, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Hibbard, Houston, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, Preston King, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Outlaw, Penningman, Phelps, Robinson, Savage, Skelton, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Wallace, Watkins, Addison White, and Wildrick—49.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Pending the calling of the roll,

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, said, that as the question had been raised as to whether members interested in the resolution had a right to vote, he should decline voting.

Mr. FOWLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution had been passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the resolution fixing the time for the final adjournment of this session of Congress.

Mr. POLK objected.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I move to suspend the rules to enable me to take up the resolution, and upon that I demand the yeas any nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MEADE. I move to postpone the consideration of this question for one week.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. The pending question is to suspend the rules of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Is it in order to ask a single question in relation to this motion?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to make one single suggestion to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to hear the gentleman's remarks?

Many MEMBERS objected.

Mr. WALSH. Have gentlemen read Mr. Webster's speech in this morning's papers?

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The question was then taken upon Mr. HARRIS's motion, and there were—yeas 107, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babcock, Bibbhaugh, Bissell, Bockock, Bragg, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burrows, Bushy, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Churchillwell, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Edmundson, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Goodrich, Green, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Martin, McMullin, McNair, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Perkins, Powell, Richardson, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Savage, Schoolcraft, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Abram P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, St. Martin, Stratton, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Watkins, and Yates—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, John H. Boyd, Brooks, George H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Chapman, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, Daniel, Disney, Doty, Dunham, Florence, Fowler, Goodenow, Grey, Harper, Hart, Haws, Hebard, Howard, John Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Mace, Mann, McLauchan, Meade, Miller, Millson, Miner, John Moore, Outlaw, Peaslee, Penningman, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Robbins, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Stanly, Richard H. Stanton, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Walsh, Ward, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Williams—60.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. MEADE said: I voted for a suspension of the rules, believing that we ought to fix the day of adjournment. Since I gave my vote the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. BAYLY] has given an intimation—

[Loud cries of "Object!" and "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order. No remark is in order.

Mr. MEADE. Well, I am at liberty, I suppose, to change my vote, voting in the dark. I wanted to hear something from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations—

[Loud cries of "Object!" and "Order!"]

Mr. MEADE. Then I will vote in the negative.

LANDS FOR THE INDIGENT INSANE.

Mr. STANLY. Mr. Speaker, there is a bill upon the Speaker's table, which has been lying there for action for some time. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take it up, with a view of appointing some future day for its consideration. It is a bill for the relief of the indigent insane. A large majority of the House are in favor of it; but I wish to have some day designated for its consideration.

Mr. JONES. I object.

Mr. STANLY. Then I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to take up that bill, and upon that I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BISSELL. The question is not distinctly understood.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to suspend the rules of the House for the purpose of taking up and acting upon House bill No. 76, making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons.

The question was then taken upon Mr. STANLY's motion, and there were—yeas 100, nays 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaugh, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Geo. H. Brown, Burrows, E. C. Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchillwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cullom, George T. Davis, Doty, Duncan, Ficklin, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Green, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, James Johnson, George G. King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Martin, McLauchan, McNair, Miller, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Nabers, Newton, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penningman, Perkins, Porter, Price, Richardson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashe, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Bockock, Bushy, Joseph Cable, Caskie, Chastain, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Disney, Dunham, Durkee, Edmundson, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Grey, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Howard, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Mace, McMullin, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Murphy, Murray, Olds, Penn, Powell, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Savage, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Wallace, Wilcox, and Wildrick—53.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

WILLIAM SPEIDEN.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the consent of the House to report a bill from the Committee on Claims—a Senate bill—and I will briefly state to the House the reasons why I wish to report it. It is a case of some urgency. It is a bill proposing to relieve Purser Speiden, who served under Commodore Stockton and Commodore Shubrick, in the capacity of purser, paymaster, commissary, and quartermaster, while they were operating in the Pacific. In the performance of these duties, which were arduous, it is alleged that he incurred considerable extra expense, and that he sustained some loss by receiving, inadvertently, counterfeit money. His case has been submitted to the proper Department, and they have decided that it does not come within the act of the 3d of March, 1849, allowing compensation to those persons collecting military contributions and disbursing them during the Mexican war. He is, therefore, under the necessity of applying to Congress. The Senate have passed the bill, and it has passed the Committee on Claims without a dissenting voice. My object is to put the bill upon its passage, that Purser Speiden may attend to it in person before he goes upon the Japan expedition. He is likely to be gone several years, and the case cannot be so well adjusted in his absence as in his presence.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio, objected.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. DANIEL. The amount of the claim is about $4,000.

The question was then put upon Mr. DANIEL's motion, and upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 38.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back Senate bill No. 217, for the relief of William Spelden, with sundry amendments.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does that bill make an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. DANIEL. I suppose we are acting under a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The bill cannot be passed unless the rule requiring its commitment is suspended.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to suspend the rules so that the bill may be put upon its passage.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Can that be done without unanimous consent? Can it be done by two thirds of the House?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by two thirds. Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion. I think it is a very dangerous practice to suspend that rule.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. DANIEL demanded tellers; which were ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DANIEL's motion, and it was decided in the negative.

So the rules were not suspended.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill of the House of Representatives No. 87, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1853, and the Senate amendments thereto; also, the bill of the House of Representatives No. 196, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1853, and for other purposes; also, the bill of the House of Representatives No. 220, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1853; also, the bill of the House of Representatives No. 240, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1853; also, the bill of the House of Representatives No. 241, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1853, and for other purposes; also, the bill of the House of Representatives No. 242, making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers, and otherwise, for the year ending June 30, 1853, be severally made the special order of the day for Wednesday next at one hour after the meeting of the House, to be considered in the order above named; and that they continue the special order of the day one hour after the meeting of the House from day to day, and for every day thereafter, Fridays and Saturdays excepted, until the said bills shall be finally disposed of.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, objected.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move to suspend the rules. I have given two days for finishing the river and harbor bill, which is now before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I will say to the gentleman that no person is to be blamed, because that bill is not already finished. The committee have proceeded to discuss it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask a suspension of the rules; and I think there is plenty of time to get through that bill by Wednesday.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to propound a question to the Chair. I desire to know whether the adoption of that resolution will interfere with the regular five minutes discussion of the river and harbor bill? I desire to know whether that bill must give way to these appropriation bills if we adopt that resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will give place if the river and harbor bill is not disposed of by Wednesday.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. If I can I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and ask that the vote may be taken by tellers.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLEVELAND objected.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I wish to know, if that resolution passes, whether it will deprive the committees from reporting during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will not. It does not propose to interfere with the morning hour.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion, and there were—yeas 72, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Bocoek, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Cas- kie, Chastain, Churchill, Cleveland, Clingman, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Dunham, Edmundson, Faulkner, Ficklin, Hamilton, Isam G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Houston, Howard, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, McMullin, McNair, Millson, Molony, Murphy, Nabers, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Perkins, Phelps, Polk, Price, Robinson, Ross, Skelton, Smith, Snow, Thaddeus Stevens, Stratton, Thurston, Wallace, Watkins, Wilcox, and Wildrick—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Babcock, Barrere, Bell, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, Cobb, Conger, George T. Davis, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Harper, Haws, Haven, Hebard, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, John Johnson, George G. King, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Miller, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Pennington, Porter, Rantoul, Robbins, Robie, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Seudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Ward, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, and Yates—77.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rule was not suspended.

CLERKS' SALARIES.

Mr. WELCH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That John A. Parker, John Hunnicut, and M. Martin be allowed the same compensation as assistant clerks of the House—that is to say $1,500 per annum each, for the present session of Congress.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio, objected.

Mr. WELCH. Then I move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman how many clerks are now employed by the Clerk of this House, and what is their compensation?

Mr. WELCH. I am not able to answer the gentleman's question. The other members of the committee are absent, and I was not present when this resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I would ask if this resolution does not propose to increase the compensation of the messengers in that office so as to make it the same as the clerks?

Mr. WELCH. The resolution is to allow Mr. Martin, Mr. Hunnicut, and Mr. Parker the same pay that the officers who performed the same duties during last Congress received. So I understand it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Include them all.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask if they were not appointed as messengers?

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I have an amendment to offer, to which I do not think the gentleman will object.

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order.

The question was then taken upon Mr. WELCH's motion, and it was decided in the negative.

So the rules were not suspended.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 282, making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose, there were two questions pending—an amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] making an appropriation for the Tennessee river; and an amendment to that amendment, offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] making an appropriation for the James river; and upon the latter question tellers had been ordered.

Mr. MEADE. Is it competent for me to withdraw the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARD. I object.

Mr. MEADE. I desire to withdraw it, with a view of offering it again hereafter, when I shall present some additional facts to the committee.

Mr. WARD. If that is the gentleman's purpose, I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. MEADE then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut, moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Also, for the improvement of the harbor of Bridgeport, Connecticut, $6,000; also, for the improvement of the harbor of Norwalk, Connecticut, $6,000.

Mr. S. said: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to vote for a river and harbor bill properly framed, and my impressions were in favor of this bill when it was first presented; but on examination, the details seem to me to be open to considerable exception. It is true that the bill is less monstrous than some of its predecessors, and the committee are entitled to great credit in having given us a bill which in point of extent and amount may be regarded as moderate and reasonable. But it strikes me that the principles are erroneous upon which the committee have distributed their appropriations. There are two methods, entirely distinct the one from the other, upon which such a bill may be framed: 1st, such works only may be embraced as are clearly of general interest to the commerce of the country—works which stand out prominently as of common necessity for the Union—works to which State authority is manifestly and wholly incompetent, and which are by necessity thrown upon the care and patronage of the General Government. Of this character are the improvements of the navigation of the Mississippi and its great tributaries. A dozen States are interested in this navigation; no one State has the necessary jurisdiction to make improvements. No one State can be singled out and called upon to expend her money in improving a navigation in which a dozen other States have an equal interest, and from which improvements, if made, the other States will derive an equal benefit.

Of this character are also certain improvements of harbors on the great lakes;—harbors which are sought to be improved, not for the local benefit of the harbor itself, but to furnish a safe shelter to the commerce of whatever State may need a retreat from the storm.

Of this character are also certain improvements on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Delaware breakwater, for instance, in which the commerce, not only of these States, but of the world also, is interested.

The naval defense of the country may also require attention to some of the lake and ocean harbors.

One mode, then, of framing a river and harbor bill is, to select only these great objects, and to carry such a bill the appeal would be to our feelings as American citizens, and to no local considerations; to our pride and patriotism, not to our selfishness. Such a bill would be separated by an immeasurable distance from mere works of internal improvement, and would have to contend with no constitutional scruples. Such a bill, sir, the committee have not, in my judgment, given us. When we come to read the bill section by section, we shall find, I think, that objects are embraced which cannot be regarded as of common interest and national importance, in the sense I have been speaking of.

The other principle and mode of framing a bill is, to make it an omnibus, and to patronize some small improvement in every State, and in almost every Congressional district. Such a bill may crawl through the House like the animal called a milledip, I believe, for it will find a motive power in every part of the body. I do not say that such is the character of the bill we have; a few States are wholly omitted in the bill; but if the local interests of one hundred Congressional districts are served, that will be sufficient to secure its passage, especially if those who draw blanks this year are promised compensatory prizes in the next bill. Believing, then, that this bill is framed upon the principle of attempting a distribution of favors, I have submitted my amendment, and in its behalf, I appeal to the sense of justice of the House. The bill appropriates $1,500,000, of which $6,000 is for removing a rock in New Haven harbor, and that is all which the bill gives to Connecticut. The population of the State is, to that of the Union, as three hundred and twenty-four. This bill gives us in the proportion of six to fifteen hundred. The just share of the State in an appropriation of $1,500,000, is $28,000, instead of $6,000, and the amendment, if adopted, will still fail to do us justice.

The harbors of Bridgeport and Norwalk were presented to the consideration of the Committee on Commerce, accompanied with careful surveys and estimates, and with favorable reports, from the Topographical Bureau; and the improvements are vastly more national than most of the objects embraced in the bill. The committee having rejected the applications, my only remedy is now by this appeal to the House.

Both Bridgeport and Norwalk are important and growing places, with a rapidly-increasing trade, foreign and domestic. Important railroads terminate at both their harbors, one of which, at Norwalk, has been completed within the last year.

In reply to my complaint, that by this bill Connecticut fails to receive her fair proportion, I was told by my friend, the honorable chairman of the committee, that Bridgeport may receive something under a general appropriation, included in the bill for contingencies upon the Atlantic coast. But the interest of Bridgeport in that fund is too small and too contingent to be of any account.

If the amendment which I have proposed be adopted, one serious objection to the bill will be removed. It will, indeed, still be an omnibus bill, and will embrace many improvements which strike me as being rather local than national. But the bill by this amendment, and a few others of like character, will be rendered more just and equal than it now is. But if this amendment shall be rejected, one method of rendering the bill national is still open—that is, to strike out all the appropriations that are merely local, and thereby essentially reduce the total amount of the appropriations. In this way, perhaps, the bill can be rendered acceptable by confining it to those important objects which cannot be effected by State authority, and which must either be wholly neglected and abandoned, or be prosecuted by the General Government. For such appropriations I desire to cast my vote. It is of no importance whether the money is to be expended on the Atlantic or Pacific, on the Lakes or on the Gulf of Mexico. My interest in such appropriations is not local nor sectional, but is American. It belongs to me as a citizen of the United States, and not as a citizen of any particular State. But if the bill remains unmodified, and I am compelled to vote upon it as it now stands, although it contains several appropriations which I would gladly vote for, yet, as a whole, my vote must be against it. If the harbors of Connecticut are excluded, and other harbors, of no greater claims or merits, are provided for, I shall be wanting to my duty as an humble representative of my constituents if I should fail to protest and vote against the measure.

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut. This bill is entitled "A bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers." A large amount of the appropriations are for works entirely within the jurisdictions of the several States, and over which the State governments have exclusive jurisdiction. It is, therefore, a bill establishing a system of internal improvement within the States of this Union, and that, too, without the consent of either of said States. We were told the other day by a member of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. WALSH,] that the committee reported this bill under the constitutional power of Congress to "regulate commerce;" and yet, strange to say, there is not a single regulation of commerce in the whole bill. Not one, sir. The Secretary of War is armed with the arbitrary power of expending nearly a million and a half of dollars on seventy-three specified works. Not a word is said about commerce or navigation—not a single "regulation" prescribed. What is meant by the constitutional power to "regulate commerce?" In order to be exact, I will read from Story on the Constitution, vol. 2, sec. 1061:

"In the first place, then, what is the constitutional meaning of the words to 'regulate commerce?' for the Constitution being one (as has been aptly said) of enumeration, and not of definition, it becomes necessary, in order to ascertain the extent of the power, to ascertain the meaning of the words. The power is to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. The subject to be regulated is commerce. Is that limited to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities? Or does it comprehend navigation and intercourse?"

"Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic; but it is something more. It is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches; and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse."

Here is the law and the commentary. Not a word is said about appropriating money for improvements, either external or internal. Not a word is intimated about building or improving harbors or rivers; nor do the terms of the Constitution admit of any such construction.

The whole power granted is "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Now, if we can improve rivers and harbors within "the several States," under this grant of power, we can also improve rivers and harbors within the jurisdiction of "foreign nations." The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations is as broad as the power to regulate commerce among the several States. They are identically the same; and is any man so crazy as to admit the power to build harbors and improve rivers and harbors throughout Europe, Asia, and Africa, or that such power was intended to be given to Congress? Again, the power to regulate commerce with the "Indian tribes" is identically the same as that to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; yet it is well known that the Indian tribes of the United States have no rivers or harbors to improve; they have never engaged in navigation at all. We have always denied them any title either to land or water. We have treated them as mere tenants at will, with the right to hunt and fish until we choose to drive them away by force, or coax them away by small donations of gewgaws and money.

If, then, it be impossible, under this clause of the Constitution, to improve rivers and harbors, either "with the Indian tribes," or in "foreign nations," it is equally out of our power to do the same thing within the several States of this Union.

By what rule of interpretation is it that the word "commerce" is construed by the learned Committee on Commerce to mean both rivers and harbors? We have always been taught that a river was a large stream of water flowing in a channel; that a harbor, in the commercial sense, was a port, or haven, for ships; a bay, or inlet of the sea, in which ships can moor and be sheltered from the fury of the winds and a heavy sea; any navigable water, where ships can ride in safety; that commerce was a mutual change of goods, wares, productions, or property of any kind, between nations or individuals, either by barter or by purchase and sale; trade; traffic. The words are totally dissimilar in meaning; and yet, the committee tell us they all mean the same thing; in short, that the commerce of the present day is the philosopher's stone of a past age.

The legal rule for the interpretation of words is, that they shall be taken in their ordinary import—as they are generally received in the community where the law was made and is to operate. By this rule we have seen that commerce means one thing, rivers another, and harbors a third; yet the committee tell us to improve rivers and harbors is to regulate commerce among the States.

The world have generally supposed that commerce was one thing, and the means or mode of carrying on commerce was another; they have generally supposed that rivers and harbors, wagon roads, and railroads, were public highways, over which commerce was conducted, and its transmission regulated—that these agents were merely instruments in the hands of the "common carriers" of the country who transport the articles of commerce. If this is all a mistake, and rivers and harbors are in fact a part of commerce itself, then wagon roads and railroads, with all their paraphernalia, are also parts of commerce, and we can build wagon roads and railroads, road wagons, railroad cars, and steamboats, under the power of regulating commerce. They are all a part of the same system. In fact, railroads are fast superseding rivers and harbors in the carrying trade—they carry with more rapidity and more safety, and are, therefore, better inland instruments of commerce. Why, then, have the committee neglected this all-important branch of commerce? Why are no appropriations made for wagon roads and railroads? We need such roads in Mis-issippi and Louisiana, and a million and a half of dollars would help the railroad commerce very much indeed. We have now eleven thousand miles of railroads engaged in commerce. The committee might easily have appropriated as much per mile to the railroads as they have per mile to the navigable rivers. Why not make the appropriations uniform? Why protect one branch of commerce and totally neglect the other? Sir, this forced and unnatural interpretation of the Constitution would enable Congress, with equal propriety, to engage in all the branches of commerce, to the exclusion of the people of the States. It is admitted, that where Congress has jurisdiction, that jurisdiction is exclusive of all others. If the construction of harbors and the improvement of rivers be regulations of commerce, to build steamboats, steamships, and sail vessels, are still more legitimate regulations, and then to engage in the carrying trade follows as a natural result of the other assumptions of power. Thus, under a mere power to prescribe uniform rules for conducting our foreign and domestic commerce, Congress becomes an absolute despotism, monopolizing the entire commerce of the country, foreign and domestic, and driving all competitors from our waters.

A conclusion so monstrous, so utterly at war with all the principles of our confederated Republic, should cover with shame and confusion the advocates of such a construction of plain language which conveys but a single meaning.

Again, sir, if to improve the highways over which commerce is transported be to regulate commerce, as the committee contend, then all the overseers of roads and road-makers, and all the Irish and German emigrants laboring on the railroads of the United States are actively engaged in "regulating commerce among the States." They are doing that which the Constitution has confided alone to Congress. Their acts are therefore unconstitutional and void, and the Committee on Commerce should sally out and work the roads themselves by way of executing their constitutional power to regulate commerce.

But, sir, if to improve harbors be to regulate commerce in the United States, this bill violates the Constitution in another particular. Several of the ports of the United States are not included in the bill, and the Constitution declares that "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce to the ports of one State over those of another." This bill gives a preference to the ports of New York over the ports of several other States.

This clause of the Constitution should satisfy the committee that they are wrong in the interpretation they have given to the power to regulate commerce. It is wholly impossible to improve all the ports of the United States alike. Some require large expenditures of money, while others are perfect by nature and require none at all. But if the regulation of commerce be simply to prescribe rules by which commerce and navigation is to be conducted, one set of rules will apply to all the ports in the Union; and hence no preference would be given to any port by such regulations; and such is clearly the intent of the framers of the Constitution.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. WARD offered the following as an amendment to the amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Cumberland river, $50,000.

Mr. W. said: Mr. Chairman, I do not design to make many observations with reference to the propriety of this amendment. I do not doubt the power of Congress to make these appropriations, and not only that, but I believe it is the absolute duty of Congress so to do. The stream to which I propose this appropriation is one of more magnitude than is ordinarily attributed to it. It is one of those streams that are by the ordinance of 1787, and by the Constitution, taken peculiarly under the control of Congress itself. It is a stream that the States have no jurisdiction over, because it is navigable to all the States of the Union. It is a stream upon the bosom of which floats an annual trade of from five to ten millions of dollars—embracing a trade through the better part of Kentucky and the better part of Tennessee. The national character of this stream was demonstrated by an appropriation made in 1832, during General Jackson's administration, and also by appropriations made in 1834-'5-'6-'7 and '8. After that, from some cause unknown to me, no appropriation has been made for that stream. It is a national stream, and one in which my State and the district which I represent, are particularly interested.

I do hope that if we are going to exercise that power which Congress has all along exercised, of improving the highways and rivers of our country, that a portion of that power should be exercised for the benefit of this improvement. The amount is not more than the magnitude of the interests involved in the trade of that river demand. And why was it left out? I do not mean to say that the committee have done wrong in leaving it out, but that stream is entitled to the fostering care of this Government, and I hope and trust that those of this committee who are disposed to exercise that care over our streams, will exercise it, and extend it over that stream which my constituents are particularly interested in. I do not see why it is that this Government, so anxious to extend its power for the purpose of protecting its external commerce, is not as anxious to extend the same power for the protection and extension of its internal commerce. Have we the power to expend from nine to sixteen million dollars annually to protect our commerce with foreign nations, and have it not to protect that commerce in which our citizens only are concerned? That is not my construction of the powers of the Government. If you do exercise this power, as you annually do, for the protection of our foreign commerce, how much greater is the necessity for its exercise for the protection of our internal commerce? We are then promoting our own interests exclusively; while in protecting our foreign commerce, we are protecting the interests of foreigners, as well as our own.

Mr. ROBINSON. I regret exceedingly that I have been so indisposed for several days past as to have been prevented from participating in this debate. It was my intention, if I had been in my seat when the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce reported this bill, to have objected to its introduction. The committee will recollect that gentleman and myself had some conflict at the commencement of the session as to the respective jurisdictions of our committees—the Committee on Commerce and Roads and Canals—over the subject of rivers and harbors. They will also recollect that the House took several votes, and decided, by a thirty majority, that the Committee on Commerce had no jurisdiction over the rivers. Yet in defiance of that vote that committee have seen proper to report here a bill embracing all the rivers, after the Committee on Roads and Canals, of which I am a member, had submitted separate appropriations for each of the rivers.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot yield.

Mr. SEYMOUR. But I wish to correct what I believe to be a misapprehension of the action of the House. I do not understand that any such vote has been taken.

Mr. ROBINSON. There was more than one vote taken upon the subject.

Mr. KING, of New York. I rise to a point of order. The gentlemen cannot discuss this question upon the amendment which has been offered to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am opposed both to the amendment and the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the major proposition contains the minor, and declines to rule the gentleman out of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I intend to vote against the amendment and against the bill, and I am giving reasons why I shall give those votes. I am opposed to omnibus bills of whatever character or however you may get them up. I am opposed to congregating together a mass of appropriations. There are appropriations in this bill for which I would vote had I the opportunity, but I wish to place myself upon the record by stating to this committee, and through them to the country, that very early in the session, I introduced, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, bills which were placed upon the Calendar, for the improvement of the Arkansas river, the Ohio above the falls, the Mississippi, and a bill for the improvement of Rock Island rapids, referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] They are upon the Calendar, and very much in advance of the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York. They ought to have been taken up in their order, and passed according to their merits. But instead of that, the House has seen fit to overslaugh these bills entirely. The Committee on Commerce has seen proper to assert its jurisdiction and take these matters into its own hands. I hope not only upon this account, but on account of the public interest, this bill will be defeated, as the last one was the last session of Congress. I consider it no better than that of the last session—not a whit better. When gentlemen remarked to me that they had taken up our western bill, I had some curiosity to know what that "western bill" was, and I found it was the river and harbor bill. Now, if gentlemen will look into this bill, they will find that instead of being a western bill, it is a northeastern, Atlantic, and northern lake bill. The great West have very little share in it. Sir, I call the attention of this committee to the fact, that the great West had no representative on the committee which framed this bill.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. What does the gentleman mean by the great West? Where is the geographical distinction? I should like to know the boundaries?

Mr. ROBINSON. I mean the Mississippi valley. There is very little of the great Mississippi valley interested in this bill. It is a partial bill.

Mr. FULLER. It gets $400,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill, it is true, appropriates $260,000 to the Mississippi river and its tributaries, but it does not provide how much shall be expended upon any one river. If it passes, the War Department may send out an engineer who may appropriate every dollar upon a single mile upon one of its tributaries, or upon the main branch. He can do with it what he pleases, either to expend it all in building a wing dam or in changing the channel in a single place. I think much the most sensible plan is, as indicated in my bill, to build boats for pulling snags out of the natural channel. If I had time to enter into the merits of this bill, I could show that it was susceptible of greater and more corrupt abuses than any other bill that can find its way through Congress. There is no sort of restraint upon the Government officers.

Mr. FULLER. Is not the same power given with reference to the Atlantic appropriations?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not argue that question. It is wrong in reference to the Atlantic appropriations, as well as the others, to give the money into the hands of the Government officers without any check whatever—without telling them how it is to be expended, or where the appropriation is to be made.

Mr. WARD demanded tellers upon the amendment to the amendment, but they were not ordered.

The question was then put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. In my former remarks of this morning I disputed the power of Congress to make internal improvements under the power to "regulate commerce," but I do not deny the power of Congress, under other grants of the Constitution, to improve such rivers and harbors as are strictly national highways, and not exclusively within the jurisdiction of a State. Congress may regulate the commerce of rivers within the jurisdiction of a State, but cannot interfere with the right of a State to construct improvements by removing obstructions, erecting wharves, locks, dams, or even turning the channels of rivers. A State may levy tolls on vessels navigating such improved rivers or harbors: but the Constitution expressly forbids any State to levy any duty of tonnage, or any impost or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, and even such duties are for the use of the United States, and subject to the revision of Congress. These and the like regulations of commerce are reserved exclusively to Congress, and lend additional force to the conclusion that the improvement of rivers and harbors are not regulations of commerce.

All oceans, bays, gulfs, harbors, rivers, and lakes not entirely within the territorial jurisdiction of a State are national highways, and liable to be improved by authority of Congress. No State can assume the power to improve such waters, because they are the common property of all the States. They cannot be improved by a combination of States, because the Constitution declares that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State."

The Mississippi river is an illustration of this principle. It has its source near the boundary between the United States and the British possessions; it passes through the commercial as well as the geographical heart of the Union, and finally empties into the Gulf of Mexico. Bordering on the west bank of the river are the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, and the Territory of Minnesota; on the east bank are Wisconsin, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi—making two continuous tiers of States, spanning the entire Union from British America to the Gulf of Mexico. All the great rivers that flow from the Rocky Mountains, through Nebraska, the Indian Territory, and upper Texas—the Missouri, the Platte, the Arkansas, the Canadian, and the Red rivers, with their numerous navigable branches—empty into the Mississippi. On the east side are several rivers in Wisconsin and Illinois, the Ohio and its tributaries, including the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, and minor streams from the State of Mississippi—making fifteen States and Territories in the richest and most productive portion of the habitable globe, whose commerce naturally flows into the channel of the Mississippi river. If such a river be not a national highway for the United States, then the Atlantic ocean is not. The border of the Atlantic coast, from the State of Mississippi to the British line, has Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine—being fourteen States. Add Pennsylvania and Vermont, which are not immediately on the coast, and there would be sixteen States. But the western part of Pennsylvania has a large commerce on the Ohio, and thence down the Mississippi river. So that the commerce of the Mississippi river arises from as many States and Territories as border the Atlantic coast from Maine to the Mississippi line, thereby making the Mississippi river as much a national highway for all the purposes of commerce and national defense as the Atlantic ocean itself. No single State has the sole right to improve this river. The Constitution forbids all the States from making compacts or agreements with one another, and therefore the Mississippi cannot be improved by a combination of a part or all of the fifteen States and Territories immediately interested in its navigation.

The same is the case with regard to the great lakes and connecting rivers that separate us from British America. Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, all border upon this chain of inland seas. No single State can claim their exclusive jurisdiction. If, then, no single State can improve these waters, and no combination of States can be made for that purpose, it follows, as an irresistible conclusion, that the power rests in the United States. But, independent of this argument, there are other grants in the Constitution which throw upon the Federal Government the onus of improving the navigation of the class of waters named.

Congress is authorized "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." "To provide and maintain a Navy." "To raise and support armies." "To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." "To establish post roads," and under the war power, military roads.

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union, a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence;" and "may make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Under the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, &c., the policy of the Government has been, and now is, to raise a sufficient revenue by duties upon imports. The revenue of the country depends, in a great measure, upon our commerce with foreign nations. It is, therefore, the right and the duty of Congress to regulate, encourage, and protect this foreign commerce as the source of our national revenue. We regulate this commerce in part by treaty stipulations with foreign nations, and in part by passing laws imposing a tariff on imports and declaring all the regulations, rights, duties, and burdens of persons and vessels engaged in commerce and navigation. In order to collect the revenue arising from this commerce, we establish ports of entry and custom-houses, and appoint officers to make the collections. We encourage and protect this source of revenue from disaster at sea by the improvement of the external channels of navigation in all the various modes; the erection of buoys, light-houses, &c. We protect this source of revenue from the assaults of foreign nations and from piracy, by the power of our Navy, which is required to float wherever the "star-spangled banner" is unfurled to a breeze. To render the Navy secure from the disasters of the sea, navigation must be improved, as well for purposes of national defense as for national revenue. Hence it follows, that in all the waters where this foreign commerce floats, and in all the harbors and ports where this commerce terminates and the revenue is collected, the Federal Government has the right to make the necessary improvements.

It may be said that this rule does not apply to the Upper Mississippi, where no foreign commerce floats and no revenue is collected. At points where this objection exists and navigation is obstructed, Congress may in its discretion improve the navigation for other national purposes. This river is now used as a national post road for the transmission of the mails, and as a national military road for the transmission of naval and military armaments; and under the power to establish post roads and to protect the fifteen States and Territories on the line of this river in the enjoyment of a Republican form of Government and from invasions, rebellions, and insurrections, Congress may make such improvements as will "in peace prepare for war," and thus enable the Federal Government to give all the great States in the valley of the Mississippi the same facilities for protection that is given to the States upon the sea-board.

It will be observed that all the navigable waters I propose to improve are upon the external boundaries of the States, or so connected with our foreign commerce, the national revenue, or national defence, as to place them exclusively under the jurisdiction of Congress for these purposes. My position is, therefore, strictly within the rule of the Democratic party, against a system of internal improvements within the jurisdiction of the States. President Polk, in his veto of a similar bill to this, remarks:

"The Constitution has not, in my judgment, conferred upon the Federal Government the power to construct works of internal improvement within the States, or to appropriate money from the Treasury for that purpose."

General Jackson, in one of his messages to Congress on this subject, sent in the following classifications of navigable waters, subject, in his opinion, to be improved by the authority of Congress:

"1st. Improvements of harbors on the sea-board.

"2d. The removal of partial and temporary obstructions in a river already navigable, lying between a port of entry established by law, on said river, and another such port on the ocean.

"3d. The improvement of the harbors on such rivers, and within such places, or on the great lakes, which are themselves directly traversed by vessels engaged in our foreign commerce."

This varies but little from the rule I have laid down in the foregoing argument.

Both the Whig and Democratic parties, in their Baltimore platforms, agree that Congress has the power to make improvements of a national character; but there seems to be a great diversity of opinion alike among Whigs and Democrats as to what class of improvements are really national. Being a strict constructionist—a State-Rights man—a Union Democrat—I have sought, for my own gratification, to deduce the true rule to govern this important branch of public policy from the Constitution itself. If I have failed, it is to be attributed to my weakness, and not to any fault of the Constitution.

The bill under consideration contains several legitimate appropriations, but many more that are objectionable as merely local improvements in the interior of States. The objections of President Polk to a former river and harbor bill, and for which he vetoed the same, apply still more forcibly to this bill than to that. Besides, the Secretary of War has the unrestricted power to spend the money appropriated as his will may direct. His personal attention to fifty-seven distinct improvements, scattered in remote parts of the Union, cannot be expected, and is not required by the bill. The Committee on Commerce have made no report to this House as to the necessity of any one of the proposed improvements. The Committee may be well informed on the subject, but they have taken good care to keep their information to themselves. The House and the country are wholly uninformed by the committee, not only as to the existing necessity for the expenditures proposed, but also as to the amount of money each improvement will require, the character of the improvements to be made, and the time to be consumed in their completion.

In short, the bill looks like a series of donations, amounting to a million and a half of dollars, to the common carriers of the country, to be doled out by the Secretary of War, who is required to give no bond for the faithful application of the money, and has no instructions as to the character of the works to be constructed. In the valley of the Mississippi, the places to be improved are not even named. Hunters after fat jobs will beset the Secretary with their schemes and proposals, not to make improvements but to make money; and if this million and a half of dollars does not prove to be a political corruption fund, a Federal pipe-laying scheme, it will be because the Secretary of War is a man of immaculate purity, patriotism, and sagacity, and not because the Committee on Commerce have guarded the appropriations with any statesmanlike precautions against it. The friends of the bill seem resolved that it shall not be amended. They may have the power to pass it, and we have neither a Jackson, or a Polk to strangle the Briarean monster with a veto; but it will do its friends no honor, and the country no good.

Mr. DISNEY. I rise to make a suggestion with regard to the mode of procedure on this bill. I submit to the Chair, and to the committee, that it will be more symmetrical, and will better facilitate the action of the committee with regard to this bill, if the Chair will rule, and the committee will sustain that ruling, that gentlemen shall withhold their amendments until we arrive at the section of the bill to which they appropriately belong. If amendments for localities in every section of the country are offered to the first section of the bill, the debate will be interminable.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I ask whether the gentleman is in order?

Mr. MEADE. Virginia has no locality in the bill.

Mr. DISNEY. You can, then, offer your amendments at the end of the bill.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. COBB demanded tellers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a question of order. I submit whether it is not too late to offer that amendment after the question on the original amendment has been submitted to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that, as the vote has not been consummated, it is in order to submit an amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. The House was in the very act of dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is in order, after a vote has been taken upon one side only, to propose an amendment, and to discuss the proposition contained in it. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is in order. From that decision the gentleman from Indiana takes an appeal.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I have a right to state my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated the question, and debate is not in order.

The question then being, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? Mr. DUNHAM asked for a division of the House.

The House was divided, and there were—ayes 65, noes not counted; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS and FULLER appointed; and, the question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment I have offered.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And also for the survey of the Flint and Chattahoochee rivers, in the State of Georgia, with a view of improving the navigation thereof, $25,000.

Mr. J. said: It has been objected to certain proposed amendments to this bill, that they ought not to be ingrafted upon it, for the reason that no estimates have been forwarded to us by the proper Department. I believe that has been urged against the proposed appropriation to the James river, in the State of Virginia; and similar objections have been urged to other streams named—for instance, the Tennessee and Yazoo rivers. I propose, in this case, to obviate that objection so far as the two rivers embraced in my amendment are concerned, by asking an appropriation from this body to make a survey for the purpose of ascertaining what improvements can be made in the navigation of those streams. The Flint river is almost entirely within the State of Georgia, but still it is navigable and connected with foreign commerce. It penetrates a rich and fertile country, producing a large amount of cotton.

The Chattahoochee river forms for several hundred miles the boundary between the States of Georgia and Alabama, and is navigable at certain portions of the year, and at other times is not. That is the case with each of those streams. After forming a junction with the Flint river, it constitutes the Appalachian river. From those two rivers, and from the Appalachian, there is exported annually to foreign countries, cotton to the value of about $10,000,000. This amount of produce is exported upon the bosom of the waters of those two rivers. They are objects of national concern. They are connected with our national trade and national interest, as much so as the North river, or the Illinois, or the Mississippi, or Ohio rivers. There are obstructions in the rivers which an appropriation of money can remove.

But it is objected, that Virginia is not to receive anything, that Georgia is not to receive anything, and that Alabama is not to receive anything. Why? Not because their proposed improvements are not of a national character, but because their Representatives upon this floor entertain doubts as to the constitutional power of this body to make such improvements, and because they believe in the impolicy of exercising it, if the power existed.

I understand that the ground upon which this bill is based, and the ground upon which it is to receive public favor, in the minds of gentlemen upon this floor is, that the objects are national in their benefits. Here, then, sir, is a national object. Make, then, an appropriation for it.

I am free to say, as an individual, and I believe I represent the views and feelings of the people of my State, that I do not believe Congress has the constitutional power to make these appropriations; and if it has the power that it is impolitic to exercise it; but for that reason are my constituents and my people to be deprived of the benefits of these appropriations?

I ask gentlemen, when they look to the political sentiments and political views of individuals, that they will not confine their vision to the South, and to our constitutional notions. Let them look, also, a little to the constitutional notions of the people upon Lake Erie, at Sandusky, and at Cleveland—to the notions of the people at Chicago and Ashtabula. If men's notions are to control appropriations, let those men who have constitutional notions such as those referred to, not have the benefits of this Government aid.

I am free, sir, to state, that if these amendments are ingrafted upon this bill, I will not even then vote for it. But if there is to be a distribution of the spoils, contrary to the policy of the Government, I ask for the people of my section of the country that they shall share in that distribution, and that our notions of the power of the Government, and the policy of its exercise, shall not govern the action of this body, and that national views and national benefits shall control its action.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I rise to make a single remark upon a single point. As a member of the Committee on Commerce, sir, I say it is very painful to my feelings to hear gentlemen charge upon that committee that they were influenced in selecting any of the places which they have recommended for appropriations from any political consideration whatever. So far as concerns myself and my associates upon that committee, I do not believe that that idea ever entered their minds in the remotest sense. The disposition of that committee was to do justice to all sections of the country; and as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Johnson] refers to the sentiments and notions entertained in particular sections of the country upon political and constitutional questions, I refer him to the mouth of the Savannah; I refer him to the harbor of Charleston; I refer him to Mobile, and to the mouth of the Mississippi, all of which have been provided for. And why will gentlemen persist in charging that this committee was influenced by sinister considerations in reference to one part of the Union over another? If I believe, sir, I am incapable of any action whatever, it is an action of that kind, arising from such motives.

I hope that gentlemen who have objections to this bill, will put them upon grounds that will not impugn the motives of the committee.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I propose to amend the amendment by inserting "for the improvement of the navigation of the Cumberland river, $45,000."

Being a friend, practically and theoretically, to internal improvements, I wish to suggest to those who framed this bill that if any interests have been neglected that ought to have been embraced in this bill, good policy would require that they should listen to the complaints of those whose interests have been neglected.

As I have before remarked, Mr. Chairman, I am friendly to the exercise of the power of voting appropriations for internal improvement, and believe it to be the duty of the General Government to exercise the power to clear out all navigable streams of a national character. And when my particular portion of the community, who are directly interested, appeal to those who have this power under their guardianship, and that appeal is disregarded, I cannot say how far that may influence my final action in reference to this particular bill. If the object for which I now appeal be not in its character national, if it deserves not the consideration of this House, I desire not its action. But that this is a national stream, I appeal to the action of this House in 1832, '4, '5, '6, '7 and '8, during the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. That it is one of magnitude, so far as commerce upon it is concerned, I appeal to the fact that there is a trade upon it, amounting to between five and ten millions of dollars annually. Since 1838, nothing has been done for us. We now appeal to this House, who seem disposed to recommence this system of internal improvement. We ask you to make an appropriation for a stream which eminently demands it. We ask you in behalf of those who are in favor of carrying the beneficent action of the General Government into operation, so far as the interests of the community demand it. Are we to be unheard, and is our appeal to be disregarded? We are a part and parcel of that great valley of the Mississippi, which has already been too long neglected by the General Government. Although we may not be as numerous as those who live upon the lake shores, our interests are as dear to us as theirs. We desire—we demand—not as a favor, but as a matter of right, that something shall be done for this stream, which is clearly and undeniably a national one. It flows through the two States of Tennessee and Kentucky, a portion of the community which has ever responded to any and every call made upon its gallantry. We have done our duty to this Government, and we now ask in return that it will do its duty towards us. In 1838 she did it. Whether or not there has been any particular application made to the committee for an appropriation to this river I do not know; but there are many things the committee have not done that justice to the community would require. I do not impugn their motives. I believe that they did the best they could, under the circumstances, and what they thought was right; but there are interests which have been neglected in this bill. Many members of the House are opposed to the principle of internal improvements. There are others in favor of the exercise of the power by the General Government, like myself, who may vote for this bill if properly amended, when it is important for us to vote upon its final passage; but it is but bad policy for the friends of the bill to oppose honest efforts made to perfect the bill by necessary amendments. I hope and trust, as this is not more than the interests of the stream demand, as it is a national stream, that the committee will vote in the amendment I have submitted, and unite the friends of the system to carry the bill through, as nearly perfect as it is possible for such frail mortals as we are to make it.

Mr. McMULLIN. I shall oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WARD] for the same reason that I the other day opposed the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown.] I call the attention of the committee to the inquiry I shall propound. I desire to know of the Chair whether or not it be competent for me to move that the committee rise, with a view of moving in the House the reconsideration of the vote by which general discussion upon the merits of that bill was suspended?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order. A motion to rise and report the bill to the House cannot be entertained so long as amendments are pending.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire debate reopened upon this bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It cannot be done.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution terminating debate was adopted, was laid upon the table.

Mr. DISNEY. I suggest that the object sought to be obtained by the gentleman from Virginia, does not, of necessity, involve a motion of reconsideration. It is a provision of parliamentary law that the adoption of a new order rescinds an existing one. It therefore does not require a rescinding, pro forma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not intend to decide that question. The Chair only says that a motion for the committee to rise and report the bill cannot be entertained so long as amendments are pending in committee.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it competent for me to move that the committee rise?

The CHAIRMAN. It is competent for the gentleman to move that the committee rise, but should it rise, the bill is left in the committee. Does the gentleman submit the motion?

[Cries of "Oh no!" "Let us go on with the bill!"]

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I rise to a question of order. No member of the committee is entitled to the floor except for the purpose of debating an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is opposed to the amendment, and so long as he says nothing he is entitled to the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMULLIN. I do not think that the gentleman should have raised the question of order upon me. He will recollect Corporal Trim, whose silence was more eloquent than his speech, and I have no doubt my silence would suit the gentleman's views better than my speech. [Laughter.]

I concur fully and entirely in the views taken by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON], but dissent from the gentleman from Kentucky as to the power of the General Government. I assert, that I never have seen presented to the American Congress for its adoption a more sectional and partial bill of appropriations for internal improvements than the present one. I do not mean to impugn the motives of members of the committee; but it is sufficient for me to know—and I desire that the country shall know—that this bill is partial and sectional in its provisions. Will any gentleman of the committee deny that fact? If they do, I will only ask a reference to the bill itself to justify my assertion. There is no appropriation proposed for Virginia, although there are several streams national in their character flowing through her territory. Is not the noble James river a national stream? It is, all will admit; and yet there is no provision for its improvement. I will not charge that the Committee on Commerce have omitted appropriations for the "Old Dominion" because her delegation were rather too tight-laced to vote for a system of internal improvements. There are other national streams in Virginia besides the James river. There is the important stream of Holston, which runs through my district. It is a tributary of the Mississippi, and ought to be provided for; and before this bill is disposed of, it is my intention to submit an amendment for that purpose.

The question was then put upon Mr. WARD's amendment; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 35—

Mr. WARD. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and MOLONY were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 59.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

[Cries of "Recount!" "Recount!"]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, a recount will be had.

There was no objection, and the question was again put, and the amendment was lost—the tellers having reported—ayes 53, noes 73.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river above the falls at Louisville, $160,000.

The committee will recollect, that a few days ago, with a view to the prompt and speedy action of this House upon this bill, I resigned the privilege I had of speaking one hour. I should be very glad now to speak one hour, to show how deeply interested in the bill is the section of country from which I come, but I am so anxious now to have a vote upon this bill, and have it adopted or rejected, that I would sit down now, and not consume the five minutes' time to which I am entitled, if I thought by such course that I should induce speedy action. I desire speedy action upon the bill, in order to accommodate the coordinate branch of Congress, and give them something to do within a few days. We have been subjected to unmerited reproaches for not sending the Senate something to do. They overlooked the great fact that we sent them a bill of this House, which occupied us five or six weeks, distributing equitably sixty millions of acres of public lands, carrying out that great Whig policy which was devised some years ago, of distributing the proceeds of the public lands by voting to divide the lands equitably, instead of the proceeds, for internal improvements and education. We have sent them a bill of far more importance than any bill with which they have been favored this session, and it still lies on their table. Now I wish to speak to the amendment I propose.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman does not wish to spend time unnecessarily.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am obliged to my critical friend from the Bellefontaine district, [Mr. STANTON], but he is as much out of the way now as usual. I advocate the adoption of this amendment for several reasons. We have had no appropriation in fourteen years for the Ohio river, a stream of about one thousand miles in length, navigable for steamboats, and which bears upon its bosom a greater amount of commerce than any other river, in proportion to its length, in the United States. Last year the Committee on Commerce and this House did appropriate $80,000 for that river, but a Democratic Senate rejected it; and, in my opinion, a Democratic Senate will again reject this bill in any form in which you may send it to them. I think it is a good omen for this country, when so many of our Democratic friends in this committee are ready to consider as so much idle wind the resolution adopted by their late National Convention, in which they resolved "that the Constitution does not confer upon the General Government the power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvements."

Now I am for a general system and reasonable appropriations therefor, and not for a partial system of internal improvements. Every Democrat of any great distinction in this country has advocated a general system of internal improvements, from the days of Jefferson down to the present time. What do I see in a speech which lies before me? The honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. SEYMOUR], and other Democratic members, show that from the administration of Mr. Jefferson down to that of Mr. Tyler, there were appropriated hundreds of thousands, and millions of dollars, for objects similar to those contemplated in this bill; and even greater appropriations were made during General Jackson's administration—the very impersonation of Democracy. I quote the amounts from the chairman's speech:

"This construction of the Constitution, so clearly deducible from its language, has been for a long course of years so fully sustained and followed by the legislation of the country, under all political parties, that it is now approved and sanctioned by a large majority of the people. Recurring to past legislation, we find that from the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's administration to the end of Mr. Tyler's, there have been appropriated for the construction and repair of roads, and the improvement of rivers and harbors, $17,199,222. These appropriations were made as follows:

Under Mr. Jefferson .....	$48,400
" Mr. Madison .....	250,800
" Mr. Monroe .....	707,621
" Mr. J. Q. Adams .....	2,310,475
" General Jackson .....	10,582,882
" Mr. Van Buren .....	2,222,544
" Mr. Tyler .....	1,076,500

I rejoice to find that a portion of the Democratic party in this House are abandoning the resolution of their National Convention, introduced for a special purpose. The Whig resolution of their late National Convention, in this respect is liberal, and I will read it:

"6. The Constitution vests in Congress the power to open and repair harbors, and remove obstructions from navigable rivers; and it is expedient that Congress shall exercise that power whenever such improvements are necessary for the common defense or for the protection and facilities of commerce with foreign nations or among the States—such improvements being, in every instance, national and general in their character."

It acknowledges the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to improve rivers and harbors, and takes the ground that we are called upon by every consideration of duty, to make appropriations to improve our lake harbors, and particularly our great western rivers, as well as the harbors upon the Atlantic sea-coast. It has been my fortune to have passed over Lake Erie, within a few years, some half dozen times. Four times it has been my misfortune to have been on the lake in a storm, when for thirty-six hours we were endeavoring to get into a harbor of refuge, one of those formerly improved by the General Government, and when the lives of hundreds of passengers were endangered. Then I could have wished that some of the anti-internal improvement men in Congress could have been on board to have witnessed the necessity for these appropriations. Then they would have changed their tune, and I think they would have declared themselves in favor of the power of the General Government to build up a system of internal improvements, and improve our lake harbors, and navigable rivers.

Mr. MILLSON. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR.] I rise, however, not so much for the purpose of assailing it, as with the view of offering some observations in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman who introduced the amendment, from my honorable friend from Connecticut, [Mr. SEYMOUR], and from other gentlemen who participated in the debate this morning. They rely a good deal upon a distinction between what they call national and local improvements. Some gentlemen, too, who agree with me in their general views upon this bill, have intimated a willingness to vote for a bill making appropriations for works of a national character. These they suppose to be constitutional, but the others not so. I ask gentlemen whence is this distinction between improvements of a national and local character derived? Certainly not from the Constitution itself. What is a national improvement? What is meant by the phrase? Will they say that a national improvement is a constitutional one? That is only begging the question. It is reasoning in a circle. The improvement is national, because it is constitutional, and it is constitutional, because it is national. The distinction is altogether arbitrary and fantastic. If, however, national means general, as distinguished from local, then I agree with the honorable gentleman [Mr. TAYLOR] who has just taken his seat, that this system of internal improvements is condemned by the resolution of the Baltimore Convention, which he has just now contrasted with the resolution adopted by the recent Whig Convention. If this resolution does not condemn such improvements, then I do not know what is its meaning. No other construction, it seems to me, can be put upon the resolution of the Baltimore Convention than the one I have given it.

But in truth, sir, there is no such distinction known to the Constitution, as that between national and local, or general and particular improvements. If a thing be at all within the power of Congress, it does not cease to be constitutional because it is made the subject of a general system. And if the power over the subject is not given to Congress, it cannot be made constitutional by multiplying the occasions for legislating upon it. The resolution of the Democratic Convention declares, that the Constitution confers upon Congress no power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvements. If any internal improvements are constitutional, then a general system could not be unconstitutional. Will any gentleman say that Congress possesses no power to establish a general system of post roads—a general system of post offices—a general system of mints for coining money? No, sir. If the power be granted—if it be one of the subjects of legislation within the constitutional competency of Congress, then it matters not whether the thing done be general or particular, it is equally constitutional; if not, it is equally unconstitutional. I would appeal to gentlemen belonging to the Democratic party—I know very well the situation in which some of them are placed—I know the difficulties of their position, and I speak more in sorrow than in anger when I express the opinion, that their votes, if given for this bill, will not be in accordance with the ancient usages and doctrines of the Democratic party. What was the vote, even in the last House of Representatives, upon this subject? I have it here. Upon the bill which then passed this House there were—years 103, nays 87. Of the yeas there were 85 Whigs, and only 18 Democrats. Of the nays there were 7 Whigs, and 80 Democrats. This was the division of parties in the last Congress upon the bill which then passed this body.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. That was a very bad bill.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman says that was a very bad bill. I think, with him, that it was a very bad bill; but, with all proper deference, I think this, too, is a bad bill, because I conceive it assumes powers which have never been granted to Congress, and which, as Mr. Polk very truly said, in his excellent veto message, were never exercised for more than thirty years after the Government went into operation. There is an ancient superstition among some savage tribes, that they succeeded to the moral and mental attributes of those whom they slay in battle; and perhaps the Democratic party, after their many victories over the Whigs, have a right to appropriate to themselves the principles and doctrines of their opponents, as spoils of war. Let them say, if they please, that they claim these principles as their own, by right of conquest. But I protest, as I have before done, against the idea that they are sanctioned by the republican fathers of the Constitution.

The question was then taken upon Mr. TAYLOR's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. EASTMAN. I move to amend, by adding the following:

For completing the improvement of Grant river slough, at the town of Potosi, in the State of Wisconsin, which was commenced under an act of Congress, approved June 15th, 1844, and which is yet unfinished, $15,000.

In 1844, there was a grant of land made for the purpose of improving the landing, or harbor, at the town of Potosi, in Wisconsin. The land was sold, and the proceeds of it were applied to the object contemplated, but the sum realized from the sale was not, however, sufficient to make the improvement desired. The work which has been commenced will go into decay unless there is an additional appropriation made for this improvement. I offer this amendment in good faith, so that what has been already done by Congress may not be rendered useless, for want of another appropriation to complete the work.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am opposed to the amendment, but I rise simply for the purpose of saying that we have made no progress; and it seems to me that those of us who are in favor of the bill should make no speeches about this matter at all, for this course would certainly bring us at some period to a vote upon the question. We have only got so far to the first section, and it seems to me that we are in a condition that we will never get through. There is a good deal of business to be done, and there is no telling when we can adjourn, unless we can get through with the business before us. I do hope that we will go on, and that the friends of the bill will have nothing more to say about it.

The question was then taken on Mr. EASTMAN's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DISNEY offered the following amendment:

For the purchase of the Louisville and Portland canal, and towards the construction of a canal on the Indiana side of the river, $500,000.

Mr. D. said: I had desired to express myself somewhat at length in regard to this bill, had it been the pleasure of the House to have allowed me that privilege. I shall not be guilty of the folly of attempting to make a speech in the five minutes now allotted to me by the rules, but my action in regard to this bill will be determined by the result of the vote of the committee on this amendment. If this amendment be adopted, I shall vote for the bill with cordiality. If it be rejected, I shall use my best endeavors to crush and defeat the bill. My reasons for it are few. That amendment will test the sincerity of gentlemen who claim to be the exclusive friends of these internal improvements, because the improvement there asked for is more important in its character than any five provided for in this bill. There is more commerce passes that point than there is at any five of the ports provided for in your bill. The obstructions there are greater than at any other point provided for in your bill; and so far as the constitutional questions go it is freer from objection than any other work provided for here, for the Ohio river, from its rise down to its debouchment, lies entirely without the limits of any State.

I have not time in five minutes to state the facts connected with this matter; but I will state, in general terms, that more than $500,000,000 of commerce annually floats upon these great western rivers. And I put it distinctly to gentlemen who claim to be the exclusive friends of this bill, and ask, How will you defend yourselves before the people of the West, if you vote down this appropriation, and yet vote such appropriations as are provided for in this bill? The tax already paid by the people of the West on these obstructions has amounted to millions; and the pecuniary tax is but small compared to the incumbrances inflicted on commerce by the existing obstruction at this point. More than $100,000,000 of commerce annually passes over these falls. More than two thousand steamboats pass through the existing canal, independent of the large number which pass over the falls at high water, and when the navigation will permit it.

I repeat again, that the amendment which I now offer will test the sincerity of gentlemen, and enable the people of the West to determine how far they are sincere in advocating the improvement of the rivers of the West. The committee have so far voted down one after another each and every appropriation to improve the western rivers. The Committee on Commerce have allowed in their bill $260,000 for all the western rivers, the commerce of which amounts to $500,000,000 annually, and in the trade of which more than thirty thousand men are engaged, while you appropriate $400,000 for the commerce floating on the lakes of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 annually, and $500,000 to the Atlantic coast, when your whole foreign commerce does not equal the commerce upon our streams. How can you stand up before the people of the West and say that you are friends to river improvements, when you will vote millions here for the improvement of petty, contemptible harbors into which no commerce goes, and refuse appropriations for points on the rivers of the West where hundreds of millions of dollars are annually involved, and where the obstructions are so great that if they existed upon any part of the Atlantic coast there would be a general rebellion amongst the people?

I repeat what I said in the outset, that the action of the committee on the amendment which I have offered will test the sincerity of their professions in regard to river improvements. If you vote down this amendment, the people of the West will have no faith in your professions, or your anxiety in regard to the interests of the commerce of the West.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am opposed, seriously and in earnest, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. So much of it as relates to an appropriation for the purchase of the outstanding stock in the Louisville and Portland canal, I discussed the other day, but so much as proposes a canal upon the Indiana side of the Ohio river, I think I could demonstrate to be uncalled for, inexpedient, and improper. I venture my reputation upon the fact, that it is demonstrable that no canal can be constructed on that side of the river, that will answer the purposes of commerce, for less than $1,000,000—ranging, according to the different plans, from $1,000,000 to $7,000,000—and that the canal on the Kentucky side of the river can be enlarged to dimensions that will suit the wants of commerce, now and hereafter, for a sum ranging from $600,000 to $700,000. I have stood, for months, ready to offer to the American Government a contract, with indisputable security, for the sum of $700,000 to enlarge and extend that canal, and to have it finished in two years—with an interruption of navigation that shall be limited to three months—so that a steamboat ninety feet broad, and four hundred feet long shall be able to pass through it. But I do not even ask the House of Representatives to pass upon any proposition of that sort until I have an opportunity to exhibit maps which I have in my possession, which will show the form of the Ohio at that point, and which will show that there is no proposition that has ever been submitted to make a canal on the Indiana side of the river that will bear the test of an examination of five minutes. That is enough to say against the proposition of the gentleman from Cincinnati.

I will consume the balance of my time in making the suggestion, that we have not yet got beyond the appropriation for the Delaware breakwater, and that if we are to discuss, under the five minutes rule, all the conceivable amendments that may be offered to this bill, on the first clause thereof, we might as well at once commence a reconstruction of the entire bill. I have amendments lying on my desk, connected with western improvements, that I intend to offer when we come to the western improvements; and it strikes me as proper that gentlemen who have amendments to offer, should offer them at least to some clause of the bill connected with the part of the country to which those amendments refer.

We have already spent upon the Delaware breakwater one million nine hundred and odd thousand dollars. I am ready to vote this much more. I do not know when we shall get to the conclusion of the appropriation for it. I see by the last report that it is proposed, when they get the breakwater finished, to put an hospital on it.

Mr. DISNEY called for tellers; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM offered the following as an amendment to the amendment:

For the construction of a steamboat canal around the Falls of the Ohio river, at Louisville, on the Indiana side of said river, $500,000.

Mr. DUNHAM said: Mr. Chairman, when this bill came up for discussion, I was, unfortunately, unable to express my sentiments in reference to it. I concur in some of the remarks made here this morning by my colleague, [Mr. ROBINSON.] I do not expect, from the committee whence this bill emanated, and from the various votes which have been given here since we commenced voting on amendments, that we shall have anything like justice done to the valley of the Ohio and of the Mississippi. As has been very forcibly exhibited by the honorable member from Cincinnati, [Mr. DISNEY,] we find, in this bill, appropriations for harbors, and for the improvement of rivers, the importance and the commerce of which can bear no sort of comparison with the commerce of the Ohio river, and the importance of the improvement which my amendment contemplates.

No man can doubt that the great Mississippi valley is, after all, the tax-paying portion of the country. We have, for years, had burdens laid upon us for the purpose of improving the harbors and streams on the sea-board and lake-coasts, while our commerce has been entirely neglected. We have actually been paying tribute into the public Treasury for the purpose of getting our products to their markets. It has been a two-edged sword to us. On the one hand, we have been compelled to furnish means for your improvements, and on the other hand, we have been compelled to pay a tax into the general Treasury for the few pitiful improvements we have had.

So far as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is concerned, I should be very glad that he should have an opportunity to make good the vaunting boast which he has uttered here this morning, and compare the advantages of a canal on the Kentucky side with those of one on the Indiana side. I undertake to say that I shall be able, if that controversy shall ever come up, to demonstrate to this House, and to the country, that you cannot build a canal upon the Kentucky side of the river sufficiently large for the commerce of the Ohio, or that you can possibly get a boat of any dimensions into the mouth of it at the lower end.

As to the assertion of the gentleman relative to the comparative cost of the two works, why, every survey that has been made, so far as my knowledge extends, shows that the improvement which we desire on the Indiana side of the river can be made for a much less sum than that on the Kentucky side. The gentleman himself has said that they will want $700,000. Now all we want is half a million. That is all we ask, and with that half a million we will undertake to remove this obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river, which would be an immense relief to the commerce of the Ohio, in which the whole country is interested from Pittsburgh to New Orleans.

I had hoped that the legislation upon this subject would have been allowed to take the legitimate course—that it would have been brought forward by the proper committee. When that question does come up, I shall be prepared to enter at large into its discussion, and I believe I shall be able to satisfy the House and the country of the justice, economy, and propriety of this appropriation. I shall especially be able to show the illiberal spirit of the gentleman from the Louisville district, who has boasted so much here.

Mr. WALSH. I do not concur in what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has said with regard to the respective jurisdictions of the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Roads and Canals. I have never understood that at any time the jurisdiction over this subject has been exercised by any committee other than the Committee on Commerce. I have never understood that the House of Representatives, by any vote, has changed that jurisdiction. It is perfectly plain, that if we had no other ground upon which to resist this amendment, that furnished by the disagreement between the two gentlemen who have just spoken, in regard to the proper location of the proposed canal, would be amply sufficient.

Mr. DISNEY. I will remark that the only difference between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] and myself is, that he wants the canal built upon one side of the river, and we want it built upon the other.

Mr. WALSH. The proper Department will decide upon which side it should be located; and when we have its surveys and estimates before us we can act advisedly.

But even, sir, if the House should sustain the proposition, no blame can attach to the committee for not reporting it in this bill. The Committee on Commerce, although having properly in charge harbor and river improvements, have no control over the subject of canals. That control belongs to the committee of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] is chairman.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, refer to a charge which has several times been made on this floor, and which has no foundation in facts. I allude, sir, to the imputation sought to be cast upon the committee of having acted upon sectional grounds and in a proscriptive spirit.

Now, sir, the appropriations in this bill show upon their very face, that the charge is unfounded.

I will now mention some facts which I desire shall go before the country in relation to this matter. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] came before that committee, avowing his constitutional scruples and his intention to vote against the bill. But notwithstanding this, he gave us every information in relation to the appropriations that were needed in his own State. The gentleman from Georgia, representing the Savannah district, [Mr. JACKSON,] also came before us, and though he avowed his objections to the bill, and declared that he would not support it, yet, nevertheless, gave us every assistance in relation to the item connected with his own district.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I rise to a point of order. I want to know what this has to do with the Louisville canal?

Mr. WALSH. This general debate has been allowed upon the part of others. I have something now to say to my friend upon my left, from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR,] who seems so anxious for a speedy termination of this discussion. The very worst way we can adopt to come to a speedy vote is to raise these party questions. There is nothing in this bill which will impugn a single plank in the Baltimore platform. It is not a question of internal improvement, as men of other days have understood these terms. If gentlemen will refer to the days of 1818, they will find that there were then two sets of resolutions introduced by Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay, into the House of Representatives; one declaring the right of Congress to appropriate the public money to the construction of roads and canals, which was carried by a decided vote in the affirmative; the other declaring the right to make military roads, was defeated by a few votes. These questions then were passed upon by that republican party to which I belong now. [Laughter.] They decided that internal improvements were constitutional, and that is the system of internal improvements, to which the Baltimore platform manifestly alludes. The power to regulate commerce, by the improvement of harbors and rivers, was never questioned. The construction, demanding such improvements, I undertake to say, notwithstanding the earnest and able argument of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. FREEMAN,] has been sustained by Jefferson, and by every republican President of the country, and is coeval with the Constitution itself. And let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi, if I have time to refer to the constitutional question, that this right, under the naval clause, to which he refers, is even more extended than under that authorizing the regulating of commerce.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to give notice that when we get into the House, I shall move to suspend the rule which authorizes this five minutes' debate in Committee of the Whole, from and after to-morrow, at two o'clock, upon this bill.

Mr. CLARK's motion was then put, and agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. OLDS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 262, "making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled "An act supplementary to 'An act providing for taking the Seventh and subsequent Censuses of the United States, and to fix the number of members of the House of Representatives, and to provide for their future apportionment amongst the several States,' approved the 3d of May, 1850."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the five minutes rule be suspended, so far as relates to the bill of the House No. 262, from and after two o'clock, p. m., to-morrow.

[Loud cries, "I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. JONES. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Upon that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HAMILTON, and FULLER of Maine were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 62; two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and

The House adjourned till to-morrow, at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. PORTER: The petition of George Lynch, of St. Charles, Missouri, for an increase and arrears of pensions.

By Mr. MOREHEAD: The petition of Abner Apple and others, praying the establishing of a post road from Allendale to Monticello, in the county of Guilford, North Carolina.

By Mr. HARPER: The petition of John Stillwell and 49 others, citizens of Muskingum county, Ohio, asking for the passage of the bill introduced by Mr. Stanley, for paying over the fourth installment of the surplus revenue.

By Mr. SCUDDER: The petition of John Aiken and others, asking an appropriation for the erection of additional buoys in the harbor of New Bedford, Massachusetts.

By Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana: The petition of Isaac Huddleston and 61 other citizens along the route, asking that a post road be established from the mouth of Red river to Burr's Ferry, in Louisiana, thence to Huntsville, in Texas.

Also, the petition of G. W. Thompson and others, in relation to the Rio Hondo land claims.

By Mr. HUNTER: The petition of John Clark, of Belmont county, Ohio, for damages to his land and mill, occasioned by the construction of the national road.

By Mr. ALLEN, of Illinois: The petition of W. L. Lassar, and 46 other citizens of Hamilton and White counties, Illinois, asking Congress to establish a mail route from the town of McLanesboro, in Hamilton county, to Liberty, in White county, Illinois.

By Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi: The petition of the trustees of the Monticello Academy, in the State of Mississippi, praying Congress to pay over to said trustees the amount of money, with interest thereon, for which the United States improperly sold a sixteenth section of land belonging to said Academy.

By Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania: The memorial of Board of Trade and citizens of Philadelphia, asking for the removal of obstructions from the mouth of the Mississippi. Also, the memorial of Democratic citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, asking for an increased duty on iron.

Also, the memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, asking for a modification of the bounty land act of 1850.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 27, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the memorial of the City Council of Dubuque, Iowa, praying a further appropriation for the completion of the improvements in the harbor at that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of Dwight Smith, a citizen of the United States, praying indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of his forcible expulsion from Mexico by military force during the late war with that Republic; which was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject of claims against Mexico.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill entitled an act to amend "An act to divide the district of Arkansas into two judicial districts, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The main object of that bill is to extend the criminal jurisdiction of the district court over the western portion of the State, occupied chiefly by Indians. I therefore ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think the reason assigned by the Senator from Arkansas is hardly sufficient to secure that reference for this bill. It appears to me that it ought first to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that that committee might ascertain the reasons why we should divide the State.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. There is but one section of the bill embracing matter which is relevant to the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary, and that is the provision which requires the circuit court of the United States to be held semi-annually, instead of annually. All the remainder of the bill has relation to the extension of the criminal jurisdiction of the court over the Indian country. That is the main, I may say the prime object of the bill; and it seems to me, considering it in that point of view, that the subject is one of which the Committee on Indian Affairs have appropriate jurisdiction.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

OPERATIONS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate in what manner the vessels of the Navy are now employed, specifying the objects and operations of each squadron, and of single vessels on special service; and also to communicate to the Senate a statement of the force of the Navy available for immediate service.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that resolution will be considered now. It is not necessary to do more than to allude to a certain event, to show that it is important to get that information immediately.

Mr. MILLER. I think that resolution had better lie over one day, according to the rule.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey object to its consideration at this time?

Mr. MILLER. I do.

The resolution was accordingly laid over, under the rule.

CIRCUIT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so reorganizing the circuit courts of the United States as to include the States of California, Texas, Florida, Iowa, and Wisconsin within said circuits.

BRIG "GENERAL ARMSTRONG."

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate (if not incompatible with the public interest) copies of all the correspondence which has taken place, and documents that may have been collected, since the message of the President of the 15th of December, 1845, (printed with Senate documents, 1st session Twenty ninth Congress, in volume 3, No. 14,) in relation to the claim of the owners of the brig General Armstrong against the Government of Portugal, including all letters and papers in the possession of the Government material to a full understanding of the subject, and not heretofore communicated to the Senate.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Silas Loomis, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Loomis, deceased; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Mr. WELLER, from the select committee appointed to inquire into the subject of printing a report of the Secretary of the Interior, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate calling for information in relation to the commission appointed to run and mark the boundary between the United States and Mexico, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit to the Senate copies of—First, a letter from Mr. M. Gonzales de la Vega, Chargé d'Affaires of Mexico, to the Secretary of State, dated January, 1852; second, copy of a letter from the Mexican Minister to the Secretary of State, dated 11th March, 1851, both upon the subject of the American and Mexican boundary commission.

Mr. WELLER. I hope that resolution will receive the consideration of the Senate now. The letters referred to are very material in regard to this boundary commission, and I presume they are on file in the State Department. They are referred to in the communication which has been made to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior, but the letters themselves have not been sent to the Senate. I have been instructed to offer that resolution by the committee, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The resolution was adopted.

APPEALS TO THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. GWIN. I have another resolution which I wish to offer:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States from the district courts of California, in all cases involving the amount of $2,000.

I understand that the district judges in California have decided that, under the law organizing the district courts, there is no power of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that great injustice is likely to occur to litigants in the courts there, on account of this want of power. I hope the resolution will be now considered.

The resolution was agreed to.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. SUMNER. I have a resolution which I desire to offer; and, in announcing it, I give notice that I intend to call it up as early as possible—perhaps to-morrow during the morning hour. I will then throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to consider the expediency of reporting a bill for the immediate repeal of the act of Congress, approved September 18, 1850, usually known as the "fugitive slave act."

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senate will indulge me for one moment. There are few acts I would not sooner commit than deny the right of speaking on any subject to a Senator who throws himself on the indulgence of this body; but, if the gentleman who has offered this resolution asks to-morrow, or at any other time during this session, the indulgence of the Senate to be heard on it, I, for one, shall refuse. We have fixed a day for the adjournment; it is at hand, and it is probable that the House of Representatives will agree to adjourn on that day; and here, after eight months of the session have elapsed, within thirty days of the adjournment, the Senator from Massachusetts, representing a State, in part, asks to be heard on a question which involves the continuance of this Union! and that at a time when there can be no reply! I shall refuse the Senator's request.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remind the Senator from Virginia that there can be no discussion at this time.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED.

The following engrossed bill and joint resolution were severally read a third time and passed:

An act to protect actual settlers upon the land on the line of the Central Railroad and branches, by granting preemption rights thereto; and a Joint resolution for the relief of George R. C. Floyd, late secretary of Wisconsin Territory, and sureties.

Mr. TOUCEY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution to confer additional duties and powers on the Solicitor of the Treasury; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ALTON, A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. HAMLIN. At the request of those who are interested materially in the subject, I ask the Senate to take up for consideration "A bill to constitute Alton, in the State of Illinois, a port of delivery." The honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLEMENS] interposed an objection to this bill when it was offered before; but I understand he now withdraws that objection. There are peculiar reasons why it should be taken up and considered now. I apprehend that it will not occupy many minutes.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to. The bill was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to its consideration as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that Alton, in the State of Illinois, shall be constituted a port of delivery, and shall be subject to the same regulations and restrictions as other ports of delivery in the United States; and that there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs to reside at that port, who shall, in addition to his own duties, perform the duties and receive the salary and emoluments of surveyor, prescribed by the act of Congress, approved on the 2d of March, 1831, providing for the payment of duties on imported goods, at certain ports therein mentioned, entitled "An act allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburg, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, to be secured and paid 'at those places.'" It also provides that this port of delivery shall be annexed to and made a part of the collection district of New Orleans, and that all the facilities and privileges afforded by the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1831, be extended to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXPLORATION OF BEHRING'S STRAITS.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to make an inquiry of one of the members of the Committee on Commerce. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] some time ago reported from that committee a bill to authorize an exploration and reconnaissance of the courses of navigation used by whaling vessels in the regions of Behring's Straits, and also of such parts of the China seas, Straits of Gaspar, and Java Sea as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding to and from China. I wish to know when that Senator intends to call the bill up. It is of the greatest importance to my State.

Mr. SEWARD. I am prepared to call the bill up at the first opportunity. I should be glad to take it up now; but as the Senate is occupied at this moment I will call it up to-morrow, if the Senator from California will give me his support.

Mr. SEWARD, subsequently, by unanimous consent, informally submitted an amendment to the bill; which was ordered to be printed.

FALLS OF ST. MARY'S, MICHIGAN.

Mr. FELCH. I desire to ask the Senate to take up a bill which was in part discussed the other day, the action of the Senate in regard to which was not completed. It is Senate bill No. 28, in reference to the construction of a ship canal across the State of Michigan.

The PRESIDENT. Is that a special order?

Mr. FELCH. I believe not.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator from Michigan will agree to lay the bill aside at one o'clock, if it should occasion debate, I will agree to it.

Mr. FELCH. I will agree to that. I move, therefore, that the prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the "bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands, for the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, in said State," the question being on the adoption of an amendment reported by the committee, to strike out of the twentieth line of the first section the words, "two hundred," and insert "two hundred and fifty;" and in the next line to strike out the word "fifty," and insert "sixty," so as to make that clause of the section read:

"And provided further, That said canal shall be at least one hundred feet wide, with a depth of water twelve feet, and the locks shall be at least two hundred and fifty feet long and sixty feet wide."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. These are all the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. HUNTER. I was not in the Senate when that bill was taken up, but I understand it is a bill appropriating money for an internal improvement solely within the limits of one State. I wish to know what is the character of the bill, because, if that is the case, I must say that it appears to me that we are going much further than we have heretofore done in relation to this system.

Mr. TOUCEY. I regard this work as being calculated exclusively for the public benefit, so far as we are called on to act in regard to it. It proposes to open a canal on the lands of the United States, by means of which Lake Superior will be connected with the lakes below. Without this canal it will be indispensably necessary to maintain a naval force on Lake Superior, as well as on the lakes below; but if this canal be constructed, one single naval squadron will suffice for the service on all the lakes. To effect that object, the proposition is now made to construct a canal on the lands of the United States, and thus render a double marine force unnecessary on the lakes. In order to remove any objection which may yet exist in the minds of Senators, I will offer an amendment to the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH.]

The PRESIDENT. There was an amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH,] which has been printed. The question will next be on that amendment.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to contract with the lowest bidder, or bidders, after public notice given in the usual manner for letting contracts, for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, in the State of Michigan, which canal shall not be less than one hundred feet wide and twelve feet deep, with single locks, not less than three hundred and fifty feet long and seventy-five feet wide, with such piers and other appurtenances as shall, in the opinion of said Secretary, be required for the safe and proper use of said canal: Provided, That said Secretary may enter into separate contracts for such different portions of the work in constructing said canal as he shall deem conducive to the public interest, and the aggregate amount of all said contracts shall not exceed four hundred thousand dollars, which shall be paid to the contractor or contractors as the work progresses, reserving always a sum equal to twenty per centum on the amount of work performed, until the whole be completed: And provided further, That the contractor or contractors shall perform the work under such instructions and superintendence as the said Secretary shall deem necessary and proper to secure the faithful execution of the contracts; and shall give such ample security for the performance thereof as he shall direct and approve: And provided further, That such contractor or contractors shall have the right of taking from any of the lands of the United States stone and other materials for the construction of said canal and its appurtenances.

Mr. TOUCEY. I propose to amend that amendment by adding to it the following, as an additional section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said canal, with its appurtenances, when the same is completed, shall be delivered over to the State of Michigan, to be kept in operation and repair, and subject to use by all citizens of the United States, and such foreigners as may be permitted to use the same by authority of Congress, upon the payment of such tolls and charges only as shall, in the aggregate, be sufficient to defray the necessary expenses of the operation and repairs of said canal: Provided, That all boats and vessels belonging to or in the employment of the United States shall at all times be allowed to pass through said canal free of all charges: Provided also, That there shall be kept under the authority of said State an accurate account of expenditures in the repairs and the operating of said canal, and also of all receipts for tolls and charges, and a sworn statement of the same be returned to the Secretary of War in the month of January in each year: And provided further, That the work upon the said canal shall not be commenced until said State, by an act of the Legislature thereof, shall agree to accept the same, and shall make proper provision for the preservation, repair, and operation thereof on the terms and conditions above specified.

Mr. BELL. I believe that this bill originally proposed to appropriate land for aiding in the construction of this work. The proposition made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FELCH] is to make the appropriation in money to the amount of $400,000. That proposition involves a new question, and I think brings up very clearly the consideration of an old one, which for many years has been considered as having had its quietus, for the present at least. As I understand this proposition, there is no difference between it and that which was once made, and in effect was carried in a different shape, for the construction of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal. The same arguments were then urged in favor of that work which are now urged in favor of this. It might be said that the proposition is similar to that which has so frequently been discussed in this Hall, for the construction of a canal in the State of Indiana around the falls of the Ohio river, and making an appropriation from the Treasury for that purpose. There was also another similar proposition with which you, Mr. President, are better acquainted, which was to construct a canal in the State of Alabama around the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee river. The construction of the Florida canal is another proposition of a similar character. No one of these propositions is different in principle from the proposition to construct a canal through any one State in the Union. I shall be glad if honorable Senators will say where the discrimination can be made.

I think the principle is the same. For example, it is said, with reference to this measure, that it is important for the military defense of this country. So is every great work which facilitates rapidity of movement through the different portions of this Confederacy. Every work is highly useful which tends to aid in the transportation of the munitions of war, so as to be able to meet an enemy where we are hardest pressed. The rapid accumulation of forces in such a case is important, and if we extend this principle so as to embrace the common military defenses of the country, all works of internal improvement of that description—roads, canals, and railways—come under the same principle. Those to which I have alluded are of this description. This pass between Lakes Superior and Huron, the pass between the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, and the passes on the various rivers of the country, are all objects which would be useful as military appliances in bringing forth the resources of the nation for the purpose of defending ourselves against a foreign enemy; yet, in principle they are not different from that great line of communication which once was proposed to connect Buffalo and New Orleans. The same principle and the same policy would apply as to the military defenses of the country, strengthening its resources in time of war, as well as giving energy to our commerce in time of peace. No one denies that.

It is said that this particular pass would be especially useful as a means of national defense, by enabling us to pass our ships speedily from one of the great lakes to another, in case of a war with Great Britain. Are honorable Senators really sincere when they place their reliance for support to this measure, upon that—I will not call it pretext, in deference to gentlemen—but that argument, as presented by the Senator from Connecticut? Why, if war is possible, it might be useful to us to have such a means of communication. But does any gentleman really contemplate that in any future collision with Great Britain, we shall have any necessity for military defenses on the northwest, or between Lakes Superior and Huron? In what period of time, in what remote generation do they expect there will be sufficient English population and resources in that quarter of the British possessions, to cause us any annoyance or alarm whatever? Does not everybody know, that in the event of a war with Great Britain at any time, or in ten or twenty years at least, the power of this Confederacy, increased as it is by its population and resources, would soon pass over the boundaries which separate us from the colonies of Great Britain, and that the few troops kept there would soon be compelled to yield? Does any gentleman suppose really that we are to have war steamers on Lake Superior for the purpose of defending our northwestern boundary against Great Britain, or that the lakes lower down, Erie and Ontario even, will need such defense? I venture to say that if the real judgment of Senators on this floor were announced, it would be that we have no cause to fear from any British force on any part of our northern frontier. Such has been the growth of this country since the war of 1812, that every gentleman will see that the reduction of the British power in Canada would be but a morning's work. There might be some hard fighting to maintain the contest there, but every gentleman must see that our growth since 1812 has been such, that from the moment war was proclaimed, England would not dream of retaining possession of that province. It would be surrendered, given up, abandoned at once. Honor might compel them, perhaps, to hold out for a short time; but certainly with no expectation of maintaining their ground or resisting the resources of our twenty or thirty millions upon their southern borders, against their one million or two. I say, therefore, that I take it that the talk about the necessity of this canal as a means of defense, is a mere pretext.

As to the principle involved, I have said that the principle is the same as would be involved in carrying out a general system of internal improvements. I had thought that that system was settled, practically at least, and that that portion of the Whig party—but I beg pardon for using party titles here; it was not my intention to do so; it is wrong. I shall go on to speak of the system of constructing works of internal improvement by the aid of appropriations from the Treasury. I thought that system had been abandoned by both the great parties in the country. I was always opposed to it. I think no man has been more earnest and zealous in supporting the policy of making appropriations for the maintenance of commerce, for opening harbors on the lakes and elsewhere as being more national in their character, as being a description of improvements not generally to be carried out by a combination of individual capital, and as not always affording individual States such reason to expect benefit as to induce them to engage their revenues in the construction. I have maintained that policy, but I have strenuously opposed any scheme of a general system of internal improvements.

I did not care about opposing this bill, as it came before the Senate originally. The proposition then was to appropriate five hundred thousand acres of land for the construction of this canal. I was willing that the bill should pass in that shape, as it was assimilated in principle to the appropriations for railroads in those States in which the public lands lie; but the proposition now before the Senate is very different; it is for an appropriation of $400,000 from the Treasury of the United States for the construction of this work.

I am glad that a sense of the impropriety of the measure is manifested by so many Senators; and I am anxious that it should be discussed, in order that we may come to a vote on it. I want to know—and I do not speak now as a party man—I do not want to see how it will operate on the two contending parties of the country—I want to ascertain whether such a system is likely to be taken up and approved by the body of the people throughout the United States, and by a majority of the members of the two Houses of Congress. I am opposed to it on the ground that it leads to profligacy and waste of the public money, and because there would be no end to it. No treasury whatever would satisfy the extravagant demands that would be made on it under such a system. I repeat that I would like to know on what distinct principle Senators could support this proposition, except on the ground that it is expedient to effect this particular improvement. Suppose that the argument is that this is an isolated work; that it will open a very short passage between the two lakes, a passage very important to the mining resources and copper mines of Lake Superior—a distance of country which appears to possess extraordinary mineral riches, scarcely yet developed. If it be important on that ground, why is it that precedence is given to such a measure as this? Senators talk of the embarrassment to the trade in transporting supplies to the mines, if this passage is not made; and in the transportation, again, of the products of the miners' labor. In answer to this, I will merely say, what is the difference in principle between giving $400,000 for the purpose of opening this pass, and the construction of a railroad for the purpose of connecting it directly with Lake Michigan, or with some other point? There is no difference; the principle is the same; and the only question is as to the power and the expediency. The power and expediency is the same in the one case as in the other, and on principle you might as well vote for the one as for the other.

But the point to which I wished to call attention, when I made this slight digression, was, that there were older demands pending for nearly half a century—demands that should have precedence of this work. Who that has any knowledge of the manner in which commerce is going on in the West, is not aware of the tax imposed on transportation from the Upper to the Lower Ohio, and from the Lower Ohio to New Orleans, and indeed on all the branches of the Mississippi, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars; indeed a million of dollars—half a million at least, besides the incumbrance attending reshipment at Louisville. Taking the amount for the whole year—for at some periods it is only the smallest class of boats which can pass, and in such cases commerce is cut off altogether—I should suppose that at least half a million of dollars would be a moderate estimate for the tax imposed on the general commerce on that river by the obstruction. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] can correct me if I make an over-estimate.

Mr. BRIGHT. More than that.

Mr. BELL. The Senator from Indiana thinks it is more than that; and I think so too. Then look at the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee river, a river which I found, to my surprise, some few years ago was scarcely known, but which is now recognized as one of the greatest rivers of the country, as broad as the lower part of the Ohio itself, or nearly as broad, and yet so obstructed that it is not even known to intelligent gentlemen of the country, and members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] the other day had much to say about the rich copper mines of Michigan; but when you talk of the discovery of rich mines, go up that river. I know that this may appear to be somewhat like a local allusion, but I merely state it in answer to what was said, and to the glowing description which was given by the Senator from Connecticut, the other day, of the copper mines and the copper ore of Lake Superior. Sir, you may have some knowledge of the mineral riches of the waters of Tennessee, after you pass the Cumberland mouth. I know that rich copper mines have been discovered in that river—riches that have been shut out from the knowledge of the world, and much more shut out from being carried to market by obstructions in our water-courses. And if it be any pretext for giving precedence to such a work, that these copper mines have been discovered on Lake Superior, I think that we have a much higher claim; for copper mines are known to exist, and coal mines, and iron, and other metals, and they deserve to be noticed; and, if any section of the country is to have the aid of the Government because of the existence of mines, I think the State of Tennessee should have priority. The principle and the objects would be the same in both cases, and I can see no ground on which we can give priority to this claim.

But again, Mr. President, I am greatly anxious that we should do something for our rivers and harbors in the West, and particularly in the Northwest. How is it that this bill is sought to be pushed through in preference to other bills? How is it that the object here is sought to be made a separate one and is not connected with a general river and harbor bill? I am no advocate for the practice of connecting a great number of measures together and giving strength to the whole, while in its separate parts it would have nothing but weakness; but I appeal to Senators to say whether that has not been the principle on which such measures have had to abide their fate, not only in the House of Representatives, but also to some extent in the Senate? Ay, sir, even the present session a proposition was made to appropriate $50,000, not for an original improvement in the navigation of the Ohio river, but positively to remove a nuisance created in the channel of that river by a former appropriation, the former work of this Government. And, sir, that proposition sleeps. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] took that bill under his charge, and during the present session has made some three or four distinct efforts to obtain an appropriation for the removal of this obstruction, or for repairing that work which the Government had placed there by its prior action. And yet, the Senate resisted that bill. On what principle was it done? On the principle that it must share the common fate of appropriations for such purposes—on the principle that if a river and harbor bill should not pass, that particular bill should not pass. I will not undertake to say whether the proposition now under consideration can be discriminated from rivers and harbors, or for removing obstructions in our rivers generally; but I think it cannot. It is not an improvement of a harbor; it is not for the removal of an obstruction existing by nature or which may have been accidentally thrown into the channel of a great water-course, but for the construction of a canal between two great lakes; to remove an obstruction originally placed there by nature. It is directly for an appropriation for the construction of a canal, which I say cannot be discriminated on principle, from a general system of internal improvements which has been advocated by some in former times.

I insist, therefore, that this work shall share the fate of the Cumberland dam appropriation. If it be a work which can be brought within the principle of the river and harbor bill, let it be brought in as one of the amendments to that bill. Let it not be said that because these mines are so rich, it is necessary that this work should be taken out of the general principle. Perhaps these mines are rich, but I have not the faith to believe that the copper is twenty per cent. richer than other copper that has been discovered, or will bear so much greater stress or strain than the copper of other mines. Nor do I believe that the iron found there is thirty per cent. stronger than any other. I have but little more faith in these reports than I have in spirit rappings, and I cannot say that I have much in either. The one is about as marvelous to my mind as the other. The copper mines may be rich, and I have no doubt that a canal will be useful in promoting trade, manufactures, ship-building, and other objects. I have no doubt of that. But I want this bill to come up where it can be discussed in connection with other subjects which are analogous in principle. I want to know whether it can be discriminated from the principle which applies to the appropriations made for the improvement of rivers and harbors. If it properly comes under the general subject of improvements of the national rivers and harbors, connected with the commerce of the country, and stands upon the same footing that the improvements in the harbors of the lakes or in the rivers stand upon, let it go into that bill, and let all matters which stand upon the same principle be acted upon together. If it cannot stand there let it fall.

Then, upon either ground, I see no propriety, no demand in the public interest or the public wants which requires that this bill should be hurried through before the other.

I did not intend to make these remarks, as I did not suppose that this bill was coming up this morning under these circumstances. It certainly involves all those principles which I have stated. If no other Senator wishes to reply to what I have stated I will move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CLARKE] is entitled to the floor to-day upon another subject; and I said to him this morning, that if this bill were taken up, and should lead to debate, as far as my colleague and myself were concerned, we would consent to postpone it at the proper moment for him to go on. I desire now to fulfill that promise.

Mr. CLARKE. I desire to get through with the few remarks which I have to make in continuation of what I said yesterday; but personally I am not in a great hurry. If the honorable Senator prefers to go on now for a short time, I have no objection.

Mr. CASS. It would be better to pass the bill over informally, and let the Senator proceed with his remarks.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope it will be passed over. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor, not having finished the speech which he commenced yesterday.

Mr. SMITH. I wish merely to suggest to the consideration of the Senate, that whenever we take this matter up, I really think it ought to be finished. If the honorable Senator from Rhode Island desires to go on with his remarks now, I would prefer to have the bill postponed; but whenever we do take it up, I hope the Senate will finish it.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope my friend from Tennessee will not intimate any purpose to move to lay the bill upon the table. I hope it will be permitted to take as wide a range of debate as any other subject in this body.

Mr. BELL. I have not made the motion.

Mr. CASS. I also hope that a wide range of debate will be permitted on the bill; and I merely wish now to say, that the honorable Senator from Tennessee has, in my opinion, totally mistaken the ground of the bill. It has no connection with the system of internal improvements at all; and I think we who are in favor of the bill, can satisfactorily show that to be the case. For the purpose of permitting the Senator from Rhode Island to proceed with his remarks, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES C. WATSON.

Mr. WADE. I move to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James C. Watson, which was passed yesterday. I do it because I wish my colleague to have an opportunity to express his views upon the bill. I do not propose now to discuss it, but merely make the motion, and let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill, and also that that motion lie on the table.

Mr. WADE. I will state that that bill passed this body under peculiar circumstances. It is a bill of some considerable importance, on account of the amount appropriated by it. It passed this body without any investigation whatever, while, I understand, there are many documents and much evidence that should be traveled through carefully and investigated before any one can determine whether the claim is well grounded or not.

Mr. RUSK. Is the proposition that the motion to reconsider lie on the table?

The PRESIDENT. It is. The Senator from Ohio must withdraw the latter motion which he made, or he cannot enter into a discussion upon the subject.

Mr. WADE. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the bill, but simply wish to say that the Senate are aware that it passed under peculiar circumstances, and without investigation, but that it did undergo considerable investigation in the other House, and was not there considered a claim so plain as to be passed without investigation. I know my colleague has prepared himself with an elaborate argument upon the subject, and I know also that he has come to the conclusion that the claim is not well founded. I do not claim to have investigated it so as to be prepared to take it up now. I have not had the means to do it; but from what I have heard my colleague say, from his investigations—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to ask the Senator again, whether he withdraws his proposition to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

Mr. WADE. I have got through with what I wished to say. The bill passed under such circumstances that I think my colleague should have an opportunity to make his objections known to the Senate. If the claim is well founded, of course it will pass; if not, it ought to be rejected.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a question of order—whether a motion to reconsider can be made by any one who did not vote with the majority to pass the bill?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly not.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then I ask, whether the Senator from Ohio voted in favor of the passage of the bill?

Mr. WADE. I did not. I voted against its passage.

The PRESIDENT. Then the Senator cannot make the motion to reconsider the vote. The motion must come from one who voted in the majority.

Mr. WADE. I voted with the minority.

The PRESIDENT. Then the motion to reconsider cannot be entertained.

THE BOUNDARY COMMISSIONER.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. WELLER, on the 28th of June, for the appointment of a select committee of five, to investigate the charges preferred by Colonel J. McClellan, against John R. Bartlett, Commissioner to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. CLARKE concluded his defense of Mr. Bartlett, and explanations were made by Mr. WELLER. [Mr. C.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the resolution lie on the table, for the purpose of submitting a motion that the Indian appropriation bill be taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed a joint resolution providing for the distribution of the laws of Congress, and the debates thereon.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1853." It is not my purpose to go into it this evening, but I wish to have it pending when the Senate adjourns to-day, in order that it may be the first business in order to-morrow after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 27, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The bill of the House, No. 271, to grant the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of certain railroads, was rejected when last under consideration.

A motion was entered to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. The question upon the latter motion is the first business in order, it having been postponed until to-day.

On motion by Mr. WATKINS, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of Daniel Witt, for the purpose of transferring them to the proper department—the Pension Office.

On motion by Mr. SCHERMERHORN, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions and papers of David Bell, and of George S. Claffin, and that they be severally referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that I may withdraw the report, which I made yesterday, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—being the post route bill—in order that the committee may add to it such amendments as may be thought desirable, so as to avoid the necessity of such amendments being made when it comes before the House. I think there can be no objection.

No objection was made, and the report was withdrawn.

Mr. OLDS. I give notice to the members of the House, that the report will be in the room of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads during the day, and I hope each member will examine it, and see that his route or routes are in it.

Mr. MOREHEAD. When will the committee report?

Mr. OLDS. To-morrow morning.

RAILROAD IN FLORIDA AND ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER. The business before the House is a motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table, "granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Florida and Alabama for the construction of certain railroads in said States."

Mr. SMART. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken on the motion, and it was agreed to.

The roll was then called through, and also the names of the absentees.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would inquire of the Chair if there is a quorum voting?

The SPEAKER. There is a quorum—one hundred and forty members having answered to their names.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon laying upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill which has been heretofore referred to, was rejected.

Mr. SMART. Upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 79—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, J. Appleton, Ashe, Babcock, Barrere, Bibbhausa, Boeck, John H. Boyd, Breckinridge, Joseph Cable, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Curtis, Darby, Dawson, Dimmick, Duncan, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Fowler, Thos. J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hascall, Hebard, Hillyer, Holladay, Thos. M. Howe, Thos. Y. How, Hunter, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLannan, McMullin, Millson, Morehead, Samuel W. Parker, Pease, Perkins, Polk, Robbins, Savage, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Richard H. Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Stratton, Sutherland, Thurston, Townsend, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, and Wildrick—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, William Appleton, Bissell, Bragg, Brenton, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, T. Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Denn, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Fitch, Florence, Gentry, Goodrich, Green, Hart, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—79.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill was rejected.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Has the previous question been called upon that?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the previous question.

The House was divided upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were 72 in the affirmative; when

Mr. STUART demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. PENN and CALDWELL were appointed.

The House was again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes not counted.

So the previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I voted on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, under a misapprehension. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to change my vote from the affirmative to the negative. It will make no difference in the result of the vote.

No objection was offered, and the change was made.

Mr. SMART. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were yeas 76, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Russell, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. There being a tie vote, the Speaker voted in the negative; so the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected did not prevail.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. When my name was called upon the last vote, I stated that I did not understand the question. Before, and when the vote was announced, I was engaged in conversation. I ask the consent of the House to record my vote.

[Cries "I object!" "I object!" all over the House.]

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] presents a resolution from the Committee on Printing, which will be read.

The resolution was then read as follows:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the House and Senate on the death of Henry Clay, ordered by this House, and now in the process of publication, be bound under the existing contract for printing.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to say in explanation of this resolution, that the book will make something over one hundred and fifty pages. It is less in size than the restrictions placed upon books which are to be bound, under a resolution of the House some time since, hence the necessity of a resolution to obtain authority to bind it under the existing contract for printing. It will be published very neatly.

Mr. KING, of New York. What will it cost?

Mr. STANTON. About one shilling.

The question was taken on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORDS in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 282, making appropriations for certain rivers and harbors.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on yesterday the questions pending were, the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] making appropriation for the Tennessee river, and the amendment to that amendment, offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] making an appropriation for a ship canal around the falls upon the Indiana side.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the pending amendments, the Chair asks the indulgence of the committee to state, in advance, a decision which he feels himself called upon to make, relative to the further consideration of this bill. And, inasmuch as this decision will be an innovation upon the practice of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, he announces it in advance, that no member of the committee, when called to order under it, may suppose the Chair personal or invidious, and that the committee, by an examination of the question, may be prepared to sustain or overrule the Chair.

The last clause of the 136th rule provides for discharging the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union "from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting, without debate, on all amendments pending, or that may be offered." The Chair holds that this rule not only absolutely precludes all discussion upon the merits and demerits of the bill, but that it also forbids all debate upon the pending amendments, and that if there was no other rule, making an exception, the committee would be compelled to vote upon all pending, or amendments to be offered, without discussion.

The 34th rule makes the exception; but being an exception, it must receive a strict construction. It is as follows:

"Any member shall be allowed in committee five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer; after which, any member first obtaining the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to the amendment."

The Chair will feel himself bound to give a strict construction to this rule; and will hold, that all remarks upon the general merits of the bill will be out of order as "explaining" an amendment, and that all remarks touching the demerits of the bill will be out of order as opposing an amendment.

If the committee sustain this decision, the business of the session will be greatly expedited, and whether they do or not, the Chair will feel that in making the decision he has discharged his duty.

The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] and on that amendment tellers have been ordered.

Messrs. STEVENS of Pennsylvania, and JOHNSON of Arkansas, were appointed as tellers.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 12, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the following amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB:]

"For surveying and improving the Tennessee river, $25,000 below, and $50,000 above, the Muscle Shoals in said river."

Mr. COBB. I demand tellers upon that amendment.

Tellers were not ordered; and the question being put, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIBLEY. I offer the following amendment:

For the survey of the Mississippi river between Fort Snelling and the Falls of St. Anthony, and also above the Falls of St. Anthony, with special reference to the improvement of Sauk and Pike rapids, $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, not pro forma, for the purpose of making a five minutes speech, but in good faith, and with an earnest desire that it will be adopted. Sir, it may be said by the Committee on Commerce who reported the bill now before you, that the necessity for the appropriation asked for has not been pressed before that committee. That is true; but it was no fault of mine that the subject introduced by me as an independent proposition, was not allowed to take the usual course, but was ordered to be referred to another committee. Had not that been the case, I can assure the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that he would not have escaped repeated visitations from me, with a view to secure his good offices in behalf of the small appropriation I now ask for, and its incorporation into the river and harbor bill.

Mr. Chairman, it is of very great importance to the Territory of Minnesota, that a survey should be made of the Mississippi river, immediately below the Falls of St. Anthony, as well as above that point. A report from a competent officer, based upon actual survey, will determine the mooted point, whether that river can be made safely navigable at a low stage of water from Fort Snelling to the Falls. As a matter of justice to large numbers of our citizens, a proper examination should be made without delay under the authority of Congress. The river above the Falls needs some improvement, in the removal of bowlders in the channel, and particularly in the displacement of the rocks at Sauk and Pike rapids, but for which impediments in the navigation, steamers might run from the Falls of St. Anthony to Pockegoma Falls, a distance of nearly four hundred miles. A part of the country through which the Mississippi runs above the rapids mentioned, as well as below them, cannot be surpassed for beauty and fertility, and the removal of the obstructions in that stream would be incalculably beneficial to the whole of the upper part of the Territory. The Government would also be benefited by the increase in the sales of land, which would necessarily follow any measure adding to the facilities of intercommunication, like that anticipated by my amendment. I hope the small appropriation embraced in it will be granted, that Congress may obtain the requisite information as to the sum necessary to be expended for the improvement of the Mississippi within the limits of Minnesota. Inasmuch as the sum embraced in my amendment for a like purpose was included in the river and harbor bill which passed the House during the last Congress, and as the present bill contains not one dollar of appropriation for Minnesota, I ask the committee to vote for my proposition.

Mr. NEWTON. I am opposed to this amendment because I am in favor of the bill. For the amendment, if adopted, is calculated to weaken the prospect of passing the bill. Every independent amendment is calculated to have that effect. For each one that has been offered and rejected has equal merit with the one now offered. If amendments that materially increase the amount of the bill be adopted, it opens the way for the whole class that have been so long neglected, that the amount would frighten the friends of the bill, and thereby defeat the object. I would vote for the amendment if it could pass; so I would for those that have been rejected.

Improvement of rivers and harbors is one of the most important subjects. It has been neglected and its policy doubted for the last fourteen years, until that which had before been done has dilapidated and gone to decay to such an extent that the sacrifice of life and property has aroused public opinion sufficient to command public action.

The bill is entirely too inadequate for the wants—too long neglected—of this great country. But we are near the close of the session, and have no time to mature a bill adequate in all its parts to all our wants and necessities. I would vote for it if it contained but one single appropriation of the number it now contains; for by it we should revive the policy so long withheld, that the power is denied. I would support it because it is offered by the Democratic party, who heretofore have denied its exercise in any practical manner. I would support it because it commits the incoming Administration, whom in a certain event, without that committal, I fear would block it. But last, and most of all, I would support it because the country and our best interest imperiously call for and demand it. I presume every member has some favorite amendment he would be glad to have adopted, but because he cannot obtain it, no friend of the measure will oppose it. The lake shore in northern Ohio is poorly provided for. Ashtabula, a point that has an appropriation, but since the bill has been reported, the harbor has received an injury that requires the amount to be increased.

Conneaut, a harbor equally important with Ashtabula, and in the neighborhood, has received nothing, and will probably be ruined in the course of another year, without an appropriation. To save it, it will be necessary to take some portion from the others and apply to this, and by it the amount will not be increased. Small as this bill is, there is probably as much as will be used before we meet again in December.

There has been expended upon Lake Erie, in northern Ohio, from 1826 up to 1838, the following sums in the different years. Until that time no appropriation had been made by the General Government in the State of Ohio:

Year.	Grand river.	Cleveland.	Huron river.	Ashtabula cr'k.	Black river.	Conneaut river.	Cunningham creek.	Vermilion.	Sandusky Bay.	Total.

In 1844 there was appropriated to Grand river $10,000, to Cleveland $25,000, to Huron river $5,000, to Ashtabula creek $5,000, to Conneaut river $5,000, to Sandusky bay $15,000, in all $65,000. Lake Erie may be said to be the great outlet to western trade and business.

From the foregoing appropriations the following harbors were begun: at Conneaut the improvement was begun in 1829; the river was then obstructed by a bar, and frequently nearly dry, and rarely more than two feet of water; but since the pier has been begun a depth of from ten to eleven feet can be carried from the lake into the river, and after entering the river it is sufficiently deep for half a mile. This harbor is now the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Ohio, and accommodates both States. The whole amount appropriated from 1829 to 1844 is $48,305, and the commerce of the harbor in 1846 was $380,475. At Ashtabula $69,149 has been expended. When the work was begun not more than three feet of water could be commanded at the entrance; now it is adequate for the first class steamers one and a half miles, and the commerce in 1846 was $891,584. Cunningham river received appropriations from 1826 to 1838 to the amount of $28,668, from which appropriations very considerable business sprung up, ware-houses were built, and produce landed; but in 1838 it was reported against by the Government commissioner, as not being sufficiently large to come within the constitutional provision, and it has been permitted to dilapidate.

Amount Expended from 1826 to 1838.

Grand river harbor is one of great safety. When the improvement commenced the river was obstructed by a bar; at first there were only six feet of water, now there are eleven. It is navigable two miles. The commerce of 1846 was $891,584.

Cleveland, by reason of these improvements, has become of great importance. When the improvement began, the river was obstructed by a bar, and occasionally nearly dry; now ten feet of water can be commanded. The commerce of 1846 was $12,559,100; the whole amount appropriated is $149,413.

Black river is navigable for about four miles; at first obstructed by a bar, and sometimes dry, and now nine feet of water. Its commerce in 1846 was $215,040.

Vermillion, by reason of these appropriations, has become an important point; at first, not more than three feet of water, now from six to nine. Commerce of 1846, $137,770.

Huron is also an important harbor, at first obstructed by a bar, and sometimes dry; now ten feet of water.

Sandusky is a very important harbor, and in an unfinished state. Its commerce in 1846 was $5,943,177.

Upon this lake is employed, in connection with more northern lakes, 160,520.71 tonnage of shipping. The commerce of these harbors, in 1846, was $21,018,730. At most, or all of these harbors, are light-houses, warehouses, and other convenient buildings for the transaction of an extensive business with the surrounding country. In all instances the sums appropriated were insufficient to complete the work according to the original design, and for want of subsequent appropriations to finish and repair, they have been, and are now, in a dilapidated condition, by means of which, in many instances, there is great loss of lives and capital. By reason of the harbor at Cleveland, mainly, it has advanced from a common village to be the second city in the State, and bids fair to be among the first in the Union. Sandusky, Painesville, Ashtabula, and Conneaut, from the same causes, have advanced from small villages to cities and towns of much commercial importance.

By these Governmental appropriations a large amount of capital and shipping has been invested, which is now suffering immensely from the want of the continuation of the same policy, by which it was invited and encouraged.

I hold that the Government, by having commenced this policy, and invited the investment of millions of money and employment of hands, are now bound, by every consideration of policy and humanity, to continue it. No country under heaven suffers so much as ours from a vacillating policy.

From 1826 to 1838 this policy was pursued from year to year, until our lakes and rivers were covered with ships, and our shores with cities and villages; and all at once it was unconstitutional and impolitic to continue it, and, with the single exception of 1844, all appropriations have been withheld, and by it the country clad in mourning. No interest so much neglected, the consequence of which is so fatal to our prosperity.

By this bill, many of the most important places are provided for, others are not. It is the product of minds entertaining various views of policy and expediency, designed as an introduction of that neglected yet not abandoned policy, under which our country so much flourished. Let us not extinguish the feeble light, but nurse it as a precursor of that which is to come. The amendment now sought is one among the many means calculated, but not designed, to defeat the object. At no period of our Government has the passage of a bill of this character been of more importance, or more ominous in its effects and consequences. Both of the great political parties of the country are its advocates and supporters, and the country acquiesces and demands it.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. SIBLEY was rejected.

Mr. CURTIS proposed to amend the bill, by inserting the following, viz:

For removing obstructions in the Allegheny, $15,000.

Mr. CURTIS. This amendment proposes to appropriate a small sum for the removal of obstructions which now impede the navigation of the Allegheny river. This river might be made navigable at a very moderate cost from its junction with the Ohio to the New York improvements, thereby affording, after the completion of the Genesee valley canal, a continuous navigable water communication from the waters of the Hudson and the St. Lawrence to those of the Ohio and Mississippi. It may therefore be said with propriety to be a work purely national in all its characteristics. If appropriations for the improvement of the Ohio, such as is contained in this bill now under consideration, are constitutional and expedient, then the one asked for the Allegheny, which is a mere extension of that river, is also constitutional and proper.

I am not one of those who doubt the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate money for the improvement of rivers which are national thoroughfares for our foreign or inland commerce, or the construction of suitable harbors for the accommodation and protection of our shipping. It is a power which has been so long exercised, that if precedent is entitled to any weight in constitutional construction, may be regarded as settled. The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and Indian tribes, is sufficiently explicit to relieve my mind from all constitutional scruples upon the subject of appropriating money for the improvement of rivers, and the erection of harbors, by which our commerce can be extended and protected—or, to use the constitutional language, "regulated." The only difficulty has always been to draw the line of demarcation between those which were national and those which were local. A general system of internal improvements, embracing roads and canals, has at this late day but few advocates. The doctrine may be regarded as fully settled during the administration of General Jackson, in his celebrated veto message of the Maysville road, and acquiesced in by every succeeding Administration, with the exception of Mr. Polk's, whose construction would circumscribe the action of Congress on the subject of improvements to narrower limits than those of any of his predecessors. Upon that subject I am induced to follow in the footsteps of General Jackson, and the Democratic Presidents who preceded him, in their construction of the constitutional powers of Congress over river and harbor improvements, and I am rejoiced to see that the Committee on Commerce have adopted that rule for their guidance in their report of the bill now before the committee; and if the bill can be confined to objects purely national, and such as are necessary for the protection and extension of our commerce, it shall receive my support. I confess, however, that my support would be more cordial, if the amendment which I have proposed should be adopted.

The improvement of the Allegheny comes under that class of national objects which are admitted to be constitutional, because national; indeed, it may be classified with a majority of the appropriations in this bill.

Surveys have been made of this river by highly-competent engineers, and estimates made of the cost of its improvement, showing its entire practicability, at a very moderate expenditure. It does not, therefore, come under the head of a new scheme or project. A very considerable commerce is now carried on by means of steamboats and other craft upon this river, which run regularly, about six months in the year, as far up as Franklin, a distance of about one hundred and twenty miles, and irregularly to Warren, a distance of one hundred and eighty miles from Pittsburgh. This commerce might be very materially augmented by the removal of some of the most prominent existing obstructions in the river, which this appropriation would aid in accomplishing. If the attention which the importance of this channel of communication demands was bestowed upon it by the General Government, the river would be made navigable during most of the year. To all those interested in increasing the facilities of trade between New York with the valley of the Ohio, this improvement especially commends itself. This river is the only natural channel of communication connecting the improvements of New York with the waters of the Ohio, from which the trade of New York is cut off during the early part of the season, or has to seek its way through improvements in Pennsylvania, when a preference is, of course, given to the trade of Philadelphia, subjecting that of New York to great delay, inconvenience, and increased expense.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I should like to ask the gentleman, whether he proposes the removal of the aqueduct and bridge across the Allegheny at Pittsburgh?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to make, under the decision of the Chair, an argument in opposition to this amendment. I propose to fill the full compass of the rule. I am opposed to the amendment.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BISSELL. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river, $50,000.

The adoption of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, will tend to remove, in some measure, one of the most objectionable features of this bill—its unjust and oppressive inequality.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I raise a point of order upon the gentleman.

Mr. BISSELL. Very well. But do not let it be taken out of my five minutes' time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FULLER. His remark was that his amendment would in some degree remove the inequality of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the gentleman from Illinois must confine himself strictly to an explanation of his amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. I shall certainly do so. There seems to be an extraordinary degree of sensitiveness on the part of the gentleman from Maine, and the other members of the committee who have introduced this bill. They seem to have an instinctive knowledge that it cannot stand the test of examination; and in that I agree with them. The amendment which I now submit proposes an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the Illinois river. During the last Congress, what was called a river and harbor bill passed this House, after a careful consideration in the proper committee, and after a lengthy discussion in this House; and it only failed in the Senate for want of time. That bill may be regarded as having received the sanction of the country. It met my approval.

That bill contained an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river. Now, I am at a loss to conceive what new light the committee reporting this bill have received that has induced them to reject that important item? How is it that the Illinois river has so dwindled in importance since the last Congress as to be entitled to no notice at all—not even to be mentioned in an omnibus bill of this sort? The former bill, with an appropriation of $50,000 for the Illinois river, passed the House—failed in the Senate but for want of time, and was sanctioned by the country. Surely, then, the committee reporting this present bill need have had no fears about incorporating that item for the benefit of one of the most important rivers of the West. Or, if $50,000 were too large a sum, they might have proposed thirty, or twenty, or ten thousand at least, for that object. Their map might have shown them that there was such a river as the Illinois, and that, in a business and commercial point of view, it was of some importance.

The State of Illinois, at an expense of more than $6,000,000, has built a magnificent canal connecting Lake Michigan with the Illinois river. The Illinois connects with the Mississippi, which flows directly on to the Atlantic ocean. Unless the Illinois is kept in a navigable condition, our costly canal is comparatively valueless. The State of Illinois, strong as she may feel herself, is yet too poor easily to bear a loss of $6,000,000. Is it possible, that while voting away millions for the improvement of harbors and rivers, Congress will refuse the trifling sum necessary for the improvement of the Illinois, and thus render, in a great measure, valueless the expensive and magnificent canal which that State has at such a great cost constructed? Let me call the attention of the committee to one suggestive fact in connection with this subject?

The Illinois river stands in almost precisely the same commercial position that the Hudson does. It is one link in the chain connecting the lakes with the Atlantic ocean on the west, while the Hudson constitutes a precisely similar link, connecting them with the ocean on the east. The Illinois river, uniting with the canal, may be said to connect the lakes with the Atlantic ocean—so does the Hudson. In position and in commercial importance they are almost identical, except that the one is west and the other is east of the Alleghany mountains. Now, for the improvement of the Hudson this bill appropriates $50,000; for the improvement of the Illinois, nothing. Altogether pass by the fact that the Hudson has heretofore received thousands upon thousands of dollars from the Government, while the Illinois has never received a cent, and complain only at this time of the injustice meditated by this particular bill. Sir, this bill is unequal, inequitable, monstrously unjust—if it be in order to speak of the bill. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to allude to the merits or demerits of the bill in discussing this amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. Strictly speaking, I suppose not; but if I allude to it at all, what else can I say? I cannot say that it is a just bill. [Laughter.] The chairman of the committee [Mr. Seymour] tells me to say nothing about it. That, no doubt, is the proper injunction to give to the friends of the bill, and upon their observance of that injunction depends its safety. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I will agree that the gentleman from Illinois makes out a very strong case. If any case could be put where there has been an omission, the case he puts is one of the strongest, and particularly because this river and canal connecting with it have had from the Government a large appropriation of the land of the United States, a railroad some where in the vicinity of this canal has had a grant which the friends of it say is equal to $20,000,000. This, therefore, I say, furnishes a very strong case in behalf of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. BISSELL. Does the gentleman say that any land or money has been applied by the General Government to the Illinois river?

Mr. FULLER. I understand that appropriation of alternate sections of land has been heretofore made to aid in building the canal of which the gentleman has spoken.

Mr. BISSELL. Yes, sir, and in addition to that, that canal has cost the State of Illinois more than $6,000,000.

Mr. FULLER. I do not doubt that, and so have a great many other canals cost a vast deal of money which the Government has not contributed a cent towards; hence I conceive that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] has made out a very strong case!

Mr. McMULLIN. I rise to a point of order, [laughter] and it is, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Fuller] should confine his remarks to the subject-matter under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Maine is opposing the amendment.

Mr. FULLER. I was only stating reasons why I could not go for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask for tellers upon my amendment.

Mr. WARD. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Cumberland river, $49,000.

I am only desirous to secure what I conceive to be justice to that particular river, and in so doing I hope that the House will not consider me unnecessarily troublesome. I am not in the habit of demanding or asking at the hands of Congress any favor which my judgment does not clearly and conclusively show is right in itself; and when I am satisfied that what I do ask is right, I feel myself authorized to resort to all legitimate means for obtaining it. The Cumberland river, for which I desire an appropriation to be made, received, in the year 1832, during General Jackson's administration, an appropriation of $30,000; in 1834 it received an appropriation of $30,000; in 1836 it received an appropriation of $20,000; in 1837 it received an appropriation of $55,000; and in 1838 it received an appropriation of $20,000. I think that these facts clearly and conclusively demonstrate the fact that Congress have uniformly, upon an examination of that stream, been satisfied that this was a stream of a national character, which demanded action at the hands of the General Government. It is a stream that is navigable for upwards of six hundred miles, running through the States of Tennessee and Kentucky.

But this is not the only point upon which I base the claim for an appropriation for this river. It is true that as great an amount of trade does not pass down that stream as down the Hudson river. It is our misfortune to live in a country more sparsely settled than that upon the Hudson; but there are individuals living upon the Cumberland who are as much entitled to the protection of this Government as those more fortunate, living upon the Hudson. This bill proposes to give to the Hudson river $50,000 for a navigation of one hundred and fifty miles, while the proposition I present is to give, for the improvement of the Cumberland river, $49,000 for a navigation of six hundred miles. It is not the number of individuals involved—it is not the amount of produce which comes down a stream, that gives it a national character. The duty of the Government is as great to protect half a dozen individuals settled upon a stream, which is national in its character, as it would be to protect a million. It is true, if they have not the same voting power—if they have not the same influence in attempting to thwart measures which are in themselves unjust, as would the million, yet, according to the principles of justice, if we examine the matter philosophically, they have as much right to the protecting arm of the Government as would larger numbers. We have no railroad in that country, by means of which we can transport our produce to market. We are dependent alone upon this single stream, and we are surrounded by mountains in every direction. The citizens who inhabit the valley of that river are industrious and enterprising; and I do hope and trust that the friends of this bill will not force from its support those who are in favor of the principle of the improvement of rivers and harbors. They may find, if they force A, B, and C from supporting this bill, that when the final vote is to be taken, they will not have strength enough to carry out this or any other improvement. I am anxious to see a system of improvements commenced, and I wish to see such a system established upon broad, just, and general principles.

Mr. CARTTER. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. WARD demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. KING of New York, and GAYLORD were appointed.

The question was then taken upon Mr. WARD's amendment, and there were—ayes 58, noes 59.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MACE. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

For the improvement of the Wabash river, $50,000.

I offer this amendment in good faith, and I believe it should be adopted by the committee. The Wabash river is a river that is strictly national in its character—as much so as the Hudson or any other river that has been mentioned. It is navigable for most of the season, for four hundred and fifty miles, dividing the frontier between the States of Illinois and Indiana, for about three hundred miles. If the few obstructions which exist in that river were removed it would make it navigable all the season, except when frozen over. The question of its importance is not a new question before the country. In 1832, an appropriation passed both Houses of Congress appropriating for this river, if I remember correctly, $100,000. That appropriation was vetoed by General Jackson, upon the ground that there was no port of entry upon that river. Subsequently, the Congress of the United States made Lafayette a port of entry, obviating that objection, but from that time to the present, no appropriation has been made. Now, I am not disposed to make an assault upon this bill, and I will state to the friends of it that I am in favor of its principles, and unless I change my mind—whether my appropriation is made or not—I think I shall vote for it. The people occupying the portion of the State of Indiana which I represent, are in favor of such improvements. We have our Wabash and Erie canal, extending from Evansville to Toledo, upon Lake Erie—the longest canal in the United States, upon which our productions find their way North and South, and especially in a northerly direction.

I feel as much interested in the improvement of the Hudson river, the harbor at Buffalo, and all these improvements in this bill, as any other man; but I do ask this committee—and I ask them in good faith—and I ask it because I believe it is right and just—to appropriate $50,000 for the improvement of the Wabash river. There can be no objection to it. It is a small sum of money. I think it will be the settled policy of the country to engage in improvements of the kind contemplated by the bill. If it is to be the policy, let the precedent be settled in favor of the Wabash river as well as other rivers of a like character; let these appropriations be made, and then the country will become harmonious, and such appropriations will not enter into the political contests of the day. I trust, as I have before stated, that this committee will seriously consider my amendment, and vote for the small appropriation asked for in it. Upon the amendment I have offered I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARTTER offered the following amendment to the amendment:

For the improvement of the Tuscarawas river, $10,000.

Mr. C. said: Mr. Chairman, it may not be known to the committee that the Tuscarawas river is a very important river, but it is a river that has flowed a great many years. When it commenced flowing, the history of the region of that country does not give; but, it is supposed, shortly after the subsidence of Noah's flood. It is a very interesting river in its Indian legendary, and has been appropriated to national commerce long before the discovery of this continent by Columbus. [Laughter.] Bark canoes have, in days gone by, floated down the Tuscarawas, and it is said that they always floated down easier than they floated up. [Laughter.] From time immemorial its beautiful waters have been very important; for, if it were not for the waters of the Tuscarawas, and some other streams, the Mississippi river would be unfurnished with water. [Laughter.] In this point of view, the committee will perceive that it is of the highest importance to the national commerce of the country; and I hope that this recommendation of this river will be sufficient to move their vote one way or the other upon the subject. [Laughter.]

There is another consideration which operates with me personally—

Mr. CLARKE. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether this is in pursuance of the order promulgated by the chairman this morning, or the higher law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the gentleman is giving his reasons why his amendment should be adopted, and that he is in order.

Mr. BISSELL. I rise to a question of order. I think it is not in order for the gentleman to encroach upon the province of Dan Rice—at any rate not in the House of Representatives. I make that point. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Then the Chair decides that it is becoming in the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] to do so?

Mr. CARTTER. I am aware that my amendment may be opposed by other rivals. [Great laughter.] I will say to my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] that I do not wish to oppose my amendment to the prejudice of his, and I am willing to admit, if he institutes a comparison, that the Illinois river is a little longer than the Tuscawawas river; nevertheless, in the ratio of the amount of water, the Tuscawawas is just as important as the Illinois river. My own impression in reference to both is, that it will be found, in the lapse of time, that all these improvements had better be in the direction of supplying water. [Laughter.] For it will be found, in the history of the cultivation of the country, that the great difficulty is the want of water. Now, I hope, with these substantial recommendations of this amendment, that it may be placed alongside of and considered with others.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman may be allowed to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CARTTER. I will withdraw it.

Mr. STEVENS objected.

The question was then taken upon Mr. CARTTER's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withhold his amendment until a vote is taken on the amendment that I offered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well; I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BISSELL demanded tellers upon his amendment, but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, offered the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Rock river rapids, in the Mississippi, $50,000.

Mr. STEVENS. To increase the rapids?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir, to increase their rapid usefulness. I intend, sir, to confine myself to the explanation of this amendment, and I have only a few words to say.

In the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce, the general appropriation for the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and some other rivers, is made to take effect below the Des Moines rapids, about one hundred and fifty miles below the Rock river rapids, in the Mississippi river; therefore no part of that appropriation can be applied to the improvement of the Rock river rapids. That same bill contains an appropriation of $50,000, to be applied to the improvement of the Des Moines rapids in the Mississippi river, and to those rapids alone. No appropriation, then, thus far has been suggested for the improvement of the Rock river rapids, in the Mississippi river. Now, sir, these rapids are about eighteen miles in length, and they offer to the free navigation of the Mississippi river almost insurmountable obstructions when the water is in a low state. Last spring the Post Office Department established a river mail from St. Louis to Galena, a point about one hundred miles above these rapids. Since the season of low water has commenced, the company having that contract have been under the necessity of stopping their large boats, and making arrangements to run boats above the rapids. It will be seen, therefore, for the national purpose of transportation of the mail on this great national stream, that the improvement of these rapids is essentially necessary. If, sir, the appropriation of $50,000 should be carried into effect for the improvement of the Des Moines rapids, it makes it more necessary and more essential that some improvement of a corresponding character should be made in the rapids situate or located one hundred and fifty miles above them on the same stream.

In 1837, under an act of Congress, and in obedience to an order from the War Department, an engineer made a survey of these rapids, and it has been ascertained that the appropriation of a very small sum, something, of course, over $50,000, but $50,000 itself would make a very great improvement in the navigation of the upper rapids. The river is here crossed by chains of rock stretching from shore to shore. The channel is narrow and ruinous, and there are ledges of projecting rocks, that reach into the channel, which are necessary to be removed. If these rocks were removed, the channel would not only be straitened, but it would be widened, and thereby make the navigation of it a great deal more safe and easy than it is at present.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. The remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from Illinois deserve a few words of explanation from the committee.

I would say that both propositions for the improvement of the Des Moines and the Rock river rapids were before the committee. The charts, surveys, and estimates were all examined; and the committee were satisfied that the chief obstructions to the navigation upon these rapids were in the Des Moines rapids at the lower part of them; and for the purpose of seeing whether these obstructions could not be in a great measure removed—about which there had been some doubt, so much as to suggest the propriety of constructing a canal around both rapids—the committee concluded to recommend $50,000 for the purpose of removing the chief difficulty, the principal obstructions, which we understood are at the foot of the Des Moines rapids. Now, if this operation—which we contemplate by this bill, and which we have restricted to two chains as they have been surveyed by an engineer, and are described in the bill as the lower chain, and the English chain—should prove as successful upon a further examination, as we hope it will, then we can go on with propriety at a subsequent time, and make other appropriations for removing some of the difficulties to which the gentleman from Illinois has alluded. The whole amount of the estimate for this work is, I think, nearly half a million of money.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. This estimate, it will be remembered, was made in 1837, when the country was unsettled, and when it was very expensive both with regard to procuring and employing men, and obtaining materials to commence operations with. At the present time, sir, the country is densely settled, all materials are on the ground, and provisions and everything else are greatly cheapened. Besides that, it has been ascertained that about half the expense estimated by that officer, would so improve these rapids as to make the navigation free and easy. I therefore do not consider that the estimate made thirteen or fourteen years ago, under the circumstances in which the country was then situated, is a proper estimate by which to judge of the expense that would be necessary for the proposed removal of these obstructions to navigation.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I am gratified to learn that we may hope, at a future day, to perform this work, if the experiment which, with this $50,000, we propose to make in the most difficult part, is successful, at a less sum than has been estimated. But it was the opinion of the committee, and also of the Topographical Bureau, that $50,000 would be all that could be advantageously employed during the present fiscal year.

I hope the amendment, therefore, will not prevail.

Mr. CAMPBELL demanded tellers, but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB offered the following amendment:

For improving the Tennessee river, $120,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, above and below the Muscle Shoals in the said river.

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to raise a question of order, whether an amendment, substantially the same as the one having been once or twice presented to the committee, and voted down, can be again offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not the same. It proposes a different amount, and therefore the Chair thinks that it is in order.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, when I offered an amendment to this bill of $75,000, a few days since, I offered it then, as I do this now, in good faith. I understood, in the course of the discussion upon the various amendments, and, in fact, in relation to the very one I offered of $75,000, that there was particular objection to it, because it was not large enough. I have understood, sir, that there were men in this House who determined to vote against that amendment, because the amount was not large enough. Now, when I offered that amendment of $75,000, I did it with a view to make it correspond with the principle of the bill proposed by the committee. I observed, very clearly, from an examination of that bill, that the object of the committee was to appropriate alone to legitimate objects. They omitted some evidently, and the second object was to curtail the expenditure at this time as much as possible. I thought then that this $75,000, perhaps, would be about the proportion that that particular section of country ought to have, compared with the amounts that the bill proposed then to appropriate. Since then I have been told that that amount would not be worthy of consideration, and from the action of this House, when I called for tellers, but three solitary gentlemen rising, and when my vote was taken, no more than five voting for it, it was evident that I was mistaken in the amount, and I now propose to increase it to $120,000.

Sir, when I was discussing the propriety of the appropriation for the Tennessee river, when I last addressed this House, I did so with great reluctance. I do so with great reluctance now, for I assure the House and the country that nothing is more taxing to me—I was going to say to my modesty—than to rise and address this House upon any occasion. But, sir, duty is the highest law with which I am acquainted. Duty demands that I should make a strenuous effort, and I tell this House and the country that it is the last effort I intend making for the improvement of the Tennessee river. If I do not succeed in this, I beg to say that whenever the substitute is proposed for this bill, I intend to vote against it, although the Tennessee river has therein an appropriation of $50,000. I do this for the reason that I believe the substitute is improper. I shall vote against it upon the ground that I believe such a bill ought not to pass this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. COBB. I will return to my amendment instantly.

I believe, sir, that the sum of $120,000 ought to be appropriated for the purpose of improving the Tennessee river. When I addressed the committee before, I believe I was floundering upon the rock just below Chattanooga, and endeavoring to descend, but now I will turn from that rock, and pass upwards. There are, as I understand, many individuals who inquire as if it had been a doubtful thing heretofore—and I suppose this is more playfully than otherwise—where is the Tennessee river? The Tennessee river that this amendment proposes to improve, rises in the States of North Carolina and Virginia, and proceeds through both those States into the State of Tennessee. It then runs through Tennessee into Alabama, in the northeastern portion of that State, entirely through the State of Alabama; it then proceeds into a portion of Mississippi—or, at least, we may say Mississippi bounds that river upon the South—passing between the States of Tennessee and Mississippi, then into the State of Tennessee and into Kentucky, and empties into the great Ohio.

Mr. COBB asked for tellers; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. McNAIR offered the following amendment:

For the repairs of the works at Marcus Hook, on the Delaware river, below Philadelphia, $5,000.

Mr. McN. said: Mr. Chairman, although this is a good bill and more moderate in its appropriations than some former ones, yet I do not think it is perfect. These piers, for the repair of which I ask a small appropriation, were not built by the Government, but they were ceded to it by the State of Pennsylvania. Therefore there can be no ground for saying that these piers cost the Government anything originally. They are now in a state of dilapidation, and are almost useless on account of their decay. The materials are rotting, and the mud is covering them over. When these piers were ceded to the Government by Pennsylvania, it was the understanding and the agreement that the Government should keep them in repair for the benefit of commerce on the Delaware river. Therefore there is an obligation on the part of this Government to keep them in repair; and she does not act in good faith towards Pennsylvania if she does not. The report of the Topographical Engineer concludes with calling the "attention to the fact not generally known that the United States,

* in accepting the cession from the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania of the harbors on the Delaware, being those of Port Penn, Newcastle, Marcus Hook, and Chester, guaranteed to keep them in repair."

The citizens of the town of Marcus Hook, in their memorial to Congress, ask $20,000; but in this amendment I only ask for them the small sum of $5,000, in order that, being so reasonable, I might get what I ask. I hope it will be borne in mind by this House that these piers are situated on the west side of the river Delaware, which is at that place about three miles in width, and that all the vessels sailing to and from the great city of Philadelphia, containing four hundred and nine thousand inhabitants, sail by these piers. Now, it may seem to some persons in this House that the repair of these piers is not of much importance to commerce; but we must take into consideration that these piers are the cause of a little harbor being formed below them for vessels of large size, and that that harbor in times of storm, and most especially when the river is full of ice, is a matter of very great importance. Many times in the winter vessels of large size find protection there from the ice.

I cannot agree with some gentlemen of this House, who think that the West and North get too little appropriation in proportion to the East. There are in the bill $86,000 for the Delaware river below Philadelphia, and none above on tide-water, a distance of forty miles. Now, Philadelphia is a large city, and her commerce extends to every commercial country in the world, and Pennsylvania is a large State, asking for appropriations for none of her rivers except the Delaware, and we think, in proportion to other parts of the United States, the amount is small. From the calculation that I have made, I find that the Atlantic States obtain, according to the present bill, $377,000; the Southwest and West $535,000; and the North on the lakes $503,000. This seems to be a pretty good division in the different sections of the Union.

There is one thing said about the East which I think is unjust, and that is, that the Atlantic States have received a very large amount from the Government for their rivers and harbors many years ago, and therefore they should not receive so much now. It should be remembered that the old States paid for all these things themselves long before the new States came into the Union, and they have now equal right to appropriations with the new ones.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. McNair, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. It seems to me that there have been votes enough taken to satisfy this committee that no amendment is intended to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose an amendment?

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir; I move to strike out the first section of the bill, from the third to the seventh line.

The CHAIRMAN. We have passed that part of the bill, and therefore no amendment to it is in order. We are now at the eighth line.

Mr. STANTON. Then I move to strike out the words, "For the continuation of the Delaware breakwater, $30,000."

Mr. Chairman, I suppose that there have been votes enough taken to satisfy this committee that no amendment is to be made to the bill by way of addition. I now propose to see whether this committee will make any amendment by way of subtraction.

The Committee on Commerce appropriate for the Atlantic coast a large part of the $1,500,000, and the great Mississippi valley, embracing one half of the population and more than one half of the commerce of the country, gets only one sixth of the appropriations. The Mississippi and its tributaries have an appropriation of $260,000, out of $1,500,000, which is only one sixth of the aggregate amount. Every one knows that the appropriations for the eastern section and for the Atlantic slope are for the improvement of tide-water rivers, where there are no obstructions to navigation. Here is an appropriation of $50,000 to the Hudson, a stream without obstructions, and where there never has been a solitary vessel lost by obstructions to the navigation; whilst upon the Ohio, to which we have not appropriated a dollar for fourteen years, four hundred and fifty lives have been lost within a year. Now, I ask the Representatives of the Mississippi valley, if they intend that these appropriations shall all go eastward and to the Atlantic coast, and if the one half of the population of the country which they represent, is to be content with one sixth of the appropriations contained in these river and harbor bills? I myself am prepared to strike at the enacting clause of the bill, and to take the responsibility before the country of defeating the whole bill, unless there is to be something like equality. It does so happen, strangely enough, that the majority of the committee which reported this bill are from the Atlantic slope.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Are these remarks in order?

The CHAIRMAN. They are not. The gentleman must confine his remarks strictly to his amendment, and show why this appropriation should be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. STANTON. Then I have nothing more to say.

Mr. RIDDLE. As the gentleman from Ohio has given no reasons why his amendment to strike out the appropriation for the Delaware breakwater should prevail, it may, perhaps, be unnecessary for me to detain the committee with a word upon the necessity of that appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, I presume there is no member of this House who, knowing the advantages of this breakwater to the commerce of our country, the condition of the work, and that it has been constructed by Congress at an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars, perhaps millions, as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] would now be willing to strike out an appropriation which will enable us to complete and preserve it. This, sir, is not a State matter. It is not, because it bears the name of the Delaware breakwater, a State improvement. It is essentially a national work, and one in which the citizens of New Orleans, or any commercial city of the United States, have more interest than the citizens of Delaware. I have known nearly two hundred vessels, from every section of the United States, and from almost every portion of the world, to be at one time riding in safety in this breakwater; whereas, if it had not been there, perhaps one fifth of these vessels would have been lost, and the lives on board destroyed. Sir, when I say it is the interest of the Government to complete this work, I speak of what I am well convinced. My attention was directed to the subject some time since. My observation has taught me that the amount reported by the committee will not only enable the Government to replace the stones which have been washed away, but lay upon them a capping, or heavy course, which will resist the storms and ice, and preserve the substructure from the effects of the lashing waves. Yet the gentleman from Ohio rises from his seat, and, with coolness and deliberation, moves to strike out this appropriation, small as it is, which is calculated, not only to preserve the work which has been done, but to complete it, and protect, to a great degree, the commerce of the country and the world.

Sir, vessels from all parts of the Union are compelled, at times, to seek this breakwater for safety. The rice and cotton of the South; the products of the Middle States, and the manufactures of the North, as well as the most valuable cargoes of foreign goods, frequently float there, side by side, and, during the raging of the storm, defy the winds and the waves. This protection to our commerce has been afforded by an American Congress, but not quite to the extent it deserves. If the work be not speedily completed, that which has already been constructed must inevitably be destroyed, and Congress will, at an early day, have to appropriate four times the amount now asked for. I therefore trust that the proposition of the gentleman will be voted down.

Mr. STANTON called for tellers; but they were not ordered.

And the question being taken upon the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. TUCK. I desire to offer an amendment to that clause.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. After a motion to strike out the clause, no amendment to it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out does not preclude a motion to amend, according to our rules.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have always understood that after the vote was taken on a motion to strike out a clause, it could no longer be amended.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the parliamentary law, but an exception is made by our rules. The 53d rule is as follows:

"A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert."

Mr. TUCK offered the following amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river $44,000."

Mr. T. said: Mr. Chairman, as an eastern man, when I had taken a survey of the appropriations contained in this bill, I confess I was surprised that the Illinois river had not received any attention from the committee. I believe it to be an oversight on the part of the committee, and if they had received and had had before them the information which has been laid before this committee, they must have been unanimous in favor of some appropriation for the Illinois river.

I proposed this amendment, being fully aware that the committee have several times voted down propositions to improve this river; but I believe that a more full consideration of, and a more careful inquiry into, the importance of this river will lead to a different result. It has some two hundred and fifty miles of navigable waters, making it one of the most important rivers in the West. Having traveled several times over that river, I have been astonished at the amount of business done upon it—at the magnitude of its commerce compared with that of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. I ask the committee to remember this fact. There are more arrivals of steamboats at St. Louis from the Illinois than from any other western river.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? What particular points upon the Illinois river need improvements?

Mr. TUCK. There are twenty-eight bars between La Salle and the mouth of the Illinois, which are impediments to the navigation of this river. By the removal of some four of these bars, at a cost of some $50,000, the capacity of the river will be increased, as shown by surveys, so that it will exceed that of the Ohio river.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. The point I wish to make is this: That the mere change of the sum for the accomplishment of the same object is not such a change as to allow the amendment to be offered again after having been once rejected. After it has been once rejected by the committee, the rule excludes it from being offered again.

Mr. TUCK. That point has been overruled within half an hour.

Mr. JOHNSON. If we are to understand that any change of sum, from one cent to half a million of dollars, will permit the same amendment to be offered over again we shall never get through with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that according to the practice of the committee such amendments have been allowed, and he does not feel authorized to change that practice. He overrules the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I then take an appeal, and I hope the committee will decide that amendments can be offered once and no more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas raises the point of order, that an amendment, having been once offered for the improvement of the Illinois river, and voted down, that it is not in order to offer another amendment appropriating a different sum for the same purpose. The Chair overrules the point of order. From that decision the gentleman from Arkansas appeals, and the question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

[A message was here received from the Senate, announcing the passage by that body of the following bills:

Joint resolution for the relief of George R. C. Floyd, late Secretary of Wisconsin Territory, and sureties; and

An act to protect actual settlers upon the land upon the line of the Central Railroad and branches, by granting preemption rights thereto.]

Mr. JOHNSON demanded tellers upon the appeal; but they were not ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure the question could not have been understood. I call for a division upon the question.

The House was then divided, and there appeared to be no quorum voting.

By unanimous consent, tellers were then ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and LETCHER were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. TUCK, (resuming.) I have proposed this amendment not because I had any particular partiality for the western country, but because I believed an appropriation ought to be made for the improvement of this river, if any harbor and river bill should ever pass Congress. The Illinois river passes through the great State of Illinois, embracing a tract of country of greater fertility than any other of equal extent in the whole country. That State now sends seven Representatives to Congress, and in the next Congress will send nine. The Illinois river runs through the richest portion of that country, and connects and communicates, by means of other rivers, with the most distant parts of the State. I think if the committee will consider the magnitude of this river, and the extent of the commerce carried over it, they will consent to include this appropriation in the bill.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I desire to know if the gentleman is not acting under the five minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The time taken up by the point of order which was raised is not taken out of the gentleman's time, and his five minutes have not yet expired.

Mr. TUCK. I hope gentlemen will permit this general system of internal improvement to be perfected by introducing this meritorious item. They may be prevented hereafter from adopting any "general system;" and I advise them to make the present system as perfect as possible. Let them do all they can to develop the resources of the country before they become bound, hand and foot, according to the Democratic platform, against all improvements, either for East or West.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment, both as an eastern man and as a fair-minded man. As an eastern man, I am opposed to it upon this ground: If western men are disposed to put eastern men in a wrong position, I am disposed to correct them. Now, sir, this bill contains within it appropriations for improvements west of the slope of the Alleghany range of mountains to the amount of $717,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that he must confine his remarks strictly to showing why this particular amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. FULLER. That is precisely what I am doing. I am bringing my argument directly to bear upon the point to show why the gentleman's amendment should not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that any remarks upon the general merits or demerits of the bill are not in order.

Mr. FULLER. Certainly. I am bringing my remarks to show why the appropriation should not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The point the Chair makes is, that the rule closing debate is positive, and that the rule granting five minutes' debate must be construed strictly to apply to remarks in explanation of the amendment or in opposition to the particular amendment under consideration. No allusion can be made to the merits or demerits of the bill itself.

Mr. FULLER. Well, sir, I will endeavor to confine myself to the rules prescribed by the Chair.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a suggestion. While I believe the Chair to be decidedly correct in his decision, I beg to ask this question: Suppose the amendment offered was already provided in the bill, would it not be competent to oppose it upon the ground that the very same provision was in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STUART. Well, that is just what the gentleman was doing.

Mr. FULLER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion. I say the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire should not be adopted, because it will be doing injustice to other sections of the country, and because it would be making an appropriation for a section of country which has no claim upon the Government, and which has been amply and liberally provided for.

Mr. TUCK. Then I understand the gentleman to object to this amendment because the West have already larger appropriations than the East. Now, I would ask him if the West have not voted for appropriations to be expended upon the Atlantic coast many times when they had not one dollar appropriated to themselves?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge. I am not aware of any bill of this kind in which the western country has not its full share of the public money.

Another reason why I am opposed to the appropriation recommended in the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire is, that there are no estimates from the proper Department for the amount required upon that river. There are no particular obstructions pointed out, and no particular estimates for the removal of those obstructions; so that the committee can determine whether the appropriations contained in this amendment are proper or not.

Mr. YATES. In the remarks which I submitted upon this subject on Saturday, I showed that estimates had been made. I referred to a report of the Topographical Bureau made to the Senate, showing what those obstructions were, and their number. This information the gentleman can find in my printed speech, published in the Globe of this morning.

Mr. FULLER. I do not pretend to deny that there may have been at some time an exploration and survey of the Illinois river. What I desire to say is, that there has been no survey, accompanying the sum which it is now proposed to appropriate, showing its pertinency to the improvement for which it is to be made.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. TUCK demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. I offer the following amendment, viz:

For the removal of a bar in Sandusky Bay, on Lake Erie, at the mouth of Sandusky river, $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, I do not offer this amendment for the purpose of obstructing the passage of this bill, nor do I desire to take up the time of the committee in discussing it. I will simply say that while the entrances of almost every river and harbor upon Lake Erie have received appropriations, this one has been entirely neglected. We have expended ourselves $10,000 in removing obstructions in the river, and we now ask for this sum for the removal of the bar in the bay, at the mouth of the river.

There is considerable commerce carried on there, although to a great disadvantage in consequence of that obstruction, and simple justice to that section of the lake country requires that we should have this appropriation. We only ask, sir, an amount equal to that which we have made up by private enterprise, and expended upon that work. I hope, Mr. Chairman, the amendment will be agreed to. I call for tellers on the question.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MOLONY. Mr. Chairman, I propose the following amendment:

For the construction of a breakwater and piers at Waukegan, Illinois, $10,000.

There was submitted to the Committee on Commerce an estimate for a harbor of refuge at this port, on Lake Michigan, with reasons why an appropriation should be made for it, which should have been conclusive in favor of it with the committee.

Colonel Abert, the head of the Topographical Corps, reports, in response to a call made upon him by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, "that from an actual and careful survey of that port, he is convinced of the necessity of a harbor of refuge there for the safety of the general commerce of the lakes;" and he accordingly submits, for the consideration of the committee, an estimate which was about one half the amount of any estimate ever submitted for a harbor upon Lake Michigan, which, he says, will make a harbor of refuge at that port better than any one now upon the lakes.

When the committee consider that not less than $2,000,000 and six hundred lives have been lost upon the northwestern lakes, in the last four years, and that for the last fourteen years not one dollar has been appropriated to the commerce there, it is hoped that an object so strongly recommended by that officer, whose position enables him to know, and whose duty it is to report in relation to the urgent necessities of that commerce, and to whose report the greatest respect should be paid by the committee and the House, will not be rejected by the committee. The committee have gone behind the Topographical Bureau, whenever injustice to any particular locality has been charged upon them, alleging that no estimates had been submitted by the War Department for the object; also affirming that, as a rule of action, they had been guided by it in their recommendations in this bill now pending.

The rule adopted by the committee is generally a very correct one; but in this instance they have violated their own rule, and not reported in favor of this object—a harbor of refuge at Waukegan—which had been urged upon their favorable consideration, by reasons as cogent as any submitted in behalf of any object in the bill.

The committee have clearly departed from a rule of action of their own adoption, showing no good reason for it, and I hope that my amendment will be adopted by the committee. I demand tellers on the question.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The next clause of the bill was then reported as follows:

"For the construction of a harbor on the east side of Reedy Island, Port Penn, Delaware, $51,000."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out that clause in the bill.

I make my motion, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of hearing from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the considerations which induced the committee to put that clause in the bill.

I find, upon an examination of the estimates by which the committee were guided, no trace of an estimate for this work. I understand that upon the west side of that island, a harbor is already constructed, and I do not understand why we should commence the construction of one upon the east side of the island. This is a large appropriation, and probably the gentlemen at the head of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. SEYMOUR] can explain the necessity of it.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I have heretofore called the attention of the committee in general terms, to this appropriation for the construction of a harbor on the east side of Reedy Island, Port Penn, in Delaware. Port Penn was one of those points on the Delaware river, where a pier, constructed by the State authorities, was many years ago ceded to the General Government, with an understanding that the Government should keep it in repair. The Government proceeded, for several years, to appropriate large sums of money for the purpose of keeping in repair these works, which were upon the west side of the island, and between that and the western shore of the Delaware. But it has been found that the old structure will not answer the purpose for which it was intended, so well as the construction of another harbor of the same character upon the eastern side of this small island, where the water is deeper, and where a better anchorage can be had for ships. And I will say to the committee, that the difference of expense between the new structure that is proposed, and the repair of the old structure, is about two thousand dollars.

The whole subject has been referred to the Topographical Bureau, and they sent an officer of great ability, a topographical engineer, who examined into the matter, and I hold in my hand a long correspondence, and several voluminous and very interesting reports upon that subject, which are full of proofs of the necessity of the harbor, and the expediency of constructing that upon the east side of this island, a short distance from the old works, rather than going on with the improvement and repairs of the old structure.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would inquire if those estimates were submitted to the Committee on Commerce by the Topographical Bureau, or were they contained in the printed estimates from the heads of the bureaus to Congress?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I will answer. There were a great variety of petitions and memorials from persons interested in the navigation of these waters, showing the necessity of this work; but before the Committee on Commerce proceeded to adopt it they sent to the Topographical Bureau and desired from them an investigation of the proposed work. They made the investigation, and returned to us a full report, going into detail, showing the expenditure necessary to complete the work, and also the expediency of it. Those are the documents to which I referred.

Mr. MARSHALL. If I understand the chairman of the committee, the old pier upon the west side of the island is still standing.

Mr. SEYMOUR. It is standing in a dilapidated condition; and the Topographical Bureau believe it to be an unwise expenditure to put repairs upon it, and that it would be cheaper, and better subserve the interests of commerce to construct this new harbor, which is but a short way from the old one.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I would call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the depth of the water there.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I referred to that subject, but should have added that upon taking the sounding upon the western side of Reedy Island, it was found that if we should go on with that structure, we should not have a work of much utility. The large ships passing up the Delaware river could not be protected there. The work would be of little service, whereas upon the eastern side of the island, and but a short distance from the old work, a most excellent protection can be obtained by the ice-harbor, which is proposed to be constructed, as is described here in the particular estimates we have, and which can be built for the sum we have named in the bill.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HEBARD. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the twelfth line:

For continuing the breakwater structure, and improving the harbor, at Burlington, Lake Champlain, Vermont, $15,000.

From the intimations which have fallen in the committee, it would seem there is a determination that no amendments to the bill shall be adopted. If that be so, I, of course, suppose that the amendment I have just submitted will share the fate of all others. Whatever may be the determination of the Committee of the Whole, or the committee who reported this bill, I shall not neglect my duty, but present the amendment. I have offered it in good faith, believing the appropriation contemplated proper, and that it should be incorporated into the bill; and I say this from the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, some days ago, declared the rule, which in some measure guided them, was to make these appropriations where the wants and necessities of the commercial community had already been developed, and where works had already been commenced, but not completed. This is different from almost all the other amendments that have been offered. This is the only work which has ever received any aid from the Government in the State of Vermont. It was commenced some fifteen or more years ago, but it has had no appropriation since 1844, and now remains in an unfinished condition. The money which has been already expended will be lost unless the work is carried forward to completion. It is a place where there is a very considerable commerce, and where there would be a very good harbor, but for the fact that it receives the sweep of the winds from the west and northwest which sometimes renders the navigation of the lake very dangerous.

I hope there will be no objection to this amendment. I hold out no threats of what will be my action if it be rejected, but I hope that the good sense of the committee who reported the bill will interpose no objection to its incorporation into it. It has, I believe, received the recommendation of the Department every year. This very year the amount of appropriation in my amendment has been estimated for and recommended by the Engineer department. The reports of that department have set forth, better than I could, the reasons and necessities of this appropriation. I do not know, sir, by what measure of justice or by what rule of action that committee were guided when they omitted to take into consideration this appropriation, thus recommended and so much needed, and when it is based upon the very ground which I understood the chairman to say was their rule of action. I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I wish only to say a few words in opposition to this amendment, and it does seem to me that gentlemen proposing amendments act upon the idea that the Union is to be dissolved, or we are to be conquered by the British. They certainly seem to consider that there is to be no other harbor and river bill than the one before the committee. This system is necessarily a progressive one, and to be gradually extended. If we were to extend the provisions of this bill to all the cases presented by gentlemen, or even to those of the description of that presented by the honorable member, [Mr. HEBARD], the appropriations thus made at one time would be unreasonably large. At the renewal of the system we must establish certain rules for our government. Let gentlemen recollect that there has been no appropriation for fourteen years, and that the undertaking now must necessarily be of a progressive character, and gradual development. What rule, then, have the committee acted upon?

In making these appropriations, the committee looked first to the great highways of human intercourse and the great channels of trade—the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Arkansas, and other rivers of that description. And looking to the Mississippi, we appropriate in one item, $75,000 for the improvement of its mouth, in which some twelve or fifteen States are interested. We appropriate large sums for its improvement at other points. And so with regard to the Ohio. We must adopt this rule, sir, or otherwise the whole scheme must fail.

Mr. SACKETT. I rise to a question of order. Is not the gentleman debating the merits of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I say that this amendment is not in order, because it does not come under the rule which we must adopt in entering upon these improvements anew. We must confine ourselves at the outset to the great highways of human intercourse and the great channels of trade, and then the other points which are subordinate in interest can be deliberately considered as legislation in the premises progresses. There has been a good deal of anecdote told and argument urged in this matter. The complaints preferred are similar to those which may be made by a greedy man, that he cannot swallow at one meal enough to last him a lifetime. Gentlemen might as well complain that committees had not put in the Navy or Army bill at a particular session, an amount that would sustain either institution for twenty years. The argument of gentlemen is against the whole nature of the system. Why, sir, the debt of the United States, as was remarked to me this morning, is $60,000,000, upon which we pay an annual interest of more than $3,000,000. And here is a Government thus indebted by one single item appropriating $1,500,000. Is not that enough for one season? Is it not enough, looking to the incumbrance upon the Government? I have this further to say, that if this system is not to be a gradual one, if it is not to be progressive and founded upon surveys and estimates, and executed and rendered by your officers in the proper department, whose science enables them to make a proper examination, it had better fail. If it is to be a general grab at the Treasury of the country, without proper guide and control, it should be lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is giving too large a latitude to the rule that has been laid down.

Mr. WALSH. I have said all I desired to say. The question was then taken on Mr. HEBARD's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the twelfth line:

For the repairs of the Cumberland dam on the Ohio river, $50,000.

I have not offered that amendment, or any other, to the bill as a mere matter of form. I submit the amendment as an act of justice to one of the great thoroughfares to which society resorts, and which it uses, and which, in the view of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WALSH], ought to become the first object of our consideration in adopting this system. The Cumberland dam has been placed across the Ohio river for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Cumberland river. It was put across the Ohio river, from the head of the Cumberland Island to the Illinois shore, under the authority of the United States exercising its power to improve the navigation of the river, when the Ohio was free from obstruction there. Freshets have broken the dam away, and at high water one end of it is entirely submerged. They are now compelled to keep a stationary engine there, and every boat that passes up through the sluice, or break in the dam, is taxed for the use of the stationary engine from $25 to $75. Actually at that point in the navigation of the Ohio river, boats traveling under ordinary power cannot go up over the Cumberland dam. You ought either to take it out of the river or improve it. A great many people of the West are inclined to take it out; but I understand that that will be, probably, a matter of impossibility, as you have sunk in the middle of the stream rocks weighing upwards of twenty tons, which are now imbedded in the bottom of the river. Upon those rocks this dam has been constructed. This is a work for which estimates have been made, and the amount I now ask for the purpose of repairing that dam has been reported by Colonel Long, and was passed in the last appropriation bill. It was reported by the office of Western Improvements in 1848. I hope there will be no difficulty in putting that amendment through.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I desire to make a reply to the remarks of the gentleman.

Mr. MARSHALL. With the gentleman's permission, I will modify my amendment. I will make it, "For the repair or removal of the Cumberland dam," and let the committee repair or remove it, as they see fit.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky whether that is not entirely ambiguous? Should we appropriate $50,000 in this bill, which may answer for its repair, but may be four times what is necessary for its removal? Now, the Government have estimated for the repairs, not the removal, of this dam, and that is included, at $50,000, in the last official estimate upon this subject, by Colonel Long, which I have before me, in which he has put together all the estimates required for improvements for the year beginning the 1st of July, 1850, and ending the 30th of June, 1851—for the last fiscal year before this; so that it may be considered as an estimate for the present time. In this the estimates for the repairs of the Cumberland dam, at $50,000, are added to the other estimates for the western rivers, including the Mississippi, the Arkansas, the Missouri, and Ohio, and amount to $300,000. Now, this was reported by the officer who has had charge of the works on the western waters, to the head of the Topographical Bureau, as a sufficient sum of money to be appropriated for one fiscal year. Through that Bureau it came to the War Department. That Department revised and sent it to us, reduced $40,000; and $260,000, instead of $300,000, is now asked for the same work. That is not sufficient to complete it, but is all the Government can well apply during the present fiscal year.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would inquire whether I understand the gentleman as stating that the appropriation of $260,000 includes an appropriation for the Cumberland dam?

Mr. SEYMOUR. The $300,000 which was reported by Colonel Long to the Department, in 1849, included the Cumberland dam. The head of the Topographical Bureau, this year, in sending in his printed estimates, refers in his report to the report of Colonel Long, as the data upon which he based his printed estimates, which have been laid before the House.

Mr. MARSHALL. Does that embrace the Cumberland dam?

Mr. SEYMOUR. It was specifically embraced in the original estimate of Colonel Long, and that having been referred to us this year must be considered as containing the Cumberland dam. The chief of the Department has certified to us that $260,000 was enough for these improvements during the current fiscal year, instead of $300,000, which the subordinate certified to him. I trust the committee will be governed rather by the opinion of the head of the Bureau, and the War Department, than by the opinion of a subordinate officer. The estimate which we have put into the bill, without any deduction, is no index whatever to the whole sum that may be wanted in the future to complete these works, but is only intended for this fiscal year's operation. And here is the mistake gentlemen have made upon these appropriations. You cannot test them by the amount we propose to report this year. The operations for this year suffice only for the initiatory step in these works. We are now to recommence the work on the western waters, and for the first year we ask such appropriations as are necessary for the construction of snag-boats and other boats, and for the operations upon these waters for the current fiscal year only, as well as for repairing the Cumberland dam. This very appropriation for the Cumberland dam is included in another part of this bill.

Mr. DISNEY. I would inquire if the pending amendment is in the first degree?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the first degree.

Mr. DISNEY. I move to amend the amendment by increasing the sum $10,000. I move the amendment simply for the purpose of enabling me to say that this work has been duly characterized by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] as a public nuisance, as it now obstructs that stream. The danger lies here: That if you build up that dam you will obstruct the navigation of the Ohio, and if you tear it down it will fill up the mouth of the Cumberland. It is so great a nuisance that the steamboat men themselves will pull the dam away. Certain it is, that something should be done, and the dam should not be left in its present position. It should be either removed or repaired. One or the other of these things should be done, for as it now stands it is one of the worst possible nuisances. As regards the estimate of the Department, it is the veriest of all moonshine. When the engineers or officers did see it, the dam was in repair. Now it has been torn partially away, and in the worst of possible forms, it obstructs the Ohio and does not relieve the Cumberland. If there be an appropriation made by this House, I think the amendment I have offered should be adopted. What amount is necessary to make the repair I do not know; but I am satisfied that the dam should be removed, or some other measures taken in order to leave the navigation of the Ohio unobstructed. I hope that some appropriation will be made for the Cumberland.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DISNEY's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon Mr. MARSHALL's amendment, tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HAMILTON and HENDRICKS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 32, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARD. I propose to offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Cumberland river, $48,000.

In offering this amendment, it may be thought that I am unnecessarily importunate in regard to this appropriation; but when gentlemen take into consideration the importance of this stream, and the great interest which my constituents have in this matter, they will excuse me for my urgency. It is our misfortune to represent the mountaineers, than whom there is no class of people in the United States more thoroughly imbued with patriotism. Government has never demanded a duty of them which they have failed to perform. Who does not know that the district of country which I have the honor to represent has contributed much to the honor of the country, and that she has always gallantly and manfully responded to her country's call, in bearing up the stars and stripes?

Mr. CARTTER. Is it in order to talk about patriotism and things in general upon this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WARD] will confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. WARD. I will keep in the bounds of order. We have suffered enough in sustaining the Government, at least to expect that she will extend a little aid in the improvement of this river. Is it not enough that citizens of the district which I have the honor to represent have fallen upon foreign soil in sustaining the stars and stripes of our country, but in addition thereto, citizens of that district shall be compelled to risk their lives upon the stream, for the improvement of which I now ask the beneficent action of the Government, in granting such aid as will prevent this unnecessary sacrifice of the lives and property of the mountaineers? They have a right to demand such aid, and it is just and proper that it should be appropriated. It seems to me, that there can be no construction which can be brought to bear upon this subject, that can negative such a proposition. Upon what grounds, then, do this committee refuse an appropriation for this river? Have they refused it upon the supposition that the wisdom of the Committee on Commerce, who framed this bill, is infallible?

Mr. SEYMOUR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question—whether he has ever presented any estimates to the committee, or ever called their attention to the wants of that river?

Mr. WARD. I acknowledge the fact, that no estimate has been presented to the committee. But should that alter the case? If the appropriation is a just and proper one, it has claims upon the consideration of this committee as much as if it were presented to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman admits that he never sent any estimate to the committee. Some gentlemen seem to suppose that the committee are bound to hunt up information for themselves. Here is the amount which has been appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of the Cumberland river in years past. In 1832, $30,000 were appropriated; in 1834, $30,000; in 1836, $20,000; in 1837, $55,000; in 1838, $20,000; making in all over $150,000—three times as much as the State of Maryland has ever received for her streams and rivers altogether.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman if the same estimates do not show that we have appropriated two millions of dollars to the Delaware breakwater alone? and if that is not as much as you have appropriated to the western streams altogether?

Mr. WALSH. I do not suppose it is, but I have not time to examine it. The Delaware breakwater is not connected with the commerce of one State, two or three States, but it concerns the interests of the commerce of the whole country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls gentlemen to order, as the debate is entirely out of order. The Chair cannot see what the Delaware breakwater has to do with an appropriation for the Cumberland river. The debate must be confined to the merits of that amendment.

Mr. WALSH. In the absence of any information as to the manner in which this money has been expended, how is it possible for any committee to recommend any further appropriation? The sum of $150,000 has been appropriated to one single river in the West, and if there is any evidence to show that it has been all expended, and that the removal of obstructions in its navigation require further expenditure, of course we will give it. But certainly no complaint can be made against a committee of this House, with nothing but this record before them, and with no recommendation showing the necessity of any further appropriation.

Mr. WARD demanded tellers upon his amendment, but they were refused.

The question was then put, and a division being had, there were—ayes 27, noes 73; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the question will be taken by tellers, in order to see if there is a quorum present.

There being no objection, Messrs. CHANDLER and ASHE were appointed tellers.

The question was then again put; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 54, noes 80.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, proposed to amend the bill by inserting after the seventeenth line the words:

For removing obstructions at and near the mouth of the Pascagoula river, in the State of Mississippi, $10,000.

Mr. B. said: When I proposed this amendment the other day, I asked for $60,000 in obedience to the request of the petitioners. The sum was a large one, and I apprehend that some gentlemen may have voted against the amendment on account of its magnitude, and others on account of want of actual knowledge as to what was the Pascagoula river. The Pascagoula river is one emptying into the Gulf of Mexico, and is nearly as large, as some gentlemen here may know, as the Susquehanna river, being nearly five miles wide at its mouth, and running some seventy miles into the interior, and being for that distance navigable for the largest class of steamers. There is, however, an obstruction at the mouth of it which renders its navigation entirely useless. If gentlemen desire to know what that obstruction is, what is to be sought for above the river, and what is to be carried upon it, I can inform them that the tributaries of the Pascagoula lead into the most fertile portion of the cotton-growing region, and that its banks are thickly covered with live-oak and with the very finest species of pine. The obstruction consists in a deposit of earth and sand, making a bar near the mouth of the river which renders its navigation wholly impracticable except when the tide is in a particular direction, or when a storm raises the waters so high as to enable a vessel to pass over the bar; and when once vessels get into the river, it is exceedingly questionable when they will get out again. Under these circumstances, the petitioners ask that that bar may be removed, and my amendment proposes to appropriate $10,000 for that purpose. I have no further speech to make in regard to it.

Mr. HUNTER. I am opposed to this amendment until there is an exploration and survey to find where the river is. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN asked for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. WILLIAMS and PENN were appointed.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 32, noes not counted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, moved to strike out the following provision of the bill:

"For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river above and below Albany, $50,000."

Mr. J. said: I believe that river is entirely within the jurisdiction of the State of New York. It is a fine, noble river, and its navigation is good. There is, moreover, a railroad running parallel with the banks of the river for the distance of one hundred and sixty miles. Why, then, should an appropriation be given to that river when the navigation is good, and when facilities for trade are thus afforded to the people connected with it? Why should an appropriation of $50,000 be given to that river, and nothing to the Illinois, nothing to the Cumberland, nothing to the Tennessee, nothing to the Yazoo, nothing to the Chattahoochee, and nothing to the James river? Those rivers are all suited for navigation, but they all have obstructions in them. Upon what principle of equal justice is it that this money is to be appropriated to the Hudson river? Is it upon the principle that you are to make the rich richer? New York is a powerful State—powerful in influence, in wealth, and in commerce; and therefore this appropriation must be made for the Hudson, but these other rivers, in which there are obstructions, cannot receive a dollar.

The gentleman from Maryland tells us that in commencing this system the great channels of human intercourse must first be attended to, and that afterwards those streams of minor importance will receive the favor and encouragement of the Government. We are to understand, then, that this is to be a progressive system—that this is but the commencement of the squandering of the money that is in the Treasury—that it is to be carried on year after year, and session after session—and that a perpetual tax is to be laid upon the people of the different sections of this country for the benefit of those rivers and streams that may meet with the favor of Congress. I say, sir, that this appropriation ought to be stricken out. The Hudson river has no more claim upon this House than other rivers have. Other rivers have more claim and demand more consideration from this House than it does. There is no necessity for this improvement; there is a necessity for the improvement of other rivers.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, to strike out this appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson, and desire to answer the question which he has just propounded. He asks, Why should an appropriation be made for the Hudson river?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. And not for the Tennessee river?

Mr. DEAN. We have not come here to discuss the comparative merits of grants to be applied to particular localities, or the propriety or impropriety of this or similar bills. We are now acting under the five-minutes rule, and must confine ourselves to amendments to the bill, and our discussions to the pending amendments; and as much has been said about the amount appropriated by this bill to various points in New York, I would say to gentlemen, and to western men particularly, that this is not a New York improvement, or a New York appropriation, but one in which their own States are vitally interested, for the reason that this is the great artery of trade for the whole West, and that more internal commerce passes up and down the Hudson than upon any river in the United States.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. DEAN. I am not—I cannot be mistaken upon this subject. It is one which I have investigated, and I here assert that more butter, cheese, oats, corn, and grain of different kinds reach tide-water by way of that river than reach New Orleans by way of the Mississippi.

Several VOICES. Oh, no; you are mistaken.

Mr. DEAN. No, sir; I am not mistaken. I have recently had occasion to examine the subject, and though I have not now the figures by me, not supposing I should be required to use them here, I will refer gentlemen to the statistics collected in Hunt's Merchant's Magazine for 1850 and 1851.

A word as to the necessity for this appropriation. If gentlemen will go up the railroad which they have spoken about as being directly on the bank of that river, and which has been brought in here to show that the appropriation was not needed—a railroad which has not been constructed by grants of land from the General Government, or by any aid from the State or National Treasury but wholly by private enterprise—they will often see at low tide—not a single boat—but whole fleets of sloops and steamboats on the overslaugh near Albany. They will also see the steam dredge at work in the river, removing that obstruction. Now, we ask as but an act of justice, when we are thus expending our own resources to remove this obstruction to navigation—a navigation in which all the States are interested—that a small portion of the common fund should be applied to the same purpose.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I would ask the gentleman if it has not been decided recently that the State of New York has no jurisdiction over that river?

Mr. DEAN. In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in the Supreme Court of the United States, it was expressly decided that the State of New York had no power to restrain the navigation of that river—that flowing, as it did, between different States, that the river belonged to the Union, and was open to the free and unrestricted commerce of the Union; and, consequently, that in its navigation, every State has an interest and equal right.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman is wrong in regard to that decision. I desire to ask him if the Supreme Court of the United States, in that case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, did not decide that the State of New York had exclusive jurisdiction over the Hudson river; but that no State had a right to grant exclusive privileges to any particular individual to the navigation of any particular river within the limits of that State?

Mr. DEAN. The question in the case to which the gentleman refers, was as to the power of the Legislature of the State of New York to confer the exclusive right to Fulton and Livingston to navigate all the waters within the jurisdiction of the State by boats impelled by steam or fire. Gibbons was running two steamboats from Elizabethtown, New Jersey, to New York city. Ogden, the assignee of Fulton and Livingston, had obtained an injunction against him in the New York courts, which had been sustained by the Court of Errors—then our highest judicial tribunal. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the injunction was dissolved, the decision of the State courts reversed, upon the grounds I have stated. So that, by the express decision of the highest judicial tribunal known to the Constitution, this river is a national highway, and this appropriation is for a national object.

I desire to say, further, that the members from New York do not come here to oppose proper and constitutional appropriations for the improvement of the rivers or harbors of other States, or to ask appropriations exclusively for their own. They only ask that the same rule may be applied to New York that is applied to every other State in the Union.

The mere fact of this being an appropriation for the Hudson river, and that river being situated within the State of New York, does not make it a New York appropriation at all.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will suggest the propriety of making the amendment which I suggested before. I move to strike out the words "above and," and to insert in the place of "Albany" the word "Troy." The section now reads—

"For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river above and below Albany, $50,000."

It would then read as follows:

"For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river below Troy, $50,000."

The object of the amendment is to provide that no portion of the appropriation shall be expended above the city of Troy.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to explain to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] and the committee, the reason for adopting the phraseology used in the bill to which he has alluded. It arises out of the nature of the obstructions upon that river. Six miles below Albany is the principal obstruction upon the river. It is known in that country by the term overslaugh; and, as I remarked, it is the greatest impediment in the whole course of the navigation of the river. But whilst the principal Government works have been commenced at this location, about six miles below Albany, there is another obstruction of the same character about two miles below the United States arsenal, at Watervliet, near Troy, where the Government has also commenced a work. The obstruction is one which impedes the navigation of the river nearly as much as that below Albany; and the improvement is equally necessary at both points. The language used in this bill with reference to this appropriation is precisely the same as that employed in the early appropriations for this river; and after consultation with the Topographical Bureau, and the War Department, for the purpose of securing the navigation of this river at both these points, and for the purpose of securing a portion of this appropriation to each point, I think the phraseology is best as it is.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that if this obstruction of which he speaks is between the cities of Troy and Albany, the amendment which I propose would not prevent the appropriation being expended at both these points. What I want is, that none of the money shall be expended for improvements above Troy.

Mr. SEYMOUR. The language of the section as it stands does not provide for expending any of the money above Troy. There are no Government works above that city, and there is no navigation above the dam, a short distance from the city. This appropriation is to continue works which the Government has already commenced. When these works are completed, the navigation of the river will be good. I hope the language of the section will remain as it is in the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL demanded tellers upon the adoption of the amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. BRECKINRIDGE and SCURRY were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 73.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL. I now move to insert after the word "Albany" the words "but not above Troy," so that it will read:

"For the continuation of the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river above Albany, but not above Troy, $50,000."

I will state to the committee that my only object in offering this amendment is, to provide a limit beyond which this appropriation cannot be used. You perceive, sir, that the appropriation now reads:

"For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river above and below Albany."

What I propose to do is, to limit the appropriation so that it shall not be expended above the city of Troy. I have no idea of attempting the improvement of that river above the dam at Troy. I propose to alter the verbiage, because, forsooth, it is said that we might force the whole expenditure of the appropriation below Albany.

Mr. SEYMOUR. This is a mere verbal alteration to which I have no particular objection if it is insisted on. But if the gentleman from Kentucky will look at the amendment and at the original provision of the bill, he will see that the amendment is wholly unnecessary, because the provision of the bill as it stands, provides for continuing the improvement of the navigation of that river. And by the language of the bill itself, the appropriation cannot be applied to works not already begun by the Government. Now, there are but two of these works. One is below Troy, about two miles below the United States arsenal, and the other is about six miles below Albany. These are the two items to which the appropriation is designed to apply.

Mr. MARSHALL. All I propose to do is to confine the expenditure of this appropriation below Troy, and I think there can be no objection to that.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I now demand tellers upon my amendment to strike out the whole clause.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HENN and DEAN were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I move to strike out "$50,000," and insert "$25,000."

Mr. POLK. Is it in order to move that the committee rise?

The CHAIRMAN. Not without the consent of the gentleman from Kentucky, who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is not in order to propose that amendment after the motion to strike out the section has been rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. That point has already been raised and decided. The gentleman's point is correct according to parliamentary law, but not according to an express rule of the House.

Mr. POLK. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to enable me to make a motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WARD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. POLK. I submit that motion.

The motion was put, and the committee refused to rise.

Mr. WARD. I will not pretend that the Hudson is not a national object demanding an appropriation of some magnitude. The intention of the framers of this bill seems to be not to give appropriations to national objects, but to parcel them out according to a standard formed by themselves, which standard, when examined, does not justify the amount of appropriation made to that river. The proposition which I have made again and again, for the river which I in part represent, has not been voted down upon the ground that it is not an object worthy of appropriation, but—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to interrupt the gentleman. He must confine his remarks to a change in the appropriation to the Hudson river.

Mr. WARD. How can I do that but by comparison, to show that the appropriation in the bill for the Hudson river is too large?—and therefore I conceive myself to be in order.

The committee has refused to make an appropriation for the river which I in part represent, not because it was not a national object, but because we are to commence a system of improvements upon an economical plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must again interrupt the gentleman, and insist upon enforcing the rule of order which he laid down this morning.

The argument that the committee has refused to vote appropriations for the Cumberland river is not applicable to the amendment to reduce the appropriation for the Hudson river.

Mr. WARD. It is a very difficult matter to know what is in order under that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the construction to be strictly this: When a motion is made to reduce an appropriation, remarks must be made to show why that particular appropriation should be reduced, and why it is more than is necessary for that particular work.

Mr. WARD. In order to do this, it seems necessary to allude to the standard upon which these appropriations are recommended; and in so doing to advert to the different streams—

The CHAIRMAN. In discussing that question it is not in order to discuss the refusal of the committee to make appropriation for streams in a different part of the country.

Mr. WARD. This bill contains appropriations for various rivers, and the appropriations to these rivers should be made according to the magnitude of the interest involved, the extent of the navigation, and length of the streams. To the Mississippi and its tributaries, amounting to upwards of sixteen hundred miles of navigation, they have appropriated the sum of $260,000; and to the Hudson river, with a navigation of one hundred and fifty miles, they have appropriated one fifth of that amount.

I hope that the system of internal improvement, if commenced at all, of which I am in favor, will be based upon a principle just to all portions of the Union, for each and every portion of it are equally interested in the matter. Now, when those who are settled upon the Mississippi and its tributaries—amounting to one half the population of the United States—demand that an appropriation shall be made to them, there is doled out to them $260,000, while those living upon one hundred and fifty miles of navigation get $50,000. Is that just, is that proper and fair? Is it proportionate to the interests involved in the two streams? It seems to me not, and that $25,000 is as much as the Hudson river demands, and as much as the interests involved in it are entitled to, and I hope and trust that this committee will cut it down to that amount.

Mr. MEADE. I am astonished at the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WARD.] Does the gentleman reflect that the Hudson river has received heretofore but $370,000? [Laughter.] Does the gentleman wish to cut down the Hudson river to the paltry sum of $25,000? If he does, let me remind him of another fact, that of the amount appropriated by this bill, to wit: $1,500,000, the State of New York will have to pay about $180,000 of it, calculating her portion by her population. She receives but $258,200 under this bill, which is but about $75,000 more than she will have to pay towards these improvements; and will the gentleman attempt to put the State of New York upon the same footing with other States of this Union—that great State which contains the emporium of the commerce of the United States? Why, sir, the gentleman's feelings should be more national.

I, sir, who represent the State of Virginia, which has not one single cent appropriated in this bill, and which has to pay $100,000 towards the payment of this million and a half, even I, sir, whose State receives nothing under this bill, am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WARD.]

Why, sir, will he be so cruel as to scatter his shot among the little brood of chickens the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has hatched, after an incubation of some five or six months—[laughter]—a brood of thirteen as pretty little chicks as you ever saw. Well, he has only divided among them the sum of $258,000, and what is that when compared to the million and a quarter already received by them? [Laughter.]

Why, has the gentleman no national feeling? Does he remember, sir, that we have already testified to the amount of $850,000 in favor of the superior advantages that State enjoys over the rest of the Union? Now, sir, while the House is willing to go to this extent in favor of that great State, why should the gentleman be so uncharitable as to object to this little sum of $50,000 to a little river in the State of New York, which has hitherto received but $370,000? [Laughter.]

I am astonished at the gentleman, and I hope he will withdraw his amendment? [Laughter.]

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. WARD demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will it be in order to move that the committee rise, and report this bill to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass?

The CHAIRMAN. It is if no gentleman desires to offer any further amendments to the bill.

Mr. MEADE. I have a few amendments more which I desire to offer.

Mr. YATES. I move to amend the bill by adding:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river, $40,000.

Mr. Chairman, I will say but a few words upon this amendment. I have not offered it in any capacious spirit of opposition. I assure you, and this committee, that it is not from a factious opposition, but because it is a subject which I feel deeply at heart.

Sir, the subject of appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river has been much, and for a long time, discussed throughout the length and breadth of our State. The question of constitutional power has been raised; and I feel a great desire for this Congress to settle this question. It is one that deeply affects my constituents and the prosperity of my State, and in no small degree the commerce and interests of many States of this Union. I offer the amendment to this particular section, making an appropriation for the improvement of the Hudson river, for the reason that the Illinois river is situated similarly to that river. The two streams are nearly alike in every particular. They are each within the limits of their respective States. The head waters of the Hudson are connected with the lakes by railroads and canals, and the commerce of many States is transported upon it. This makes it a national stream. The head waters of the Illinois are connected with the lakes by railroads and canals, and the products and merchandise of numerous States are borne upon it. This makes that a national stream. Now, sir, I wish to test the fairness and justice of this committee. Are you willing to give to the wealthy and powerful State of New York $50,000 for a stream only one hundred and fifty miles in length, and deny to the young and needy State of Illinois an appropriation of $40,000 for a navigable stream two hundred and fifty miles in length, and one of the most important rivers in the United States? This is the question I put to the committee, and I call upon them to face it and to vote upon it, with this view of the question. Is it fair, is it honest, is it just to the State of Illinois, to deny her this small appropriation, and give to a State of the most unbounded wealth and resources a larger appropriation, for a river with a railroad on its banks for its whole length—a State, sir, which is literally cut up with railroads, and whose harbors command the commerce of the world? I trust what I say will not be interpreted into bitterness of feeling on my part towards New York. I have none. I do not wish to reduce her appropriations, but to raise those for the Ohio, Illinois, and Mississippi rivers to the same standard.

Now, in a speech I made on Saturday, I brought forward before this committee the report of a survey, estimates, and plans made under the direction of the Government of the United States, by a civil engineer, showing that this was a national stream, and showing that there are important obstructions to the navigation of this river. Now, what are the facts? Why, sir, steamers of the largest size are now floating without obstruction or detention upon the Hudson, while on the Illinois river, from La Salle to the mouth of that river, at this very time, while we are now discussing the question, steamboats and canal-boats are aground, their crews out of employ, and the whole commerce of that river obstructed for want of an appropriation—for the want of that encouragement which it is the bounden duty of this Government to extend to all her great national highways, and which the public sentiment of this country now most imperatively demands.

The amendment which I propose is right, and it ought to be made. Our steamboats are detained by bars in this river, when an appropriation of $40,000 would remove them and place us upon an equality with the far-famed Hudson. I do not decry the Hudson. Any person who ever traveled on it will be proud that such a stream is in his country. I did not vote to strike it out of the bill. I do not propose to diminish the appropriation for it a single dollar. No, sir; but I propose to ingraft upon it a stream equally important and equally national as the Hudson; and I think the House will see the propriety and justice of so doing.

Mr. Chairman, let the friends of internal improvements act in concert, let them amend this bill in some few particulars only, and we shall soon witness the beneficent effects of our legislation in the vast increase of our commerce and in the accelerated march of our country to that high preeminence of prosperity which as patriots and Americans we all so much desire her to attain.

Mr. EVANS. I do not know that I have any objection to this appropriation, but rather to the place where it is proposed to introduce it. There seems an unusual desire to make the appropriations for the western rivers and the western harbors as amendments to the appropriations for the eastern rivers and harbors. Gentlemen are so eager and impatient to introduce their amendments that they cannot wait until they arrive at the proper place in the bill. There are abundant opportunities, when we reach the Illinois appropriation, to put in this amendment. I think it likely I shall vote for the bill of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLEY] which has something in it for the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. YATES.] In advocating these amendments, some gentlemen, instead of taking liberal national grounds upon this general question, are animated by something like hostility to the East.

Since 1776 there has been expended in the State of Maryland $55,000; and in the State of the gentlemen particularly anxious here to-day, $2,617,000, not to say anything about millions of acres of public lands they have received. Well, sir, I do not entertain any envy towards the West. I hope she may be prosperous and great; but why all this clamor about these expenditures in the East?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself strictly to remarks in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. EVANS. Then I will say no more at present.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment—

Mr. YATES demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. YATES, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put; and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes 47.

Mr. OKR. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CARTER and HART were appointed.

The question was again put, and the motion to rise was disagreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 59, noes 75.

Mr. MASON. I offer the following amendment:

For the enlargement of the Louisville and Portland canal, and constructing an additional lock, four hundred feet in length, $700,000.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment appropriates $700,000 to the enlargement of the Louisville and Portland canal, and for the construction of an additional lock, four hundred feet in length, which is the amount for which a contractor proposes to make that improvement. This canal, by the consent of the State of Kentucky and the stockholders, belongs to the General Government, after a few hundreds of dollars shall be paid out of the tolls on the canal, which event will transpire in about one year. The Government advanced money to construct that canal. It has received back all that it advanced, and $35,000 besides. It was authorized that the profits of the canal should be paid to the extinguishment of stock held by individuals in it, and the whole commerce of that country is taxed by tonnage duties, for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the advances it made for the construction of the canal.

The Government, then, in a short time, will own this whole canal, without forfeiting one solitary dollar. It is a question, then, whether they will enlarge and improve it, or build another canal around the falls, upon the Indiana side. The most economical plan is that which will meet the wants of commerce, and to meet the wants of commerce the canal should be enlarged. My proposition is to appropriate $700,000 for that purpose. It is not a gratuity, for the Government will receive that sum back in tonnage duties, as it has received back every dollar it expended on it heretofore. We have the right to ask, when we pay tonnage duties upon that canal, better accommodations than are at present afforded. The locks are small and the navigation is very much obstructed. The appropriation of $700,000, as proposed, will afford better accommodations, and the Government will not lose a dollar thereby. The tolls in three or four years will reimburse it. The stock in that canal is the most profitable of any in the United States, its profits having redeemed all that has ever been expended upon it, and the Government is the gainer by about $35,000, and the Government will receive the balance of the stock by an arrangement with the stockholders.

Mr. MEADE. Will we not then have petitions here asking that it shall be made a free canal?

Mr. MASON. I do not ask that until the Government has been reimbursed every dollar. Probably some may send such petitions, but it is for Congress to say whether they will or will not make the canal free. If they do so, however, I would inquire of the gentleman whether it would not be better to do that than to appropriate $50,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river, upon which traveling is easy compared with that on the western waters, where navigation is obstructed by snags? That river is deep and straight, and there is not a snag in it. Yet you appropriate $50,000 to improve it, and never to be reimbursed. We ask this $700,000 shall be appropriated for the improvement of that canal from which the Government receives so large a profit, and which will be repaid.

Mr. GOODENOW. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. The magnitude of the amount is a sufficient objection to it, in my mind. I hope the question will be taken upon the amendment at once.

Mr. DISNEY. I move to strike out the amendment, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Towards the improvement of the navigation of the Falls of the Ohio $500,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. DISNEY. I am opposed to the original amendment as offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL] because, sir, it does not contemplate that sort of arrangement for the convenience of commerce passing that point which the exigencies of that interest require. The existing extent of commerce now passing that point requires two canals, and it is increasing so rapidly that it will, in a short time, imperatively demand the addition of a new canal, so that there may be one for the ascending, and another for the descending commerce.

I do not propose to enter into a controversy with the gentleman from Kentucky, as to which side of the river this improvement shall be made upon; and hence, in the amendment I now offer, I propose to leave the entire subject to the decision of the Secretary of War. The necessity for it is apparent to every person who is at all familiar with the obstructions in the navigation at that point. The difference between the gentleman and myself is, that he wants to subserve what he supposes to be the local interests of Louisville. Her selfishness affords a reason which may influence the Kentucky members, but which the general interests of that entire region repels and prohibits. Why, sir, this attempt to enlarge that canal would be the total destruction of commerce while the enlargement was going on. But when the gentleman from Louisville [Mr. MARSHALL] remarked, on yesterday, that he would undertake to demonstrate this thing could be accomplished better, it struck me that a remarkable improvement had taken place in the gentleman since he made an effort of the same kind before the Committee on Roads and Canals, who had the subject under consideration. They decided against the proposition of the gentleman. He failed to convince them of what he said he could demonstrate to the committee, and I apprehend he would be about as successful upon this floor as he was there. But, sir, I desire to say another thing before I take my seat, and it is to appeal to gentlemen to give us a record upon these various matters when this committee shall rise. Let us see—let the people of the West be no longer humbugged by this cry about river improvements—let them see who it is that vote down their applications for the improvement of their rivers. Give us the record, and I ask no more; but do not, when this committee rises, sustain the call for the previous question, which will prevent us making motions in the House which will give us a record upon each proposition separately. I want the people of the West to see who have voted down appropriations for each of their western rivers, and who have voted down the appropriations for the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio. Let them appreciate the truth of the declarations and professions which will be made about the anxiety of a certain class of politicians in this country to improve the western rivers.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Cincinnati, [Mr. DISNEY.] This is no time to discuss the question which the gentleman has presented. All I have to say to that gentleman—as his remarks seem to be pointed at me—is, that I am ready to make my record now and at any time, either in the committee, in the House, or before the people, upon this subject; and I say now, that no bill can command my support at any time which has in it an appropriation for the Indiana canal, because it would be a profligate and extravagant waste of the public money.

Mr. DISNEY. Give us the record.

Mr. MARSHALL. I make the record now to satisfy the gentleman in advance, and I will be ready to exemplify the record by a demonstration whenever the time comes that will put the whole scheme, I think, to public shame. There is no selfishness manifested here either on the part of Louisville or on the part of her Representatives; but there is a plain, straight-forward attempt to do what is exactly right, and subserve the purposes of navigation, and at the same time save the public money, as far as possible, and not to get this Government into a scheme which cannot be consummated for less than millions of dollars. As a Representative from the city of Louisville, if I could not look any further than that city, it would be just as proper and prudent for me to agree here to arbitrate this matter before the Secretary of War as it would have been for the Hebrew mother, in the Bible, to have divided her child when a false mother presented herself. I do not see the object of gentlemen in thrusting upon us a controversy of this sort where one has an opportunity of speaking only five minutes. The people of Cincinnati will see that their Representative, after having waited here eight months in silence, could not expect to have succeeded when he presented a proposition here before the Committee of the Whole, involving an expenditure of $500,000, by indulging himself with a five minutes' speech in explanation thereof. The very magnitude of his effort in behalf of the navigation of the Ohio, must carry conviction to his constituency of the sincerity with which he presses the movement. My vote in the last Congress, and my action and speech, have been in favor of internal improvements; and I am willing to compare my record upon that subject with the gentleman from Cincinnati, [Mr. DISNEY.] I am willing for his people and mine to look at our action in the last Congress upon this subject, when we had an opportunity to pass a bill with liberal appropriations for western streams. Then I was at the post of duty. Where was he? Why his anxiety for improvement brought him in the next morning. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken on Mr. DISNEY's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the original amendment—

Mr. MASON demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. MASON was not agreed to.

Mr. MEADE moved that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and the committee refused to rise.

The next section was then read, as follows:

"For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river below the rapids; the Ohio, including the repairs of the dam at Cumberland Island; the Missouri and the Arkansas rivers; $250,000."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out all after the word "navigation" to the word "dollars," inclusive, and insert the following:

Of the Ohio river above the Falls, $60,000; and for the purchase of snag boats and scows, necessary for efficient service upon the western rivers, $100,000; and for the improvement of the Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, and Ohio below the Falls, $200,000.

It will be perceived, from the manner in which the amendment is drawn, that I attempt merely by that amendment to separate the amount specifically appropriated for the upper Ohio, in the estimates submitted to the Committee on Commerce, from the amount which was intended by the Engineer Corps of last fall to be appropriated below the Falls. In addition to that, I ask for the appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of reconstructing the snag-boats which are intended for use upon western waters. At the time this business of improving the western waters ceased, there were four snag-boats in use there. The cost of these boats was estimated at $25,000 each. There is appropriated in this bill exactly $100,000 for the purpose of making scows and dredging-boats for the lakes and Chesapeake Bay. I only ask for an equal amount of money for the boats to be used upon western and southern waters. I show the fact that these boats, costing that amount, were in use upon those waters when the improvements ceased. I hope that there will be no difficulty in increasing the appropriation that amount, and that there will be no difficulty on the part of the committee in separating the appropriation which was designed for the upper Ohio from that which was designed for the Ohio below the Falls.

I will remark that the Hudson river above and below Albany is a case right in point. Remember that the head of the Committee on Commerce was exceedingly averse to altering the phraseology of the appropriation for this river, lest, forsooth, it might be all spent below Albany. Now, I wish to apply in this case the very morale of what he taught me to the specific appropriation asked for above the Falls of the Ohio, and that it shall not be within the competency of any engineer or Secretary to spend it upon some other river than the Ohio.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to strike out and insert, as you will perceive. It is in order to move an amendment to the words to be stricken out, and the words to be inserted there.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to strike out of the original bill. I move to strike out the words "below the rapids," and insert "below the Falls of St. Anthony."

My object in offering this amendment is to extend the appropriations, or at least to give to the Executive the discretion of extending them in aid of the navigation of the Mississippi river. The provision from which I propose to strike out the words "below the rapids," restricts the appropriations to that point. Above that point, no part of the sum appropriated by this clause can be applied. I do not understand the reason for this restriction in the appropriation. Besides that, I am opposed to conferring on the Executive Department the power which is contained in this paragraph. I am opposed to placing it within the power of any single man to take this immense sum of money and appropriate it at any particular point on any of these rivers where he may see fit to apply it. I think it is the duty of Congress to make the appropriation, and to designate the points where it is to be applied. When the gentleman makes his motion to designate those points—I do not understand whether I am correct in this construction or not—he requires that the balance of the appropriation shall be expended below the Falls of the Ohio. That would exclude that portion of the Upper Mississippi river between its mouth and the Falls of St. Anthony.

The sum proposed to be appropriated is meagre, and I would desire to increase it; but I perceive that it is almost impossible. When you vote money, let it not be scattered over the country for the mere purpose of giving to every portion of the country some part of the appropriation; but let the amount, when it is appropriated for a specific object, be commensurate with the importance of that object. What will $50,000 do towards improving the rapids in the Mississippi river? And if it amounts to nothing, of course the object of the committee is merely to fix a stake there for the purpose of showing that they have brought that region of country within their range, when, in fact, they have been of no practical benefit to it whatever.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] spoke of the immense sums that had been expended in the West. I will say to him, that if he will refer to the statistics in relation to this subject, he will find that from 1806 to the present time, there have been expended a little over $17,000,000; and out of that sum only a little over $2,000,000 has been expended for western harbors and western rivers. I ask, if this inequality is to be perpetuated by this bill, and by all the other bills that are to follow it for all time to come? I hope that the amendment which I offer may prevail, and that the Executive may have a discretionary power of going to the head of navigation, instead of being restricted to the Des Moines rapids.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ORR. Would it not be in order to move that the committee take a recess?

The CHAIRMAN. It would; but the motion that the committee do now rise would have precedence.

Mr. ORR. We shall never get through this bill unless we sit here longer. I ask for tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McQUEEN and POLK were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 69, noes 48.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 282, "making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers," and had come to no resolution thereon.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Senate have returned the Military Academy appropriation bill, with certain amendments. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow that bill to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, the House then adjourned until to-morrow, at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITION, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. HAWS: The memorial of Edward H. Swift, of the city of New York, asking for the return of certain duties paid by him to the Government, on sugar destroyed by fire in said city.

By Mr. ASHE: The petition of James M. Lewis, praying for a pension for wounds received while in the service of the United States during the late war with Great Britain.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 28, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented five petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the renewal of the patent granted to Austin and Zebulon Parker for improvements upon reaction water-wheels; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, a memorial of the Board of Trade and citizens of Philadelphia, praying the removal of obstructions from the mouth of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, five memorials of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the speedy construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of the St. Mary's river; which were ordered to be laid on the table, as the subject is now before the Senate.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, praying that the bill providing for the payment of the fourth installment of the deposits of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, directed to be made with the several States by the act of June 23, 1836, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FISH presented the petition of Changuion P. Jervey and others, praying for an American register for the brig "Marthaette Morse," late the Belgian brig "Enterprise;" which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHARLTON presented a memorial of the agent of the State of Georgia, praying that the accounting officers of the Treasury Department may be authorized to allow and pay all accounts intended to be provided for by act of 11th August, 1842, "providing for the settlement of the claims of Georgia for the services of her militia," when it shall be made to appear that the State has allowed and paid the same; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MASON presented the memorial of R. M. Heath, agent for the State of Virginia, praying that certain moneys expended by said State in organizing, &c., the Virginia regiment of volunteers for the Mexican war may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the petition of William and M. Dearing, praying the correction of an erroneous entry of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PROCEEDINGS ON THE DEATH OF MR. CLAY.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Printing have instructed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the Senate and House of Representatives on the death of Henry Clay, ordered by the Senate, and now in process of publication, be bound under the direction of the Committee on Printing, by the binder of the Senate documents.

Mr. CASS. I think there can be no objection to that resolution, and I hope it will be taken up and adopted immediately.

No objection was made to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT. According to the rules of the body, as it proposes to appropriate money out of the contingent fund, it will be required to be read three times.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think not. It cannot be possible. We have a contract made with the binder of the Senate, and all volumes that are ordered to be printed are ordered to be bound, if they exceed a certain number of pages. This work does not come up to that number of pages; but being a work of this particular character, and one worthy of being preserved, and the House of Representatives having adopted the principle of binding it, it is simply including it within the rule.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the understanding of the Senate, the resolution will not be read three times.

The resolution was then adopted.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill supplemental to the act approved March 3, 1851, to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California, reported back the same, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GWIN. I shall at another time ask the indulgence of the Senate to make some remarks on that subject. I have been most grossly misrepresented in regard to the principles involved in that bill. I want to have an opportunity of explaining it, and I feel pretty confident that I can do it in a manner to insure it the favorable consideration of the Senate, notwithstanding the Committee on Public Lands are adverse to it.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the joint resolution to confer additional duties and powers on the Solicitor of the Treasury, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Mrs. Maria Davis, praying a pension and bounty land, for the services of her son during the war with Mexico, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Rev. Richard Fuller, praying that a pension may be allowed to the mother of Captain James Stewart, of the United States Army, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Mrs. Claudia Stewart; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF WAY TO ROADS.

Mr. FELCH. The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred House bill entitled "An act to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads and macadamized turnpikes passing through the public lands belonging to the United States," have instructed me to report it back without amendment. A bill similar in its character passed the Senate the other day. This is a House bill; and I suppose the House, having passed it, will not act on the other. As the Senate has once acted on a bill of the same kind, I ask that this may be considered now.

No objection was made, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct that the right of way shall be granted to all rail and plank roads or macadamized turnpike companies that are now or that may be chartered within ten years hereafter, over and through any of the public lands of the United States, over which any rail or plank road or macadamized turnpikes are or may be authorized by an act of the Legislature of the respective States in which public lands may be situated; and the said company or companies are thereby authorized to survey and mark through the said public lands, to be held by them for the track of said road, one hundred feet in width: provided, that in case where deep excavation or heavy embankment is required for the grade of such road, then at such places a greater width may be taken by such company, if necessary, not exceeding in the whole two hundred feet.

It proposes also to grant other privileges, such as are granted to railroad companies, and with like limitations.

And it proposes further to direct that the right of way through the public lands of the United States lying in Black Rock, in the county of Erie and State of New York, shall be granted to the Lockport and Buffalo Railroad Company; provided that, in the opinion of the President of the United States, such grant be not injurious to the public interest, and that the location shall be approved by the President as to the position and width of the said railroad; and provided further, that if the said railroad shall not be completed within two years, or if at any time after its completion the said railroad be discontinued or abandoned, the grant shall cease and determine.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the bill will be laid over. I should like to look into it.

Mr. BORLAND. I would suggest to the Senator that we passed a bill of this character about the same time, or soon after this bill passed the House—a bill for the same purpose being in the two Houses at the same time. To save time, therefore, and to prevent any conflict in legislation, the proposition now from the Committee on Public Lands is to take the House bill, which, in substance, is precisely the same as that passed by the Senate.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be read a third time, and it was read a third time and passed.

LAND DISTRICTS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred House bill to establish additional land districts in the State of Wisconsin, to report it back and recommend its passage. As it is a bill which will not consume any time, can lead to no discussion, is a measure of very great importance to the State, and has received the favorable action of the House, I am instructed to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it now.

No objection was made, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to establish two additional land districts in the State, and defines their boundaries, establishing the two land offices thereof respectively at Stevens's Point and La Crosse, and authorizing the President of the United States to remove such offices to any other place in the districts whenever he may deem such removal expedient. It also proposes to authorize the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and receiver of the public moneys for each of said districts, who shall be required respectively to reside at the seat of said offices, and perform the duties and receive the compensation prescribed by law in relation to other land offices; and if it should be found necessary to establish said districts during the recess of Congress, the President is authorized to appoint such officers until the end of the next session of Congress: provided, however, that the act shall not go into effect until at least six months after its passage. It further proposes to direct the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer all papers, &c., which may be necessary for the sale of the public lands, to the offices thereby constituted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time and passed.

BILL PASSED.

The engrossed bill to constitute Alton, in the State of Illinois, a port of delivery, was read a third time and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE LAWS AND DEBATES OF CONGRESS.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives for the distribution of the laws of Congress and the debates thereon, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

Joint resolution providing for the distribution of the laws of Congress and the debates thereon.

With a view to the cheap circulation of the laws of Congress, and the debates contributing to the true interpretation thereof, and to make free the communication between the representative and constituent bodies:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the present session of Congress the Congressional Globe and Appendix, which contain the laws and the debates thereon, shall pass free through the mails so long as the same shall be published by order of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the circulation of the Daily Globe free of postage.

THE ISTHMUS OF TEHUANTEPEC.

A message from the President of the United States was received, by Mr. M. P. FILLMORE, his Secretary, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, requesting the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of the Mexican Republic, respecting a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, a report from the Department of State, and the documents by which it was accompanied.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the message and documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SECRETARY OF THE CENSUS BOARD.

Mr. DAVIS asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution, explanatory of an act supplementary to the act approved 23d of May, 1850; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS. It is my purpose to move to commit this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, if the Senate think it necessary. It is simply explanatory of a law which was passed a few days since, which is within the knowledge of many gentlemen. It is simply to give a construction to that act. If it is thought necessary, I will move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not the member of the committee who reported the bill which this joint resolution proposes to explain and amend, and therefore, perhaps, I ought not to speak; but the honorable Senator from Massachusetts conferred with me, and it seems very obvious to me that the joint resolution ought to pass; that is, if Mr. Whittlesey is at liberty to give the construction to that act which may be insisted upon. It will give the clerk of the Census Board $5,500 instead of $2,500 or $3,000, if that act is not explained according to my clear understanding of how much he ought to be paid. I think the joint resolution ought to pass without any reference.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the second reading of the joint resolution now. I think it ought to pass, for the reason suggested by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, and ought to pass promptly. I desire that the joint resolution may be read, that the Senate may see what it is.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the third section of the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act providing for the taking of the Seventh and subsequent Censuses of the United States, and to fix the number of the members of the House of Representatives, and provide for their future apportionment among the several States," approved 23d of May, 1850, be so construed that no allowance as compensation shall be allowed to any person for constructive or any other service rendered as Secretary to the Census Board after the 1st day of June, 1850."

The joint resolution was read a second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. I would remark, that in the act which we passed concerning the representation of California, the subject of the census of that State was under consideration; and there is in that act a third section to which this resolution applies. I have not that section before me, but I have the original act, and can make myself understood from it. The twentieth section of the act of May, 1850, is as follows:

"That for the purpose of carrying into effect this act, and defraying the preliminary expenses, there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, $150,000, out of which the said Secretary of the Interior may allow to the person employed as Secretary of the Census Board, a compensation after the rate of $3,000 per annum during the period he has been in employment."

The third section of the act, which we passed a short time ago, strikes out the words "has been," and inserts "may necessarily be." I am told that under that amendment there has been a claim put in for double pay; first, of Superintending Clerk of the Census, and then of Secretary of the Census Board. I am informed that this Superintending Clerk, who was also Secretary of the Census Board, was allowed after the rate of $3,000 a year, up to the 1st day of June, 1850, when the census was required to be taken, that being the day fixed for the examination by the act of May 23, 1850. This act prescribes in another section, that the Superintending Clerk shall have a salary after the rate of $2,500 a year. Now, upon what authority of right or for what service rendered to the Census Board, a claim in addition to the $2,500 can be sustained is beyond my comprehension; but the amendment was made for some purpose, and must relate to this officer, since the amended section refers to his compensation as Secretary of the Census Board, and nothing else. I reported the act of 1850 under the direction of the committee, and it was not our purpose, or that of the Senate, to assign to this officer two distinct duties, or to give him compensation for two offices. The act was so framed as to limit the compensation of the Secretary of the Census Board to the post, and to transfer his duties, if any remained, to the Superintending Clerk. No other construction can be put upon the act, and hence the necessity of amending it before extra pay can be allowed. Nothing is plainer than that this Superintending Clerk was to have the entire superintendence of the census, under the Secretary of the Interior, and that the office of Secretary of the Board was abolished by the appointment of such a clerk.

I doubt if the Census Board has ever had a meeting from the 1st day of June, 1850, to this day, or has had anything to do. All the business confided to them was, in the first place, to prepare blank forms; and they were subsequently directed to have the preliminary papers printed. They were in process of printing at the time the bill passed, and they were directed in that bill to continue the care of this printing until it was completed. No other duty was ever assigned to them that I am aware of. If it be possible, under the amended act, to give the construction to it which has been intimated, I think it is the duty of the Senate to say that they did not mean to sanction the existence of the two offices. No duties remained for the Secretary of the Board to perform which did not, as was intended, devolve upon the Superintending Clerk, and for which he is fully and liberally paid by his salary.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXPEDITION DOWN THE YUNI AND COLORADO RIVERS.

Mr. GWIN offered the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the War Department transmit to the Senate, as soon as practicable, a copy of the expedition down the Yuni and the Colorado, under the command of Captain Sitgreaves, corps of Topographical Engineers, and of the maps belonging thereto; also the sketches and views and illustrations of Indian customs.

Mr. ATCHISON. I would like to have that matter explained. I do not know what it is; but from all I can now gather, it appears to me to be designed to bring about the printing of another book by the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I should like to know on what authority the Senator says this is designed to bring about the printing of a book. It was sent to me by the head of the Topographical Bureau, stating that it contained important information. I know as little about it as the Senator from Missouri; but take it for granted that Colonel Abert would not bring this matter here, or have sent it to me, unless it contained important information. He sent it to me with a note, requesting that it might be considered by the Senate.

Mr. ATCHISON. Then I think it is premature to consider it at this time. I expected that the Senator from California would be able to give us some information. I do not know to what extent this matter may go. I do not know anything about it, or what it would cost to print it.

Mr. GWIN. When the communication comes before the Senate, that will then be a question for consideration. The question of printing is not now before the Senate. The simple fact is this: That one of the officers of the Government has made an exploration of a portion of the territory of the United States not hitherto explored, and has prepared a statement of its results. We ask to have this communicated to us. Whether it is sufficiently useful to go to the expense of printing it is a question to be decided hereafter.

Mr. MASON. I am as much opposed to this system of printing books as any Senator present; but I am decidedly of opinion that where explorations have been made by intelligent officers of the Army and Navy over portions of the American continent not hitherto explored, I think we cannot better expend a reasonable sum of the public money than by printing and diffusing that information. I never heard of this before, and suppose that it is of that character, and I shall readily agree to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution which I offered yesterday, and on the question of taking it up I wish to say a word.

In asking the Senate to take up this resolution for consideration, I say nothing of its merits, nor of the argument by which it may be maintained; nor do I anticipate any objection to it on these grounds. All this will properly belong to the discussion of the resolution itself, when it is actually before the Senate. The single question now is—not the resolution—but whether I shall be heard upon it. As a Senator, under the responsibilities of my position, I have deemed it my duty to offer this resolution. I may seem to have postponed this duty to an inconvenient period of the session; but, had I attempted it at an earlier day, I might then have exposed myself to a charge of a different character. It might then have been said, that a new-comer, and inexperienced in the scene, without deliberation, hastily, rashly, recklessly, I pushed this question before the country. This is not the case now. I have taken time, and, in the exercise of my most careful discretion, now ask for it the attention of the Senate. I shrink from any appeal founded on a trivial personal consideration; but, should I be blamed for any delay latterly, I may add, that, though in my seat daily, my bodily health for some time past down to this very week, has not been equal to the service I have undertaken. I am not sure that it is now. But I desire to try.

And now, again, I say the question is simply, whether I shall be heard. In allowing me this privilege—this right, I may say—you do not commit yourselves in any way to the principle of the resolution; you merely follow the ordinary usage of the Senate, and yield to a brother Senator the opportunity which he craves, in the practical discharge of his duty, to express convictions dear to his heart, and dear to large numbers of his constituents. For the sake of those constituents, for my own sake, I now desire to be heard. Make such disposition of my resolution afterwards as to you shall seem best; visit upon me any degree of criticism, censure, or displeasure; but do not deprive me of a hearing. "Strike, but hear."

The PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator is, I presume, to postpone the prior orders, with the view of taking up that resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. It is.

Mr. MASON. It is the undoubted right of every Senator to introduce into this body any subject which, in his judgment, is appropriate to the occasion; but there is a correlative right on the part of the Senate to consider it, or not, as they think proper. Now, I object to the consideration of this resolution at this time; but from no discourtesy to the gentleman who has introduced it; from no objection, at a proper time, to consider the question involved in the resolution, if any gentleman here, on his Senatorial responsibility, chooses to bring it up; but I object to it, because it is manifest, at this late period of the session, that the Senate can give it no further consideration than to hear the remarks of the Senator who introduces it. It is not, therefore, introduced for any practical object; and because of its disturbing character—because, whenever it does come before the Senate, it comes in the form of a fire-brand, I will say, that till the Senate is prepared to consider it, and pass upon it, I object to its consideration; and upon the question of taking up the resolution, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKE. I merely wish to state, Mr. President, that the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent upon this floor, and also the State that is so worthily represented by my friend who sits on my left, [Mr. CHARLTON,] stand in a peculiar attitude in reference to this question. Both of these States have in the most solemn manner, by means of conventions—not mere party conventions, but conventions assembled by requisition of their Legislatures—declared in the most solemn and emphatic manner that the repeal, or essential modification, of the fugitive slave law shall be regarded by them as a sufficient cause for the dissolution of this Union. This, sir, is no idle threat. It is a threat which I believe will certainly be carried into execution with the full concurrence of the whole South whenever that act shall be done. Then, sir, I can regard this proposition as no less than to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to bring in a bill to dissolve this Union; and I cannot consent—courtesy or no courtesy—that such a question should be mooted at this late day of the session. Sir, we in the State of Mississippi do not regard this fugitive slave law as of any essential benefit to us. Our negroes in the State of Mississippi seldom, if ever, escape to the northern States; and when they do escape, we consider the time, and trouble, and expense of recapturing them as being more than they are worth.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi must be aware that the resolution is not under consideration.

Mr. BROOKE. I am aware, Mr. President, that it is not; and I am giving reasons why it should not be taken up.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator is not entering into the merits of the resolution?

Mr. BROOKE. No, sir. As I was remarking, we do not regard this law as having any merits so far as we, in Mississippi, are concerned; but its repeal would be an act of bad faith—an act showing that no faith can or will be kept by our northern brethren with us; and we contend that a Union preserved under such circumstances, would be worse than no Union at all. Hence I am opposed that, at this stage of the session, a question so momentous should be brought before us. I disclaim any intention to exhibit a want of courtesy towards the Senator from Massachusetts in refusing my vote to take up this resolution, and I think I have given reasons which should be satisfactory. I therefore move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the Senator from Mississippi withdraw that motion for a moment? I will renew it.

Mr. BROOKE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. President, it is my misfortune to have differed with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts on another occasion, as well as to do so on this occasion, on a question of the courtesy of this House. I am sorry to do it; for it would give me great pleasure to be able to offer any courtesy to that gentleman. But the question before us is something more than a question of courtesy. It is a question, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROOKE] has just said, of vital importance to this Union, and particularly to the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Mr. President, look at the position of affairs in this body. Your tables are now loaded with bills, bills of a most important and necessary character; appropriation bills, bills necessary for the purpose of carrying on the machinery of our Government; and all these must stand still that a resolution may be debated, which will have the effect, if it have any effect at all, to rend in pieces this Union. I say rend in pieces, for the State of Georgia stands pledged that the moment the fugitive slave law is repealed, come what will, come what may, at once to dissolve the ties which she owes to it; and having thrown down that gauntlet, neither I nor any of my constituents will be willing to recede from it.

If the Senator from Massachusetts will look a little, and only a little beyond his own coast, he will see the humiliating spectacle of the star-spangled banner—I will not say trailing in the dust—but at half-mast, and the crew and captain of a vessel in charge of one of the captains of a national vessel of Great Britain. And if he turns his attention back from that humiliating spectacle to this Chamber, he will see every Senator ready to protect the interest of the country and the property of his constituents; he will see every one ready, disregarding every sectional prejudice and feeling, to give his property and his blood for the protection of the property of citizens of any portion of this Confederacy.

Just at this time, when we know where the brunt of this war is to fall, if there be a war, we know our condition upon our southern borders; but we do not look at those consequences when the interests of the Confederacy are at stake, and we are willing to sacrifice everything for the good of this glorious Union. Just at this time, when we are ready to make any sacrifice which the Union calls for from us, he asks us to break down the only guard for the protection of our property; he asks us to hold ourselves recreant to our own rights, and take up this resolution to the disregard of the great mass of business which we are called upon by our constituents to perform.

I am ready to consider the question involved in the resolution when it comes up in its order. I do not wish to gag the gentleman. I feel a personal respect for him, and I am willing to extend every courtesy to him which is reasonable; but there is a bound beyond which courtesy may not extend.

It is my good fortune to be a Union Democrat, and I am not ashamed of my position. I know that I, as well as a great body of men with whom I was associated in Georgia, have been held up to scorn and reproach, because we were willing to abide by the compromise, the fugitive slave law being a prominent feature of it. We were willing to take it. We did not stop to consider whether full justice had been done to us, but we saw in the effort to come to a compromise, a returning sense of justice, and we were not willing to cut loose from the glorious bond that held us to the northern Democracy, who had stood by us through good and through evil report. We were ready to do battle for the star-spangled banner whilst this compromise was respected by the North, but that was the extent to which we were willing to go.

As I have said, we adopted the compromise as a peace-offering. Repeal the fugitive slave law and we are absolved; break that, and Georgia is not true to herself if she continues dishonored in this Confederacy. Let them class me as they please, I am a Union Democrat. I love this glorious Confederacy; it would bring tears to my eyes to have it dissolved. I love it, and I look upon it as a last trial of an experiment to show that a free people can govern themselves. There was an old prophecy relating to Rome, "when stands the Coliseum Rome will stand, when falls the Coliseum Rome will fall, and when Rome falls, the world." But still I am unwilling to go one inch beyond the line which has been drawn. Why should I, upon any principle of personal courtesy, vote to allow a resolution to be taken up which is either useless or worse than useless? For it is useless, if it is merely to spend the time of the Senate upon a subject in listening to its discussion, when we do not intend to act upon it; and it is worse than useless if its effect will be to dissolve this Union. Shall I vote for it? No; I will not. I tell the Senator from Massachusetts that I mean no personal disrespect to him. I have known him long, and I acknowledge that I have received courtesies from him; but on a question of this character, where the interests of my State are concerned, I should feel myself recreant to my State and to myself, if I should vote for it. And I say, in the face of this nation, that if the fugitive slave law is repealed, then the gentleman may say, as I would say, "My native land, good night; good night to all your prosperity and to all your greatness, and come what will, come what may," we have exhausted the argument, and we will stand by our arms."

Mr. GWIN. I move that this subject be laid on the table, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. PRATT. But the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of taking up the resolution, and I desire to have them.

Mr. GWIN. Then I withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not know that I understand the question before the Senate, Mr. President, having just come in.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] to postpone the previous orders for the purpose of taking up the resolution he offered yesterday.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask for the reading of the resolution by the Secretary.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to consider the expediency of reporting a bill for the immediate repeal of the act of Congress, approved September 18, 1850, usually known as the 'fugitive slave act.'"

Mr. SHIELDS. As a member of this body I am decidedly opposed to that resolution, and shall vote against it whenever it comes up for discussion. But that is not the question now, and it occurs to me that Senators have attached too much importance to the motion which is really before the Senate.

I felt that there was great force in the observations which fell from the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] yesterday. There was very great force in what that Senator observed, that the resolution being brought in at this late stage of the session, at a time when we are almost overwhelmed with business, it could not be considered by the Senate—no opportunity for reply being afforded. The principle involved by the resolution being a mere abstract question—for such I hold it to be now—and the resolution itself being merely introduced in order to give the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] an opportunity of addressing the Senate, I think it is a great pity that the time of the Senate should be wasted by it now. I regret that the Senator has deemed it necessary to his position, or to himself, to bring such a resolution forward; but having done so, the only question is whether you will permit him to be heard or not. Will you deprive a member of this body of the right of expressing his views on a subject that, for ought we know, may interest him? Will you compel him to be silent?

I have sat in this Senate, and have listened to treason, uttered by honorable Senators, and yet we have listened patiently; and I ask Senators from the South to consider whether anything will be gained by preventing a gentleman from being heard on a question like this. Can we gain anything by stifling his voice on this subject? I am as decidedly opposed to the agitation of this question as any Senator in this body, and while I shall vote against any law to modify or change the fugitive slave act, unless it be found defective in its operation, and with a view to strengthen it, yet if there is a motion made to lay the resolution on the table, I shall vote against laying it on the table. I will hear what the gentleman has to say; and more than that, I have a peculiar curiosity at this stage of affairs in our country to hear what this third party has to say, so that we may know how they are to stand in the coming presidential contest. I take it that the Senator from Massachusetts means to give an exposé of their views and intended proceedings. I want that third party formed, for one, and I would not stifle it for a moment. I will give it all the encouragement I can. I want men to be classified in the coming election, and that those in the northern States, my own as well as the rest, may be so classified, in order that we may know how many are disposed to favor the repeal of the fugitive slave law. We shall lose nothing, in my opinion, by a classification.

I shall vote against the resolution itself, and against any reargitation of this question; but, at the same time, I mean never to give a vote to prevent any gentleman from being heard in this body. Let him come from what quarter he may, I will hear him, whatever he may choose to say. I would, therefore, suggest that the honorable Senator postpone his resolution and speech until Saturday. It will interfere then with none of the legitimate business. I hope we may all agree to give the gentleman a hearing on that day. I have not the least idea that his speech will ever rend the union of these States asunder. [Laughter.]

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I differ entirely from the honorable Senator from Illinois with regard to extending courtesy to a Senator here, to speak on any subject which he chooses to present before the Senate. If the Senator from Massachusetts were to introduce a resolution here to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to dissolve this Union, I should like to know whether the Senator from Illinois would vote in favor of his having an opportunity to speak on such a resolution? Now, Mr. President, I recollect very distinctly, some ten years ago, that, upon the occasion of a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. John Quincy Adams) bringing forward a memorial in the other House of Congress in favor of dissolving this Union, there was a weeks' discussion, and he was very nearly being expelled from the House.

Mr. SHIELDS. The honorable Senator will permit me to say that a treasonable proposition—a proposition openly and flagrantly treasonable—of course this Senate should not entertain. I should not vote for such a thing as that. I have already said that I should not vote for this resolution. I shall vote against it, and against any bill that may be brought in in favor of such a proposition.

Mr. GWIN. Well, sir, I look upon the two propositions as one and the same. I think that the resolution which has been introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, proposing to instruct the Judiciary Committee to report a bill to repeal the fugitive slave law, is equivalent to introducing a resolution to dissolve the Union; because we all know that the repeal of that law would produce that result. We have just heard it from the Senators from Mississippi and Georgia, that their States were bound to, and they would act upon it. I have no doubt that the repeal of that law would dissolve the Union; and therefore, the introducing of this resolution I look upon as equivalent to introducing one to inquire into the expediency of dissolving the Union; and hence, there is no degree of courtesy I could be asked to extend to any Senator, that would justify me, in my judgment, as a representative of one of the States of this Confederacy, in voting in favor of this discussion. Therefore, although I should desire to extend all reasonable courtesy to the Senator from Massachusetts, I cannot comply with his request in this case.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, like the Senator from Massachusetts, I am anxious to be heard, and I came into the Senate this morning after riding the entire night, for the express purpose of being heard—not upon the fugitive slave law, nor upon any other question calculated to have effect upon the pending presidential election. I make my speeches on those subjects elsewhere, and come here to make speeches upon practical subjects of legislation. The Senate postponed the bill to protect the emigrant route to Oregon and California, with the amendments for a railroad to the Pacific, until this day. The Committee on Territories having reported the bill, and it having been postponed until to-day, I, as chairman of the committee, expected to be called upon to explain its provisions; and I do think that the subject of a railroad to the Pacific ocean is a matter of more practical importance to the nation, the people of the United States, and the world, than a speech upon the fugitive slave law. Hence, I shall insist upon adhering to the practical matters of legislation before us, and shall refuse to extend any act of courtesy to any gentleman to make a mere theoretical or a political speech intended to operate upon the presidential election, or fan the flames of discord that have so recently divided this great people.

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose I may feel myself included in the appeal which has been made to gentlemen from the South, by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS:] but there is no man more averse to this question of debate. I have said here openly, and somewhat under the censure of the Senate at the time I did so, that I would not be compelled to vote for a measure which looked to the suppression either of presenting petitions or of the right of debate. I have long seen that efforts to arrest agitation by attempting to exclude petitions and close debate are vain. I know it will go on. I believe the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is pledged to agitate. However, that may be beyond the matter; and, therefore, I would be perfectly willing, as he is bound to do it, I suppose, under very high obligations to his constituents, to give him leave at any time to speak on this subject when the other side can be heard. A fair field and a clear sky upon this subject, and I fear nothing. But I feel myself embarrassed very much by the peculiar attitude and the peculiar juncture of affairs at this time; and I feel a conflict between a sense of duty—I may say a sense of duty to every Senator—and courtesy. But, if this subject is taken up, the fact cannot be disguised that the Senator himself will be bound to make allusion to South Carolina and her laws—

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I shall be clear, perhaps. [Laughter.] I do not know how it can be discussed very well without some allusion of the kind. However, I suppose the honorable Senator from Massachusetts would not like it to be said that he has played the part of a parliamentary rhetorician here. I believe he would not like it to be said of him, that he had risen to play the orator before the Senate of the United States, and to make a speech merely. If he intends anything he ought to have before him, under the responsibility of a Senator, and especially of a Senator from Massachusetts, a dignity of purpose. And does he intend to carry out the purpose of referring this to the Judiciary Committee, with a view to have it acted upon? Or is it merely a pretense to give him an opportunity to make an oratorical display before the Senate, and make the proceedings of the Senate the vehicle of communication for his speech throughout the United States, and wash deeper and deeper the channel through which flow the angry waters of agitation already?

If that is his object, I must be allowed to say, when he undertakes to agitate, perhaps the true current cannot be controlled, unless there is some counteracting influence upon his speech. I say this much to the gentleman himself. His speech must have an influence. I suppose it is intended to have an influence; and, therefore, I feel extremely embarrassed on this subject, as I have heretofore said, that I did not intend to suppress discussion or exclude petitions. I feel more embarrassed upon the vote I shall give than I have upon almost any other subject, and I am inclined to think that I shall not vote at all in reference to the matter, but leave it to others to decide it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, if this were a mere question of courtesy, I apprehend I should be as ready to extend it to the Senator from Massachusetts as any one here. But, while I will not say that it rises above courtesy, and extends as far as some Senators seem to consider it—the question of the integrity of this Union—I will say that it is a question materially affecting the practical business before this body. We have recently passed a resolution, after some considerable debate, in which we have solemnly determined—we have brought ourselves under a solemn obligation—that we will devote our time from this to the last day of August, to the practical business of the country, for which we were sent here, and for want of which no one can deny that the country is to some extent suffering, and is destined to suffer still more. For that reason, without undertaking to give any other—deeming that sufficient—I shall vote against the consideration of this resolution at this time.

I think Senators have erred, to some extent in supposing that we commit a discourtesy, or do anything unusual in refusing to the Senator from Massachusetts the taking up of his resolution out of its order at this time, and considering it. Nothing is more common in the proceedings of this body than to refuse to take up a question that is not considered of practical importance, to the postponement and exclusion of other matters which all acknowledge to be matters of practical importance, and which have precedence in the regular order of business. I myself, although I have experienced the courtesy of the Senate in many instances, have made motions to take up important business which was before the Senate out of its order, and have been refused. There is not a Senator, I apprehend, upon this floor, who has felt interested in bills for his own State—if that be discourtesy—who has not received discourtesy from the hands of the Senate, upon asking to take up business which the Senate recognized and acknowledged to be of vital interest to the constituents of the Senator making the proposition. But I have never considered it a discourtesy. I have never supposed that any other Senator considered it a discourtesy to be refused precedence for business in which he took a special interest over all other business. Why, then, should it be considered an act of discourtesy to the Senator from Massachusetts? Why should it be considered anything unusual to refuse now to take up and consider his resolution, to the postponement and exclusion of all the important business of the session, in the very last month of the session, when everything must necessarily be considered in some degree of haste? Why should it be considered an act of discourtesy to him to refuse to postpone every other interest, however important, to take up and consider that which I apprehend neither he himself nor any other Senator upon this floor would say is to have any practical operation here—certainly no beneficial operation—upon the business which is pending before us, and which it is our solemn duty to attend to, at this time, and attend to assiduously.

There is, in my opinion, no disguising the fact, that if this subject is discussed by one Senator, it will call forth discussion from other Senators, and there is no telling, when it is once open, when it will be closed. Now, Mr. President, I appeal to the two great parties who compose this Senate, as the representatives of the American States, whether, when we adopted the compromise measures so called, we did not make a solemn pledge, and if both parties do not now stand pledged, not only by their votes here but by their Conventions recently held in a neighboring city, to pursue such a course as shall keep out of the councils of the nation and the public discussions of the country, as far as they may be able to do so, all consideration of this subject, which has always been agitating to the country—which has always been evil in its consequences, and dangerous to the integrity of this Union? I may say here, as I have often said to my constituents, that to many of those measures I was opposed. I am not going, Mr. President, into a discussion of their merits. I simply wish to state my position. When those measures were passed by constitutional majorities in the two Houses of Congress, and received the official sanction of the President of the United States, whatever opposition I might have felt to them, I felt bound by a sense of duty to the country to yield my opposition, and acquiesce, for the sake of peace, and quiet, and harmony in the country, and the preservation of this Union. But if Senators and Representatives who had objections, and yielded them upon considerations of this sort, feel bound now to sustain the measures for the great object for which they were passed, and to sustain what has been said to be the accomplishment of that great object, I ask, if the majority who approved of them, who voted for them all, who sustained them here, and proclaimed them as a "peace-offering," and as having accomplished the object, if they are not bound now to carry out the pledge solemnly made, and since so often solemnly reiterated, and by their votes, and by their decided action here, keep agitation out of the Senate of the United States, and leave the matter at peace so far as we can, and attend to our practical duties? For these considerations, I shall vote against considering the resolution.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to be likely that we shall consume all our time in this preliminary debate.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JULY 29, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 123.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to move to postpone the resolution until next Saturday.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution is not under consideration. The simple question is on postponing the orders with a view of taking it up, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senate will recollect that the bill making appropriations for the Indian Department has been, I may say, before the Senate for three days. It was reported one day, it was yesterday taken up, and the Senate adjourned while it was pending.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to ask the Chair whether it is not competent to move to postpone the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts until next Saturday?

Mr. HUNTER. This is a question in relation to the order of business, and cannot be postponed, but must be decided.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing the orders with the view of taking up the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts. That question cannot be postponed; it must be taken.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clarke, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Foot, Hamlin, Seward, Shields, Sumner, Upham, and Wade—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Burdett, Brodhead, Brooke, Cass, Charlton, Clemens, De Saussure, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hunter, King, Mallory, Mangum, Mason, Meriwether, Miller, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Toucey, and Weller—32.

So the motion to take up the resolution was not agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special orders. The first special order is the bill from the House of Representatives "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1853."

Mr. SEWARD. I do not think that bill was made the special order for to-day.

The PRESIDENT. It is the unfinished business of yesterday, and is therefore the first special order.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to state, for the information of the Senate, and especially for the information of the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] that I came here this morning, intending to propose to take up the bill providing for a reconnaissance of Behring's Straits. I give notice now, that I shall ask the Senate to take up that bill after we shall have got through with the bill now under consideration, or during the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. CASS. I merely wish to observe that I have had a conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and he has agreed to interpose no objection to the consideration of the bill for the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, when the bill now under consideration shall be disposed of. Myself and my colleague are very anxious to terminate that bill. I therefore wish to give notice that when it is next taken up, I shall urge the Senate to dispose of it; and I shall ask to have it taken up as soon as this bill is through with. I will repeat what I said yesterday, that if we cannot satisfactorily show to the Senate that a work of defense upon a remote frontier, and upon the land of the United States, has no more connection with the doctrine of internal improvements than it has with the judiciary, or any other power assumed and granted to the Government of the United States, we will abandon the whole measure.

The PRESIDENT. The Indian appropriation bill is under consideration. It has been reported from the Committee on Finance with several amendments, the first of which is to strike out the following clause:

"For liquidated balance found due the Creek Indians, for losses sustained during the last war with Great Britain by that portion of the tribe that was friendly to and co-operated with the United States, in accordance with the promise of the Government, $130,417 90, to be paid by the United States agent for the Creek Indians, to those individuals now living, and the legal representatives of those deceased, who are entitled to receive the same."

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, this claim is, I believe, an old acquaintance of the Senate. It originated in the transactions of the war of 1814 with the Creeks, which was determined by a treaty made by General Jackson with the tribe in that year. When that treaty was made by General Jackson, under the instructions of the War Department, he obtained a cession from the Creeks for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the expenses of the war; and for military and other purposes, he obtained a cession of a large portion of land. I believe it amounted to 22,000,000 of acres. Of these lands, about 8,000,000 of acres belonged to the friendly Creeks. This amount was reserved by General Jackson, as he said, for military purposes, and purposes which were then beneficial, not only to the United States, but to the Creeks themselves, because by interposing white settlements there they intercepted the Creek Indians from access to Florida, which was then a foreign possession. It was necessary, therefore, for military, as well as other purposes, to obtain possession of this portion of the Creek lands. When that cession was made, the friendly Creeks were not satisfied with the terms of the treaty. They agreed to sign it, however, provided that General Jackson would send on to the Government, along with their signatures, their statement in relation to their claim. It is a statement which was sent along with the treaty. It was not a portion of the treaty—it was not incorporated into the treaty; but it was sent by General Jackson as their statement along with the treaty when it was communicated to the Government. Their statement was:

"We call ourselves, as we are, masters of the land. We have adhered faithfully in peace and war to our treaty stipulations with the United States. Finding that General Jackson, in drawing the lines around our country, to retain so much of that conquered from the hostile Indians as he deemed just, found it necessary, for political motives and purposes, to run a line within which there is a great quantity of lands actually our property, for which he, as an equivalent, leaves to the conquered Indians lands between Coosa and Tallapoosa, we do not deem the exchange as an equivalent. It shall not, however, interfere with running the line, as we rely on the justice of the United States to cause justice to be done us. And on these conditions we request that General Pinckney's letter, of the 23d of April, to Colonel Hawkins, and the answer thereto, of the 25th, be sent on with the treaty, which we will sign after delivering this instrument."

The portion of General Pinckney's letter here referred to contains these declarations:

"The United States will retain so much of the conquered territory as may appear to the Government thereof to be a just indemnity for the expenses of the war, and as a restitution for the injuries sustained by its citizens and the friendly Creek Indians. You will please, sir, to communicate these terms to the friendly Indians, and enjoin them, in the prosecution of the war against such as may continue hostile, to abstain carefully from injuring those who may be returning with the intention of making their submission. You may likewise inform them that the United States will not forget their fidelity, but in the arrangement which may be made of the lands to be retained as indemnity, their claim will be respected; and such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves by their exertions and valor in the common cause will also receive a remuneration in the ceded lands, in such manner as the Government may direct."

General Jackson, in making the treaty, obviously had reference to these assurances; for he retained in that treaty for each of the Creek chieftains the lands of which they were in possession for the use of themselves and their heirs, so long as they remained upon them. He also retained for the friendly Creek Indians a portion of the land which belonged to the hostile Creeks. It is true that when they asked him where the hostiles were to go, he said there was enough for both; and in this he said what was perfectly true; for he retained upwards of five millions of acres for a tribe numbering from twenty thousand to twenty-five thousand persons, being something like two hundred and fifty acres per man. He said it was enough for both. I believe it was. But he transmitted, as they desired, with the treaty, their communication in reference to their lands. Colonel Hawkins, the Indian agent, and a very valuable agent, one in whom the Government seemed to have great confidence, and justly to have reposed it, was written to on the subject. In relation to these claims of the friendly Creeks, Colonel Hawkins says:

"As to the extent of the claims, I have no data to calculate from. Part of the vouchers were taken on by Mr. Cassedy, the General's secretary, and the remainder given in since to the assistant agent, at Coweta, which I have ordered on here; whatever they may be, I will forward them, as soon as received. I believe, at the time of drawing the lines for the treaty, $60,000 would have been received as an equivalent. The Indians of Tookaubatche were the most faithful, and the greatest sufferers; their town was besieged for eight days, and when they had to retreat it was destroyed with all their property but what they could carry off when they retreated to Coweta. Some of Coosaude, Tuskegee, Coweta, and Tallahassee, had their houses burnt, their stock and provisions destroyed—some few to a considerable amount, but mostly to a trivial one. The losses sustained were by no means general, as many of the friendly towns did not lose anything but what was taken by disorderly individuals of Floyd's army."

Various questions were put to Colonel Hawkins by the War Department. The third question was:

"Question 3. Whether indemnity ought to be made to them by restoring a part of the ceded land, or by an additional annuity, or by giving them a certain fixed sum in money or goods?"

In reply to this he said:

"I believe the correct way would be to liquidate the claims of individuals, some of which, I am told, are too high; reduce them to a just value, and pay them. If it were a national claim, a cession of land might be desirable; but to individuals it is otherwise."

The meaning of that was obviously this: that Colonel Hawkins thought, not that we were bound to pay them for their lands—not that we were bound to pay them for property destroyed by the hostile Creeks, for we were not bound to indemnify our own citizens for the property destroyed during the war by the hostile Creeks, unless it was done because that property was in possession of the troops, or the possession of the United States for military stores. We were not bound to indemnify them according to any view of things, whether they be looked upon as citizens of our own country, or as a separate and independent people; but in order to satisfy them, as these friendly Indians seemed to think they had been hardly dealt by, Colonel Hawkins said the best way would be to liquidate these claims, and make the Indians an allowance of money. He said, that, at the time the treaty was made, he believed $60,000 would have satisfied them. Afterwards he made an examination, and on making that examination, he found that $78,000 ought to be paid them, and said their just claims could not exceed $100,000.

With this information, in 1817 the subject was brought up before Congress, and the Committee of Ways and Means, at the head of which was Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, reported upon it, and reported that under all these circumstances, after reciting this calculation of the Indians in relation to their lands, we should pay them $85,000, a sum which was between that found by Colonel Hawkins to be due, and the greatest amount which he thought could possibly be due to the Indians. In order to show that this was designed to be paid, not upon the supposition that we were bound to remunerate them actually for all the losses they suffered—not upon the supposition that we were bound to pay them for the eight millions of acres of land—but in order to do what was reasonable, to give satisfaction, it was proposed to make an appropriation of this sum of $85,000, in gross, to be distributed rateably amongst all the claimants, thinking that would satisfy the friendly Creek Indians in relation to their treatment by the United States. In order to show that that was his view, I will read what Mr. Lowndes says:

"At the time of the treaty, the friendly Creeks would have been satisfied, in the opinion of Colonel Hawkins, to have received as an indemnity for their losses, the sum of $60,000. As it is to be considered in some measure a claim under a treaty, as they seem to have expected that some fixed sum would be distributed among them as an equivalent for their losses, and as to do so will be to make it the interest of each sufferer that the losses of another shall not be exaggerated beyond their real amount, the committee believe that it will be best to appropriate a definite sum, to be applied, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to indemnify the friendly Creek Indians for property destroyed by the hostile Creeks, in fair proportion to their losses."

A law was passed, in pursuance of this recommendation of Mr. Lowndes, and the sum recommended, $85,000, was appropriated in gross. It was supposed to be as much as the Indians could reasonably expect; not upon the idea of paying them every cent which they might have lost from the injuries of the hostile Creeks during the war, but merely to satisfy them,—to persuade them that they had been dealt with generously. It seems, however, that they were not satisfied, and they presented their claim again. The matter was again adjudicated by the Committee of Ways and Means in 1824, at the head of which committee at that time was Mr. Louis McLane. That report takes the ground that the question had been settled by Mr. Lowndes, and that they would not disturb that settlement. Here is a portion of that report. The committee say:

"It is the opinion of the committee that the sum of $85,000, appropriated by the law of 1817, was intended to be a full indemnity for all the losses of the friendly Indians, and was equal to any reasonable expectation. This appears to be manifest from the estimate by Colonel Hawkins, that the chiefs would have been satisfied at the date of the treaty with the sum of $60,000; and, in the letter of the acting Secretary of War to D. B. Mitchell, the Indian agent, directing the application of the money, he is informed that, as the law is general in its terms, and predicated on Colonel Hawkins's estimate, it will be proper to pay the claimants mentioned in the estimate only a portion of their claim at present, as it is probable that there may be other claimants entitled to the benefits of the law, who are not mentioned in the list of claims furnished by Colonel Hawkins; therefore a final distribution of the money should not take place until the whole amount of the claims is ascertained."

This shows that it was the opinion of the Secretary of War that this was the allowance of a sum in gross to be distributed among the Indians ratably, so as to satisfy them of our mode of dealing with them. It was obviously the opinion of the Secretary of War that after ascertaining the whole amount of the claims, this sum of $85,000 was to be distributed among the claimants ratably. The committee, therefore, in 1824, decided that they would not disturb the settlement made in 1817.

I know, sir, that it has been urged by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, seizing upon a single clause in the report of 1824, that this committee, at the head of which was Mr. McLane—and which was one of the ablest committees, if you will refer to the members composing it, ever organized in the House of Representatives—did not understand this subject; and that they were mistaken as to the facts, basing the assertion upon a loose expression in the report. But whoever will read it will see it was consistent and clear in its object, as it was concise in its statements. The idea that Mr. McLane did not understand the statement of the agent, General Mitchell, which is relied upon in order to disparage and set aside this report, is refuted by the fact that, appended to the report is the letter of General Mitchell, which was presented along with it, and submitted by Mr. McLane and the committee themselves. It is obvious therefore that they had all these papers before them, and that they understood the subject. Their decision was, that they would not disturb this settlement—that it was a settlement made by Congress—not to pay the whole amount of the losses, but to pay a certain sum of money in gross, to be distributed among the claimants ratably.

It is nowhere to be found that Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, ever recommended the payment of the claim. Being called upon, he submitted these papers, and said they were all the information which he had upon the subject. General Jackson, when he submitted the treaty, did not recommend the payment to the friendly Creeks of anything. He was, subsequently, for eight years President of the United States, and had the power and the means, and would undoubtedly have recommended something to be paid, if he had believed that anything was due; but he failed to do so because, doubtless, he did not think it proper to disturb the settlement which had been made.

Now, I ask the Senate whether they think it right to go back and disturb the settlement and adjustment of this claim made in 1817—something like thirty-five years ago—especially when they come to remember that it was subsequently brought up to another committee in 1824, and they refused to disturb the settlement? It is now assumed, at this great distance of time, that we should go back and examine the circumstances attending this treaty, and see whether the settlement or adjustment was not an improper one, and reopen the whole question, in order to see that justice may be done.

Why, sir, if we act upon this principle, I take it upon myself to say that there is not a treaty which we have made with the Indians, which I have examined, which could not be set aside upon the same grounds. If we go upon the ground that the Indians were the owners of these lands, and that there was not enough paid to them for that ownership, I can take all the treaties and show upon their face that the Indians have not received a full compensation for what they have ceded. Why, I am told that the Osages have ceded to the United States upwards of 140,000,000 acres of land, and have received only about $400,000 in exchange for it. If we should reopen this treaty in order to readjust this agreement, I do not see how we could refuse to go back and examine the Osage treaty, and see if they had any legitimate claim upon us; for if these Creeks have any legitimate claim at all, it is in relation to their lands—the 8,000,000 acres taken from them. If we were to readjust this, and pay the $110,000 demanded, in addition to the $85,000 previously paid for their losses, you would make this act the foundation of another claim. They would come before us in a short time and ask us to give them something in return for the 8,000,000 acres of land which were ceded to the Government under the treaty of 1814.

But, sir, what will become of the Treasury? What will become of the time of Congress, if we thus go back and reopen these ancient transactions, and undertake now, upon such imperfect evidence as we may collect, to readjust these matters? I say, if we act upon this principle, we may make up our minds that we shall have business enough, in relation to these Indian claims, to employ nearly all the time which Congress has to bestow upon the business of the country; for I know of no treaty, if the question of inadequacy of consideration is to be made a ground for disturbing it, which may not be reopened and disturbed.

I go a little further. I say that if the Senate determine to reopen and readjust this account, and to go back into these ancient transactions, I am not satisfied that these Indians would be entitled to receive more than they have received. They certainly were not entitled to payment from us for losses inflicted upon them by members of their own tribe—by the hostile Creeks, and were to be paid nothing but a mere gratuity to satisfy them. Nor were we bound to remunerate them for the 8,000,000 acres of land taken from them; for, as General Jackson well said, those lands were taken, not only for our benefit, but for theirs; because it was greatly to their interest that peace should be preserved; and as long as the Creek nation had free access to Florida, it would be impossible, or at least very difficult, to preserve peace.

I do not, for one, admit that the Indians have any other than a possessory right in these lands. I do not believe that it is a proper principle in treating with them to consider them as the owners of the lands, and go upon the idea of compensating them for the lands. We have never done so. We have never paid them a sum which would be anything like a compensation for the lands themselves, if they were considered as belonging to the Indians. No, sir. Our obligation is this: that where it is necessary to remove these Indians, we do it in such a manner as shall be compatible with their future happiness and future improvement; and we make them such allowances as will put them in no worse a situation than arises from the very necessity of the case—and the necessity of the case under which they suffer, is being thrown into competition with the white man, a competition before which they must ultimately perish.

I believe that the course of the Government, so far from having been inhuman and unkind to these people, as has been said, for the last thirty or forty years at least, has been eminently humane, and has palliated, so far as they were concerned, a necessary evil. It has postponed their fate; it has delayed their destiny. The United States have done all that they could do in order to afford these people every facility for improvement and civilization. I believe, therefore, that we were not bound, in equity or law, to treat with these Indians upon the principle that they were the owners of these 8,000,000 acres of land, and that we should pay them for them. We left them, as General Jackson said, enough for both portions of the tribe. We gave them, according to this treaty, one year's subsistence. We gave, as we promised, to the chiefs of the friendly Indians, the possession of what they held, during their lives, and as long as their posterity would keep them. And finally we removed them west of the Mississippi, where this tribe, numbering now about twenty thousand people, have 9,000,000 acres of land—very fine lands—more, I am told by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, than they can possibly use.

Now, I ask, upon a survey of the whole of our transactions with these Indians—of all the circumstances connected with this matter, if we have not done as much for them as they could reasonably expect. I doubt whether we should have benefited them if we had given them a larger allowance in money. I believe that if we look into this matter we shall find that we have injured them by mistaken efforts of philanthropy; and that, often, when we have made these pecuniary allowances out of mistaken feelings of generosity, it was affording them the means of self-destruction, and the degradation of their tribe. In saying so, I do not speak without the book. Why, in the very last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, we have a report from the Kansas agent, Thomas Mosely, in which he says:

"I believe, and feel well assured, that large annuities of money afford a certain data by which the final extinction of the red men can, with arithmetical precision, be made. In this little tribe, now numbering less than six hundred, in the space of ten weeks there has been one murder, and several badly stabbed and injured, and some ten or twelve have died from the effects of drunkenness, and, in the mean time, about thirteen have died of cholera. The most of these were interperate."

In another portion of his report he says:

"I am clearly of the opinion, that to pay the annuities once a year is the better policy; and if it could be legally made only once in two years, it would then throw the dissolute and drinkers upon their own resources, and perchance they might see the necessity of betaking themselves to some useful employment. I view annuities, in money paid to Indians, as a great misfortune, if not a curse, to a majority, as they are seldom benefited by it to the extent of its amount. If some plan could be adopted by which the annuities could be expended upon improvements, farms, or houses for the Indians, it would result to them and their families more beneficial and valuable."

"I find the Shawnee people more industrious in the general, and better farmers, than the neighboring tribes. Why is this difference? It must be because they draw but a very small annuity, not sufficient even to attract traders, and they are thrown upon their own resources, and it is with them work or do worse."

I am therefore of opinion, that this claim has been adjusted as long ago as 1817, and that it would be impolitic now to attempt to disturb that settlement; and I must say, that if I were called upon to readjust, in looking to the transactions as they have come down to us through that distance of time, I believe that the Government has done as much for these Indians as it was wise to do upon any view of the case. Nor do I believe that it would have been better for the Indians themselves if the Government, at that day, had given them, instead of $85,000, $185,000 in money. It was for these reasons that I for one voted in the Committee on Finance to strike out this item, and to recommend to the Senate to strike it out.

MR. CHARLTON. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech in reference to this claim, but only to offer a few remarks in regard to it, as it has fallen in my way to be conversant with its nature. I differ now, as I would always differ from the honorable Senator from Virginia, with great diffidence, because I know the ability, the learning, and the research which he brings to the investigation of every question to which he turns his attention. But, sir, the human mind is liable to fall into error, and I think my friend from Virginia has made that lapse in the present instance.

The question before the Senate is, Have we made any promises to these Indians? and if we have made promises, have we performed them? The abstract question, whether we ought to pay them annuities at a greater or less distance of time, is a very different question. The questions now under consideration are, as I state them: Have we ever made any promises to these Indians? and have we fulfilled those promises? Senators must remember the condition of affairs at the time when these promises were made. We were then engaged in a war with Great Britain—I speak now of 1813 and 1814—and a great part of the Creek Indians were induced by the evil purposes perhaps of the British Government, certainly by other Indian tribes, particularly the Prophet—the brother of Tecumseh, I believe, being the main agent—to rebel against the treaties which they had made with the United States, and put themselves in a state of armed hostility. It was very important to the Government that a portion of these Indians, as many as could be, should be kept from active hostility against the United States, for we had enough upon our hands in the war with Great Britain and with the rest of the tribe. Those Indians who remained true to the Government, and true to the treaties which they had made with the Government, rendered essential service. They arrayed themselves against their own clan—against some of their own tribe; they gave their blood, and they gave their property, as the results of their aid in our behalf. I do not know whether my friend from Virginia is a military man or not, but he must remember that the very highest military authority of this land at present, an authority which, although he will not recognize it, a great many else will, has said that it is a very dangerous position for a man to place himself under a fire both in his front and in his rear at the same time. That is the position which the friendly Creeks occupied. They had divers fires to contend with in front and rear, but they remained true and faithful.

The first remark of the Senator from Virginia, to which I wish to reply, is, that we were not bound to indemnify the friendly Creeks for their own land, which they lost by remaining faithful to the treaty which they had formed with the Government. I say that we were bound to indemnify them for this land, because the Government promised to indemnify them; and the report which I have before me, from the Department of the Interior, shows that that was the policy of the Government, and that that was what we promised. It will be remembered that General Pinckney was clothed with almost absolute authority by the Secretary of War, in relation to this matter. In the report from the Department of the Interior, I find the following:

"General Pinckney employed Colonel Hawkins, the Government agent for the Creeks, to make known to them the terms upon which peace would be granted, among which was, that the United States will retain so much of the conquered territory as may appear to the Government to be a just indemnity for the expenses of the war, and as a restitution for the injuries sustained by its citizens, and the friendly Creek Indians." He was instructed to communicate these terms to the friendly Indians, and enjoin them, in the prosecution of the war against such as may continue hostile, to abstain carefully from injuring those who may be retreating with the intention of making their submission. You may likewise inform them that the United States will not forget their fidelity, but in the management which may be made of the land to be retained in indemnity, their claim will be respected, and such of their chiefs as have distinguished themselves by their exertions and valor in the common cause, will also receive a remuneration in the ceded lands, in such manner as the Government may direct."

Now, the Senate will perceive that we did make, during this war, a promise to indemnify the Creeks; that in consideration of their friendly conduct, we would indemnify them against all losses which they might sustain. That promise covered at that time, as was supposed, their individual losses incurred from the hostile Creeks during the contest; for they did not certainly, and the Government did not seem, at that time, to contemplate that as a reward to them for remaining friendly to the United States, we would take away their land. But the Government did take away the lands of the friendly Creeks; that was one of the fires in front and rear to which they were subjected.

Such was the condition of affairs when General Jackson came on to make this treaty with them. He insisted upon drawing his line with the sword. He took away not only the lands of the hostile Creeks, but also the land of the friendly Creeks; and when they asked him where they should go, he pointed them to what my friend from Virginia terms an "equivalent," which was a small portion of their own territory. It strikes me that this was a curious kind of equivalent. Suppose we had a very broad domain; suppose it possible that a foreign Government should conquer and take away all our lands, and give us a small portion, such as Rhode Island and Delaware, and tell us that was an equivalent for the losses we had sustained, and then put hostile people along with us. That was the condition of things in this case. The United States narrowed these Creeks to a small portion of their own territory, for they were masters of the whole Creek territory at that time, in a certain sense. A very small part of it in comparison with their great quantity of land, was reserved for them, and then the hostile Creeks were put in among them—the Indians whose blood was roused by the contest they had between each other. That was the equivalent which they got.

But it is said, that even if we were bound to pay them, this payment has been made. The various reports made on the subject in the House of Representatives have been alluded to, and I shall speak of them very briefly. First, it is said that Colonel Hawkins, the intelligent agent of these Indians, reported that $60,000 would have been received by them as an equivalent for these losses. I say, respectfully, that is not so. Colonel Hawkins reported that they would have received as an equivalent for their lands $60,000. Now, we all know that a party who is under the power of another may be willing to receive as an equivalent in one sense what is really not an equivalent in another. They were under the power of the Government. They were under the power of the military chieftain who had them in charge. But Colonel Hawkins, in that connection, was not speaking of these individual losses at all. He was alluding to the land, and he says so expressly. The report which I have before me from the Department of the Interior, speaking of Colonel Hawkins's report, says:

"In regard to the claim on account of the lands of the friendly Indians included in the cession exacted by the treaty, he expressed the opinion that at the time of drawing the lines for the treaty, $60,000 would have been received as an equivalent."

There is no claim here for the losses. This referred altogether to the land. He spoke exclusively of the land which the friendly Creeks had lost; and in making allusion to the $60,000, he did not refer at all to the individual losses which they had sustained. The Senator from Virginia tells you, and the reports will show, that one town—the town of Tookaubatche—was completely destroyed, the cattle of the inhabitants were driven away, and their houses were burnt down. The whole individual property of the chiefs and other warriors was taken away from them by the hostile Creeks. It is these individual losses for which they now claim compensation, and not for their land which has been taken from them.

Colonel Hawkins, in that very letter, draws a distinction between the land for which they were willing to receive $60,000, and the individual losses which they sustained. The losses were sustained by warriors who remained faithful to the United States during that conflict. Colonel Hawkins reported, in August, 1818, that he had no data on which to calculate as to the extent of the claims of individual losses, part of the vouchers having been taken away by General Jackson's secretary, and the remainder given to the assistant agent at Coweta. Then he goes on to say:

"In regard to the claim on account of the lands of the friendly Indians, included in the cession exacted by the treaty, he expressed the opinion that at the time of drawing the lines for the treaty, $60,000 would have been received as an equivalent."

There is a very clear distinction drawn here between the individual losses of the Indians, and the lands taken from them. Colonel Hawkins says that they were willing to receive $60,000 as an equivalent for their lands, but that he had no data from which he could make a calculation as to the extent of their individual losses.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the $60,000 cover the individual losses?

Mr. CHARLTON. There is very clearly a distinction drawn. He says:

"In regard to the claim on account of the lands of the friendly Indians, included in the cession exacted by the treaty, he expressed the opinion that at the time of drawing the lines for the treaty, $60,000 would have been received as an equivalent."

He stated that he had no data upon which to calculate, as to the extent of the claim for individual losses, and after stating that, he goes on to say that the Indians would have been willing to receive $60,000 as an equivalent for their lands.

Mr. BUTLER. Does he use the word losses, or lands?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will read to the Senator exactly what the report from the Department of the Interior says:

"Colonel Hawkins reported, August 18th, that he had no data upon which to calculate, as to the extent of the claims for the individual losses; part of the vouchers having been taken by General Jackson's secretary, and the remainder had been given to the assistant agent at Coweta."

"In regard to the claim on account of the lands of the friendly Indians, included in the cession exacted by the treaty, he expressed the opinion that at the time of drawing the lines for the treaty, $60,000 would have been received as an equivalent."

Colonel Hawkins, on the 1st of April, 1816, made an additional report as to the amount of the claims; and he stated that, from the peculiar condition of affairs, it was imperfect, and could not be otherwise till all the hunters came in; but he found in that report that the aggregate of the claims presented up to that time, was $108,415 12½. The amount favorably reported upon was $78,360 75.

It is manifest that he did not consider the $60,000 as an equivalent for both, for he makes a favorable report on claims to the amount of $78,360. He estimated that the whole amount of just claims would not exceed $100,000. The Senate will perceive that this was a mere estimate. He stated that the Indians were on their hunting grounds, and he could not form a correct estimate, but that he had already obtained an estimate which he considered as just, for over $78,000; and added that he supposed the just claims would amount to $100,000. In that estimate was not included the losses on account of the destruction at Tookaubatche. That town was totally devastated; and the individual property of the warriors was altogether destroyed.

In 1817, Mr. Lowndes made his report. I think by looking at it, it will be manifest that the committee did not consider that the $85,000 which they proposed to appropriate, was an equivalent for all the losses, and would pay for all the individual losses which the Indians had sustained. That will be made evident by turning to page five of the report which we have received from the Department of the Interior. The Secretary of War, upon the $85,000 appropriation, instructed Colonel Hawkins to pay the Indians "only a portion of their claims at present, as it is probable that there may be other claimants entitled to the benefits of the law who are not mentioned in the list furnished by Colonel Hawkins; therefore, a final distribution of the money should not take place until the whole amount of claims are ascertained."

It will not do for the Senator from Virginia to say that the Government did not intend to pay these losses in full. Certainly the whole action of the Government shows that it intended to pay the whole, in full, when fairly ascertained. What! this Government huckster with a party of unfortunate Indians to pay them a pro rata share upon their individual losses—losses recognized by the Government, the propriety of paying which was recognized, and an appropriation made to pay them. Is that the true construction of these instructions? Certainly it is not. Our sense of justice would revolt from that. The instructions do not contemplate that. They were to Colonel Hawkins to pay the Indians "only a portion of their claims at present, as it is probable there may be other claimants entitled to the benefits of the law who are not mentioned in the list of claims furnished by Colonel Hawkins; therefore a final distribution of the money should not take place until the whole amount of claims are ascertained."

I ask the Senate, was it intended, when the whole amount of claims was ascertained, to pay a pro rata portion? Would not that be an act of bad faith? The Government called to its service these unfortunate men, who really stand in the attitude of cestui que trusts. They remained faithful to the Government from circumstances which made it very honorable to them, or very politic to them, I do not know which. I ask, then, if such is the construction to be put upon this clause—that after their just claims had been ascertained according to the intention of the Secretary, he was to say to them, acting for the Government, "Gentlemen, we will give you a pro rata allowance, to be distributed amongst you, for these individual losses?" I beg my friend from Virginia to say seriously whether he thinks this was the meaning of the Secretary of War in his dealings with this unfortunate race—for they are unfortunate. In this case we have certainly got the lion's share. Whether they have merely a possessory right in the land, or whether it belonged to them, is not the question for our consideration. We certainly took the land from them. We took it from them in consequence of their fidelity to us against the hostile Creeks. It is at this day much more valuable to the Government, and has brought, and will bring, more money than would pay for the expenses of that war with the Indians. I do not think the instructions of the Secretary of War contemplated that there was to be merely a pro rata allowance to be paid to these men. The whole language shows that such was not his intention. The object was to retain a part of the claims until the whole amount should be ascertained, and then the Government was to pay them that full amount when it should have been ascertained.

Now we come to the report of 1824, upon which so much stress has been laid by the Senator from Virginia. It is said that in that case one of the most able men in this country made a report adverse to this claim. Mr. President, the ablest man in this country is liable to error, and it so happens that sometimes the ablest men in this country are more liable to error than anybody else, because they are very apt, in the press of public business, and the demands made on their time and talent, to overlook small matters. That the chairman of that committee fell into error is certainly no imputation on his talents. Far be it from me to make any imputation against the talents or business habits of Mr. McLane; but I say it is apparent upon the face of his report—and I think if the Senator from Virginia will read the whole report to the Senate, the Senate will agree with me—that he did make an egregious error. He states that the original claim amounted only to $110,417 90. Now, so far from that being true, that was the balance which remained after the application of the appropriation which had been made by Congress. Did he not fall into error there? He stated, as the whole amount originally claimed, what remained after the appropriation which had been made by Congress had been paid to them. I say that is the fair construction of it. And you will find that Governor Mitchell, who was appointed agent subsequent to Colonel Hawkins, reported this amount as the balance due to these Indians. This is what led Mr. McLane into his hasty error; and I will say here, that hasty errors, and hasty letters, ought to be carefully avoided, particularly in matters of arithmetic, for, unfortunately, figures never lie, though men sometimes do.

By looking at this report of Governor Mitchell, the then Creek agent, it will be seen that the amount of claims which he adjudicated was $184,028 50. The amount of payments was $73,610 60, leaving a balance due of $110,417 90. Yet Mr. McLane put this down as the whole amount of the liquidated claims. The original amount liquidated was $184,000, and the amount of payments was nearly $74,000, leaving a balance of over $110,000. Is not that a very essential difference? Is not the rule, falsus in uno falsus in omnibus, applicable here? If we discover an error of such a glaring character in regard to a matter of this description, is it not fair to infer that there are errors in other parts of the report? I make the question fairly. The Senator from Virginia says the fair construction of this report is, that this was the whole balance of the original claim. I only ask, in justice to these Indians, that that portion of the report be read. If it is read, I think the Senate will agree with me that Mr. McLane did fall into an error when he stated that that was the original amount, whereas it was only the balance.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator desire me to read it now?

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly; I shall be very happy to hear it.

Mr. HUNTER. Here is the paragraph to which the gentleman refers:

"These claims for horses were liquidated by the chiefs, in council, at Fort Hawkins, in July, 1817, and amounted to the sum of $110,417 90. Of this sum, $81,085 60 was paid to the individuals in proportion to their respective claims."

I admitted that this, strictly interpreted, was a mistaken view of the case; but it is very plain to my mind what he meant. One hundred and ten thousand dollars was the balance left of the claims of the Creeks after the $81,000 had been paid. When he said, "Of this sum $81,085 60 was paid," he meant to say that that was paid on the whole original sum of over $190,000. As a proof that he must have meant that he knew all about the matter, I would refer to the fact that he annexes to the report a letter of General David B. Mitchell, which shows that the $110,000 was the balance. It is from this report of Mr. McLane that I obtained a copy of the letter of Mr. Mitchell, which is there stated in full.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe Talleyrand said once that the use of language was to conceal thoughts; and I think that we may advance a little, and say, that the object of this report, in making figures and statement, (if the commentary of the Senator of Virginia be correct,) was to conceal what the writer really meant by it; for I say that it is self-evident, (if the explanation or commentary of the Senator from Virginia is correct,) that the gentleman who made this report has said directly the opposite of what he meant. It seems very curious that the author of it should write to a dollar and cent the very amount of the balance, and state it as the amount of the original claim "liquidated by the chiefs." Certainly, "liquidated by the chiefs." By whom else was it to be liquidated? It was presented by them and liquidated by them in common with the agent. There can be no mistake about that.

I ask the Senator from Virginia now, as I know he is a candid and fair man, to listen to this sentence from the report, which is very short, and tell me whether it is possible that it can bear the meaning which he gives to it?

"These claims for losses were liquidated by the chiefs, in council, at Fort Hawkins, in July, 1817, and amounted to the sum of $110,417 90. Of this sum, $81,085 60 was paid to the individuals, in proportion to their respective claims; and the balance ($3,914 40) was placed in the hands of the two principal chiefs, by general consent, to be applied to some cases of peculiar hardship otherwise unprovided for."

The report of Mr. McLane is wrong from beginning to end. The amount liquidated by the chiefs at Fort Hawkins, in 1817, was only $134,504 50. Afterwards, the amount liquidated at the agency, in 1818, was $49,524—making in all the sum of $184,028 50. So he was wrong there. He was wrong in stating that these claims for losses were adjudicated by the chiefs in 1817, to the amount of the sum named. But, in 1818, as I have already said, another amount of $49,524 was added; and, acting upon the instructions of the Secretary of War, payments were made upon these amounts of two fifths to each individual for those losses, ascertained, allowed, and acceded to—making the balance due, after the appropriation of $85,000 had been applied to that object, the precise balance of $110,417 90, which the report assumes to be the amount of the original liquidation.

Now, was not an error made there? Does not the Senator perceive, do not all perceive, that Mr. McLane was evidently in error? In the confusion of the moment, glancing his eye down upon the report of General Mitchell, looking at the items, he took the balance remaining as the sum total of the amount of claims liquidated, which a man in a hurry would be very apt to do. I say, he took the amount of balance as the original amount liquidated, whereas it was only the balance due after paying two fifths of the claims.

I do not feel myself authorized to trespass longer upon the patience of the Senate on this question. I did not intend to make a set speech upon it, and do not intend to do so now. I believe that honesty is the best policy; I believe that the remark applies to individuals, and I believe also that it applies to Governments. I think it applies more especially when we have to deal with those who are under our control. It is the same feeling which has always characterized us in dealing with the female sex; and these friendly Creeks were as much under our power as the ladies are, and a great deal more, let me say in parenthesis, not meaning to infringe upon the dignity of the Senate.

The question is, then, did we not promise this to the Indians? We did. We confirmed it afterwards. We agreed to pay the amount of the claims when they should be ascertained. Our own agent ascertained these claims, and stated them to be $184,000. Now, this idea that we are to pay for these claims pro rata, is unworthy of this Government.

Is it not a horrible idea that the United States Government, in dealing with these cestui que trusts, when the justice of the claims have been ascertained, is to give the claimants two fifths of their claims pro rata? These claims were ascertained by our own agent to his entire satisfaction; and he was a man whose honor cannot be impeached. Both these agents were beyond reproach. Here now, when we are asked to pay these claims, the cry is set up that they are a stale demand. That is always the cry when the weak claim from the strong. These claimants have been knocking at our doors for years; but other claims were in advance of them. I ask the Senate to look at this claim before they reject it. The fact that it has been long standing is no answer against it. It is the very reason why we should do justice now. The fact is we did promise to indemnify these Indians not only for the lands, but for the losses they sustained. Let the lands go; we took them from the friendly Creeks as a reward for their kind services in opposing their brother Creeks. They fought for us. The hostile Creeks took them on one flank, and deprived them of their property, drove away their cattle, burnt their houses, killed their women and children and some of themselves; left their red blood in that "Red Stick war." We, on the other flank, from motives of policy, took away the whole of their lands, and after a solemn promise made during this war that we were going to fully indemnify them for the losses which they had sustained from the hostile Creeks, penned them up in a small delta, and told them, "this is enough for you." When they asked us where the hostile Creeks were to go, we said to them: "Take them amongst you." Was not that very charitable and kind to pen them up in a small piece of land, and require them to take the hostile Creeks into their midst! This was the "equivalent" which my honorable friend from Virginia says they received. These other small pieces of land which he says the chiefs received individually as an "equivalent," they also lost. After the treaty, the laws of the whites were extended over them. Does my friend from Virginia not know that the Indians cannot live under the laws of the whites? And when the white population came in, the Indians had to abandon their pieces of land and clear off.

I speak zealously upon this matter. I have no particular interest in it. I do not know one of the Creek Indians. But I think justice ought to be done at all times and under all circumstances. The answer that this is a stale claim, will not do, provided it is shown here that this Government promised this unfortunate race to recompensate them for their individual losses; and on the showing of our own agent, paid them but two fifths of these losses. I therefore appeal to the justice of the Senate to retain in this bill, the appropriation which the House of Representatives have put into it for these claims. Let the bill stand as it is in this respect; and let the amendment of the committee be rejected.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I do not intend to make a speech to the Senate on this subject, for on two or three occasions before, when this question was before the Senate, I have presented my views of the case, and urged, as far as I was able, the propriety and justice of paying this claim. The Senator from Georgia, at this time, has so fully and clearly set forth the merits of the claim; that I do not think it needs another word by way of argument, in its support. But I rise simply to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from Virginia, to one single point, suggested incidentally by the Senator from Virginia—that the liquidation of these claims was made not by the agent of the Government, but by the chiefs of the Indians themselves. In that, the Senator from Virginia is clearly mistaken. The liquidation was made by the agent of the Government in consultation and cooperation with the chiefs. But suppose it had been made entirely by the chiefs of the Indians themselves; the fact that it was afterwards recognized by the agent of the Government as a proper liquidation, makes it equivalent to his own act, just as if he had gone into it originally and made the liquidation wholly himself.

Another thing: To show that these Indian chiefs who were concerned with the agent in this liquidation were not disposed to be exorbitant in their demands on the United States, or to yield to all claims which might be set up by the individual Indians, I would mention that they greatly reduced the claims, as presented by the individual Indians, and their award in many instances, perhaps in almost every instance, reduces considerably the amount of the claim.

But, sir, it is not necessary to go back to that transaction at all, to see whether they have made a fair liquidation or not. It is enough for us to act now, to know the fact, that in the year 1817, by a solemn act of Congress we recognized that liquidation, and made an appropriation to pay it, though it was not enough to pay it, as the Senator from Georgia has said; for, under that act, only two fifths of the claims were paid; that is, on a claim of $2,000, $800 were paid; and so it was throughout. The recognition by the Government of the claim, as far back as 1817, and its partial payment make it obligatory upon us, in my opinion, beyond dispute, to pay the balance now.

It was for this reason that I remarked, in a speech which I made on this subject, when the deficiency bill was under consideration, that I considered this claim as the only item in it which was a real deficiency. It was to make up a balance due upon a claim which had been liquidated and recognized by us, and paid in part. My opinion is that it should have remained in the deficiency bill, but the Senate struck it out. It has now pleased the House of Representatives to provide for the claim in this bill; and I do think it is time—I think we owe it to the ordinary considerations of justice, to say nothing of liberality and generosity, towards a people whose country we have taken, and whose dearest rights, we are bound to admit, we have trampled upon—to pay them now what they ask, not as a favor, but what they demand as a simple act of justice, which we acknowledged thirty-five years ago.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I do not propose to examine this question fully, since the Senator from Georgia has so clearly explained the grounds upon which the claim is supported. But I think that this proposition can be clearly discriminated from that class of propositions, or from that course of legislation, to which we seem to have a considerable tendency, in regard to compensations to the Indians for their lands; that is, going back and inquiring whether strict justice has been done to them, and whether more ought not to be done, upon some promises in some shape or form made by the agents of the Government at some time. I think this claim can be well discriminated from that whole class, in regard to which I agree with the Senator from Virginia, that it would be highly impolitic to go back and examine for years and years past, no matter how long or at what more recent period, and see whether exact and precise justice was done to an Indian tribe, when we had taken a portion of their lands from them by treaty; because in general it is but little more or less than taking their lands, for we give them such compensation as we are willing to give. I agree with the honorable Senator from Virginia as to that.

Nor can the idea be sustained of equalizing the payments that are made to indemnify the Indian tribes for their lands, under treaties made at various periods by the Government. Such a thing would be utterly impossible. We have not the means of doing it justly, in the first place; and in the second place, we are called upon by no considerations of justice to do it. I think, if the honorable Senator from Virginia has listened to the train of argument submitted by the Senator from Georgia, and will listen to an addition or two which I propose to make, he will see that this claim stands entirely upon a different ground. And I think, in order to understand it properly, it would be well for the Senate to throw out of view altogether all that has been said, and all the evidence that has been adduced as to the value of the lands taken from these Indians, under the treaty of Fort Jackson in 1814. We can throw that altogether out of the case; for, as I understand the claim, it is not based upon that idea. That has only been thrown in as a make weight, as an auxiliary argument, to show that justice required something to be done towards these Indians in regard to another matter.

I have been led to look somewhat carefully into this claim, upon the request of the honorable Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,] whose accuracy and judgment in these examinations I have had an opportunity of testing upon many prior occasions. When this proposition was brought up in the Senate as an amendment to the deficiency bill, I must confess that my impression was against the justice of the claim set up on behalf of the Creeks. I was not entirely satisfied in regard to it; but my impression was then strongly against it. I have since made a more careful examination into the matter, and find that no connection really exists between the foundation of this claim, and the claim as to the value of the lands which were taken from the friendly Creeks.

Again, I was unfavorably impressed towards the claim when the question was up before, by the consideration that, subsequent to 1814, and subsequent to 1817, and even subsequent to 1818, when these claims were liquidated, there had been two or three treaties made with the Creek Indians by this Government, and I did not clearly perceive why, if this had been a subsisting claim at the time, and the Indians had continued to make the claim—I mean the friendly Indians in the war of 1814—it was that this claim was not liquidated in those subsequent treaties. My mind was strongly impressed with the idea that if it had been well-founded—if the Indians themselves felt that they were clearly entitled to this additional compensation for their losses in the war of 1814, it would then have been set up, and would have been allowed by the Government, or we should have known why it was rejected.

There are two grounds upon which I doubted before, when this question was up.

If we can divest our minds of all that has been said, and all that has been found in these reports, as to the treaty of Fort Jackson, in regard to the cession of land, and in regard to the stipulation by which we obtained a large quantity of land, first from the hostiles, and then nearly as large a quantity from the friendly portion of the Creeks, we may be better able to see whether this claim is really founded upon distinct principles of its own, not connected with this idea of going back and paying a full compensation for lands that we got by the treaty a long time ago.

Now, sir, four or five months before this capitulation—for I must here recapitulate a part of the argument used by the honorable Senator from Georgia—General Pinckney, who was then the commander-in-chief of these forces, was written to by the Secretary of War, to assure the friendly Indians that they should be fully indemnified for all their losses sustained during the war. General Pinckney communicated the contents of this letter to the agent for the Indians, Colonel Hawkins. Colonel Hawkins sent runners through the Creek country, particularly to the friendly Creeks, inciting them to assist the Government of the United States against the hostiles. And it was in good part in consequence of this notification, that he succeeded in a few months in getting both the hostile Creeks and friendly Creeks together in general council, where General Jackson made known the terms upon which he would treat with them.

Complaint was made at that time to General Jackson, or he was reminded of the promise made to them of indemnity for their losses; and I believe he said they should be indemnified. The treaty was made. This was in 1814. Subsequently the agent of the Creeks was directed by the proper Department of the Government to ascertain and liquidate the claims of the friendly Creeks for spoiliations committed by the hostiles during the war in 1813 and 1814. In 1816 claims to the amount of about $100,000, I believe, were presented. I do not remember whether it was in the council of the chiefs or how. As I understand the communication of Colonel Hawkins, he communicated to the War Department the fact that the claims then, in 1816, supposed to be good, amounted to about $80,000; but he said, at the same time, that the account was imperfect—that all the claims were not presented or adjudicated, or, to use a mercantile phrase, liquidated. Congress, in 1817, appropriated $85,000, and put that amount at the disposal of the Government. The Government sent it out to the agent, who was, at that time, I believe, General Mitchell, who had superseded Colonel Hawkins, with instructions that if that were not enough to pay the whole amount, he should distribute it pro rata among the claimants to the amount of the claims then ascertained, as far as the liquidation had been attempted. In his report of the case, he expressly says that the account which he had sent was not complete. There were further claims to be ascertained and liquidated. When this sum of money was placed at the disposal of the agent, he paid it pro rata to the claimants, and reported that a balance of $110,000 remained unpaid. This report came in in the year 1818; for this liquidation, under which this balance of $110,000 remained unpaid, did not take place in 1817. The final liquidation of the claims took place in 1818. The friendly Creeks came forward and claimed this balance; and that is the foundation of the present claim.

The report of Mr. McLane, made in 1824, is relied upon to show that these Indians are not entitled to any balance. I will not recapitulate all the views submitted by the honorable Senator from Georgia upon that point, to show that the distinguished gentleman who made that report either had not the proper documents before him, or that he totally misunderstood those that were before him. I am of opinion that, by looking into the papers belonging to the question of that time, it will be seen that he had the data before him by which he could have corrected his own report, and that this balance of $110,000 remained after the $85,000, which had been appropriated, had been paid. One mistake of that report was in assuming that the $85,000 which had been paid was to be deducted from the $110,000, and in assuming the amount of the original claim as being $110,000, and therefore refusing to make a further appropriation.

There was an antecedent report of Mr. Lowndes, which has been referred to, which was made, I think, in 1817, in which Mr. Lowndes recognized distinctly the obligation of the Government to pay this claim; but it has no other connection with it except to show that that distinguished man recognized the obligation of the Government to pay the whole of this claim when ascertained.

Then, sir, this is a claim in the first place due, not to the Creek nation as a nation, but it is due only to a portion of the tribe. It was due to the friendly Creeks, constituting, it may be, a majority, or less than a majority, or, perhaps, more than a majority of the whole tribe. Subsequent treaties were made with the Creeks: one was made in 1821. It is very well known that that treaty was made, as was alleged at the time, and as is now, I suppose, generally admitted, by General McIntosh and his followers, without the consent of many of the leading chiefs and warriors of the tribe; for which reason he lost his life, and the lives of those who united with him in that treaty of Indian Spring, were endangered. That was the first treaty made by him without due authority from his tribe. The Government of the United States subsequently acknowledged this fact.

In 1826 there was an additional treaty made, which was to repair the mischiefs, and to restore harmony to the Creek nation, in consequence of the disruption of it, occasioned by the treaty of Indian Spring, made in 1821. The friendly Creeks—I am narrating now the circumstances which have reconciled my mind to believe that there is sufficient reason to support this claim—entered into that treaty of 1826 with a view to restore the harmony which had been interrupted in consequence of the arrangement made by General McIntosh in 1821. These claims then existed only as individual claims, and did not belong to the nation in its tribal character. This claim was still left by that treaty in the condition of a private claim on the part of the friendly Creek Indians, who had never been indemnified for the losses sustained by them at the hands of the hostiles in the war of 1813-14.

The treaty of 1832, about which we had a good deal of discussion in this Chamber some weeks ago, was a treaty by the whole tribe, not so much for the cession of the country, as for the cutting of it into reservations, with liberty to themselves to sell it without even executing an agreement to remove westward. This was a treaty entered into under circumstances of expediency and pressing necessity, at the time, with the whole nation, including the hostiles. It will be observed that all these treaties—those of 1821, 1826, and 1832—were treaties nominally made in the name of the whole nation. The treaty of 1821 was, in fact, made by a fraction of it, but not by this particular fraction—being made by a portion of these friendly Creeks who are the claimants, and perhaps a portion of the hostiles united with them. The treaty of 1826 was a national one, as regards the Indians, bringing in the whole tribe. Still these friendly Creeks—who had suffered in 1814, acting under the jarring interests and ill-feeling that existed among the different fractions of the tribe—at that time, without any prospect of success, attempted to interpose into the treaty what was considered a private claim against the Government of the United States in consequence of the promise of General Pinckney in 1814.

Then there is further evidence, that during the whole of this period Ho-poth-le-yoholo particularly, one of the most distinguished chiefs that belonged to the friendly part of the tribe, never lost sight of an opportunity of pressing this claim upon the Government. It truly rests upon his own authority to say—for we have no other documentary evidence of it—that in 1832, the last general treaty with the tribe, he did present that claim, and urged the propriety and justice of its being paid. He said that General Jackson said to him, in 1814, that this was a matter which concerned the whole country. "We want you to remove; but whenever you remove and go West 'this money will be ready for you; you shall be allowed the whole of your losses incurred in the 'war of 1814.'" I do not pretend that there is any documentary evidence for this, but we find by the report of Mr. McLane, in 1824, that it was a claim then prosecuted.

In 1841—while it was my bad fortune, perhaps, to be a few months at the head of one of the Departments—I dispatched an intelligent agent, well acquainted with the Indian character and Indian affairs, to that country. There had been so many panics and alarms got up on the western border with regard to several discontented portions of these tribes—the Cherokees and Creeks especially—that to ascertain the true character of their complaints, and to see if there could be any means devised of giving them content and making them satisfied, an agent was sent out. One of the causes of complaint reported by the agent was, that those who were alive of the old friendly party in what was called the "Red Stick war" of 1814, considered that this Government had not kept its faith with them; that they had been promised by the Government of the United States indemnity for their losses; that they had only been partially paid; that they had brought their claims again and again to the Government; that the Government had shut its ears to them; that they had prosecuted their claim from time to time, and that the Government continued to lend a deaf ear to them, and that they would never be satisfied until the balance of their losses was paid them. I believe such was the written report of the agent. I have not seen it very recently, but I imagine that it can very readily be referred to. I adduce this for the purpose of showing that these Indians never lost sight of that claim in their national or tribal character, but that the representatives of this portion of the tribe which incurred the losses, considered that they had a claim upon the Government under its express promise.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to interrupt him for a moment? for I really wish to ascertain his views, not for the purpose of controversy, but to see what they are. If I understand him, his opinion is, that we are called upon to pay these Indians for the losses which they sustained in the war—that we are bound to make good their individual claims for those losses, and are not bound to pay them anything for the lands which we have taken from them.

Mr. BELL. My judgment is not founded on the land at all; and therefore I said that we could more clearly comprehend the full justice of the claim by throwing out the consideration of the land.

Mr. HUNTER. But I would ask the Senator whether, if we are bound to pay this claim, he does not think we shall have another claim made here for the land? I wish to ascertain whether the Senator thinks this will be the end of it, or whether it will not bind us to make good another claim for the lands themselves? For myself, it seems to me that that will be the result.

Mr. BELL. My opinion is that this Government cannot go back in a search after justice, even if it has been neglected and trodden upon in our transactions with the Indians. As the honorable Senator from Virginia himself said, if you examine the scale of allowances made to the Indian tribes, you will find that some have had a hundred, and some five hundred, and some a thousand percent. more than others, owing to the different circumstances under which treaties have been made, the difference in the value of the land, and owing also to the different views of justice entertained by the Government at different times. I doubt if a hundred millions of dollars would equalize the allowances to be made to the Indians for the exactions we have made from them of their lands. I concur most cordially and clearly with the honorable Senator from Virginia on that head, and with regard to the cession of these lands, as the Indians say, which were taken by General Jackson when, like Brennus, he threw the sword into the scale. I think we cannot go back. The Indians, as a nation, have had the benefit of the sale of three fifths of their whole country, at whatever prices their lands would bring. That has happened to the hostile as well as to the friendly portion of the Creek nation. Though I believe they have had little out of their reservations, yet each head of a family was permitted to sell and make what he could out of the six hundred and forty acres which he held. That was a much larger allowance than this Government thought proper to allow to numerous other Indian tribes in the treaties we have made with them. I do not think that on grounds of policy or of justice, in regard to this tribe—unless we take up the large, broad, expansive, and philanthropic idea of indemnifying the remnants of all these tribes for the value of the land of which we have deprived them since the foundation of the Government—that there can be any limitation to such a proposition. Such a proposition, it appears to me, would be chimerical—a proposition which we would not have the power or the resources to fulfill or carry out. I agree that General Jackson took a portion of their lands, as they called them, but I do not think there is much in that idea, because the land was as much the land of the hostile as of the friendly Creeks.

What the friendly Indians meant by that, as I understand, is, that General Jackson took possession of a strip of territory which they happened to occupy; for the country occupied by the nation was one—there was no line between the two sections separating the friendly from the hostile. I repeat, that the lands so taken by General Jackson belonged quite as much to the hostile as to the friendly Creeks. The latter had no greater right than the others, being merely the occupants of that country; and General Jackson might have said to them, "I take this land not only from you, but from the whole nation; you occupy it as one nation of Indians; I do not draw any lines between you." So that I think there is nothing in that argument, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] need not have any fears that they can come here and make any reclamation on this Government for having been despoiled of their lands, as those lands constituted a part of the common Creek country. This claim is founded on very different considerations. It is not a claim made by the whole, but by a part of the Creek nation, which remained firm in their friendship to the United States, and who shed their blood in attempting to reduce their hostile brethren to submission to the United States. They show that, in accordance with the terms of the capitulation, they ought to have been indemnified for their losses; and they say that they never were indemnified.

I have attempted to show the distinctive features of this claim, as being distinct from that class to which the Senator from Virginia referred, when he stated so forcibly and truly that this Government could not go back to do justice to these tribes, from whom we have obtained lands, and who now think that we did not pay them a full and ample compensation. It is for these reasons, without attempting to go into all the particulars of the case, that I have been led to change my impression of the validity of the claim, since this subject was under consideration on a former occasion. If I am mistaken in any material fact, I should like to be corrected. But I think this is a private claim, being set up by a portion of the tribe, and therefore not in any sense a national claim, which it was not convenient to pay, and not likely to be taken into consideration in subsequent treaties, because the views of a portion of the tribe were hostile to it. For example, the hostile Indians did not care about making it a condition in the treaties of 1821, 1826, or 1832, that the friendly portion of the tribe should be paid for losses inflicted upon them by the hostile Indians themselves. It was not a matter which concerned the nation at large; and I think that because it is rather in the nature of a private claim, and because these friendly Creeks have never been able to get the assent of the whole tribe to urge the claim on this Government, we ought to be more careful to do them justice than if it had been an outstanding claim of the tribe from 1814. If it had been an outstanding claim of the tribe since 1814, I should have reason to suppose that it would have been settled in the treaty of 1821, or 1826, or 1832. I have stated the reasons why it was not settled by either of those treaties.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

And, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 28, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

• CORNELIUS COVERT.

Mr. STUART. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of Cornelius Covert was referred to the Committee of the Whole House. It will be recollected that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] objected to the passage of the bill when it was last up, but since then he has become satisfied of the correctness of the bill, and that it ought to pass. The bill is simply for the correction of a mistake in the contract. The proof is clear and conclusive that the contract was drawn up for $219, when it ought to have been $419, according to the accepted bid. The Postmaster General recommended to the committee that the contractor be paid $396 per annum, which is the amount of the next bid below him. There can be no objection to the bill. I repeat that it is simply for the correction of an error. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred.

The question was then put upon Mr. STUART's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the vote was reconsidered.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan whether this subject has been investigated by any committee of the House?

Mr. STUART. I will state that it has been very carefully examined by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLEVELAND. One question further. I want to know if the committee unanimously recommended this bill?

Mr. STUART. So I understand. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] stated to the House the other day very distinctly, that there was no question about it. I hope the bill will be passed at once.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was subsequently—being engrossed—read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STUART moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

OAKLAND AND OTTAWA RAILROAD BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. BARRERE on Friday last, to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 290, "granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa Railroad, commencing at the village of Pontiac, in the county of Oakland, and terminating on the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in the county of Ottawa," was laid upon the table.

Mr. STUART. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and one hundred and sixty members answered to their names.

During the call of the roll the following proceedings took place:

Mr. HENDRICKS stated that Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. KING, of New York, stated that Mr. BUELL was detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. HART stated that Mr. MARSHALL, of California, was confined to his room by sickness.

On motion by Mr. ORR, all further proceedings under the call were then dispensed with.

The question recurred upon reconsidering the vote by which the Oakland and Ottawa Railroad bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. The last vote taken in reference to this bill was on a motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and the House refused to lay it upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That being the case, the Chair must rule the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee out of order.

Mr. SAVAGE. Then I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, and the Chair doubts whether it is competent to postpone indefinitely the motion to reconsider. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. TUCK demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, Rusby, E. Carrington Cabell, L. D. Campbell, T. Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Conger, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Evans, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Gentry, Goodrich, Green, Harper, Hays, Haven, Hendricks, Heib, Houston, Howard, Thomas Y. How, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Kurtz, Landry, Mace, Miller, Molony, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Pennington, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Sackett, Schermorkorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Thurston, Townsend, Walsh, Ward, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babcock, Beale, Bell, Bonck, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Burrows, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Churchill, Cleveland, Daniel, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Duncan, Dunham, Edmundson, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hebard, Holladay, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Jackson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Morehead, Murphy, Newton, Perkins, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Savage, Schomaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Stratton, Tuck, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Watkins, and Wildrick—74.

So the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table was reconsidered.

During the call of the roll, the following proceedings took place:

Mr. ASHE stated that he had paired off with Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana.

Mr. COBB. I was engaged in conversation at the time, and do not know whether I was within the bar when my name was called or not. I believe I was, but I cannot speak with certainty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he believes that he was within the bar when his name was called, and the Chair thinks that is enough to entitle him to vote.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I must object.

Mr. COBB. If there is any objection, I will not ask that my vote may be recorded.

The question then recurred upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. KING, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. STUART. Before that question is taken, I move that there be a call of the House, and on that motion, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I presume that the object of the gentleman from Michigan is merely to exhaust the morning hour, and I hope, therefore, that he will allow this question to go over until to-morrow, and permit us to go on with the river and harbor bill at once. If there be no objection, I will move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. STUART. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair, so that there may be no misunderstanding about this matter. I do not wish to embarrass the business of the House, but I want to know, if this bill is passed by now, what will be its condition. Will it come up to-morrow morning? I understand that it will.

The SPEAKER. If the bill is postponed there will be no difficulty; it will come up during the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. Then I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I now withdraw the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I now move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order before the expiration of the morning hour, unless by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the motion was submitted, and on being put, it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Olds in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 282, making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose, there were two questions pending. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] moved to strike out, after the words "navigation of," in line twenty-one, to the word "dollars," in line twenty-five, inclusive, and insert a substitute in place thereof. The gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. YATES] moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "rapids," in the original proposition, and insert the words "the Falls of St. Anthony." The question pending, therefore, is upon the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. MARSHALL'S amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. Upon that amendment I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BAYLY, of Virginia, and ST. MARTIN were appointed.

The original clause was read, as follows:

"For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river below the rapids; the Ohio, including the repairs of the dam at Cumberland Island; the Missouri and the Arkansas rivers, $260,000."

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out after the word "navigation," to the word "dollars," in line twenty-five, inclusive, and insert the following: "of the Ohio river above the falls, $50,000; for the purchase of the snag-boats necessary for efficient service on the western rivers, $100,000; and for the improvement of the Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, and Ohio below the falls, $200,000."

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 63.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. MILLER offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "river," in the twenty-second line, to the word "dollars," in the twenty-fifth line, inclusive, and insert the following:

For the improvement of the Ohio river, $50,000;

For the improvement and repairs of the dam at Cumberland Island, $50,000;

For the improvement of the Mississippi river between the Falls of St. Anthony and the head of the Des Moines rapids, $30,000;

For the improvement of the Mississippi river between the foot of the Des Moines rapids and the mouth of the Ohio, $50,000;

For the improvement of the Mississippi river between the mouth of the Ohio and New Orleans, $50,000;

For the improvement of the Missouri river below the mouth of the Big Sioux river, $60,000;

For the improvement of the Arkansas river, $50,000;

For the improvement of the Illinois, Tennessee, and Cumberland rivers, each, $40,000.

Mr. M. said: Mr. Chairman, I have offered that amendment because I regard the provisions of this bill, as reported by the Committee on Commerce, as inadequate to the wants of the western rivers, and because the committee have aggregated the objects of appropriation. I regard it, sir, as insufficient, because, by reference to the estimates which were furnished by the Topographical Bureau in 1850, and which have been several times alluded to in the course of this discussion, it will be seen that over $100,000 are needed for the construction of snag-boats and other boats necessary for the improvement of our western rivers. It will be seen, by reference to the Executive documents of 1849-'50, that the estimates for the construction of snag-boats were as follows:

For the construction and outfit of two snag-boats, of the largest class, at $35,000 each.....	$50,000
For the construction of three light draught snag boats, $15,000 each.....	45,000
For the construction and outfit of two machine boats, at $2,250 each.....	4,500
For repairs and reoutfit of snag-boat Hercules.....	2,000
	$101,500

The bill reported by the committee includes in the appropriations of $260,000, for the four rivers mentioned, the repairs for the dam at Cumberland Island in the Ohio river, which, according to the estimates furnished by the Topographical Bureau to the last Congress, amounts to the sum of $50,000. Add to this the estimates by the same bureau, for contingencies of all sorts, of $14,500, and the cost of snag and other boats, and the improvement of Cumberland dam, will amount to $166,000; which sum, deducted from the amount of the appropriation, will leave only $94,000 for the improvement of the thousands of miles of navigable water in those four great rivers.

And yet the Committee on Commerce have reported the sum of $50,000—more than half that amount—for the improvement of the Hudson, which, as I understand, has only one hundred and fifty miles of navigable water. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not objecting to this appropriation for the Hudson river; but if it be necessary to appropriate $50,000 for one hundred and fifty miles upon the Hudson, which is a better stream than either of those mentioned in my amendment—better than the Ohio, as I understand, and far better than the Missouri, the Mississippi, or the Arkansas river, how much ought to be appropriated for those streams? If you will estimate it, you will find that this bill appropriates more than $300 a mile for the Hudson river; while it has appropriated only at the rate of about $50 a mile for these western rivers. Gentlemen say that more commerce passes over the Hudson than over either of those rivers. That may be true; but I presume no gentleman will contend that there have been as many lives lost, as many boats sunk, and as much property lost upon the Hudson in the last fifteen years as upon the Mississippi river and its tributaries within a single year. I have before me a report, which reached me last night in one of the western papers, showing that since the first of January last the number of steamboats lost upon these rivers has been thirty-one. The number lost by snags, since the navigation of the Mississippi river and its tributaries by steamboats commenced, is four hundred and sixty-nine, and the number lost during the year 1849 was eighty-three.

I ask that the gentlemen of this committee will look at this further fact. The steam marine upon our western waters is greater than the whole of that of Great Britain. The whole steam marine of Great Britain amounted, in 1848, to 168,078 tons, while that upon our western rivers amounts to 204,725 tons. I ask that this committee will not only make such appropriations as our western rivers require, but I ask that they will do another act of justice to the people of the West. I ask that, instead of appropriating $260,000 for the four rivers, leaving its distribution to the discretion of the officer who superintends their improvement, and the application of this fund, that you will make specific appropriations for each river, and not leave the appropriation in such condition that the amount may be applied exclusively to any one, or two of them, but give to each an amount to which it is fairly and justly entitled.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I am opposed to this, as I am to all amendments offered to this bill. But I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact: If they will consider the subject but a minute, they will be satisfied that they can accomplish their objects, and save a vast deal of time, by a course other than that of offering all these amendments. There is, as gentlemen know, a substitute for this bill before this committee, offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLEY] which embraces all, or nearly all, these various amendments proposed by gentlemen from the different sections of the Union. That substitute will necessarily come up and be acted upon by the committee, and gentlemen who prefer to support that, which is the bill that passed the House the last session, can support that amendment. If it passes, all, or nearly all, the improvements for which these various amendments are offered, will be provided for. I shall myself vote against that amendment, and I trust a majority of the committee will. But by pursuing that course, we shall decide all these questions by a single vote, and shall thus save the time now so unnecessarily expended, as gentlemen must be aware.

One word further. I have no doubt that gentleman offering these amendments hope they will pass, or if they have had abundant evidence from the action of the committee that they are not to pass, they are placing themselves right before their constituents in order to satisfy them that their Representatives have not been unmindful of their particular interests. But in the substitute offered, these gentlemen can all accomplish their object by recording their votes in the House in favor of that substitute, and save the useless consumption of time. I would therefore suggest to the gentlemen of this committee, that we can bring this matter to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion by coming to a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina. If that is voted up or down, let us vote upon the bill as presented after that vote, and let it be the final vote. All this time will then be saved, and the object of all these gentlemen will be as well cared for by recording their votes in the House as if all these separate amendments had been offered.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order.

Mr. MILLER. Then I demand tellers upon my amendment.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. MILLER—

Mr. MILLER demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment:

Add the following at the end of the clause, in line twenty-five: "And for the purchase of snag-boats for service on the western and southwestern rivers, $80,000."

Mr. M. said: I have not offered a single amendment except in good faith, and with the idea that it ought to pass. I have now, in the shape in which I have placed this amendment, abandoned the hope of fixing the amount for the improvement of the upper Ohio at $60,000, as was estimated by the engineers, and am compelled to leave the appropriation as the Committee on Commerce have placed it.

I have now, sir, offered an appropriation which will add eighty thousand dollars, for the purpose of building snag-boats upon the western waters, and will increase the appropriations in this bill by that sum. And I wish to know how it is, that this committee can consider it fair and proper to appropriate in this bill $100,000 for the purpose of making dredge-boats and delivery scows for use upon the northern lakes, and refuse the same amount for the purpose of making snag-boats for use upon the western rivers? I do not understand the philosophy of this; and it is insufficient to tell me, in explanation of it, that the Committee on Commerce have reported it. I have already stated to the committee, that at the time this system stopped, in 1847, there were four snag-boats being used upon the Mississippi and Ohio, but that they were sold out. From this $260,000 in the bill, which includes $50,000 for the Cumberland dam, and $60,000 estimated by the engineers for the upper Ohio, you will have remaining but $150,000 for the Missouri, the Arkansas, the Mississippi, and the Ohio below the falls. And of this amount, if you expend $100,000 to replace the snag-boats necessary to recommence this system of improvement, you will have left then but $50,000 with which to work upon the whole western rivers.

Now, sir, I do not know what western men may do. I do not know what the Representatives of the valley of the Mississippi may do; but if this House refuses this appropriation, I would vote this bill down a thousand times. This is one of the last appeals I have to make, and I trust that this amendment will be put upon the bill. It is fair, it is proper, and it is necessary.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, who last addressed the committee.

It is a little singular that the Department did not think proper to recommend to this House and to Congress, any greater appropriation for the western rivers than the committee have reported in this bill. They reported all that the Department recommended. Now, sir, I do not know—perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] can inform the committee—what is the cost of a snag-boat, as compared with dredge-boats, as to their durability? And why is it that gentlemen indulge here in asking for these random appropriations?

Mr. MARSHALL. Twenty-five thousand dollars have been estimated for each of these snag-boats. The estimate is contained in the report of the superintendent of western improvements; and if the gentleman had looked through the reports, he would have seen what snag-boats cost.

Mr. FULLER. Suffice it to say, in answer to the gentleman, that the committee reported all that the Department recommended, and I suppose the Department understands what is necessary to be appropriated in any one year. If I have any idea of the mode of improvement of the western rivers, it is not as expensive as the building piers of stone-work and masonry; it is simply by the use of these boats, the pulling up the snags.

But, sir, there is another reason why the amendment proposed by the gentleman should not be voted by the committee. This Government owes $63,000,000, and it pays $3,000,000 a year interest money. A million and a half of dollars is all that the present force of your Topographical Bureau can expend in any one year. Do gentlemen want to vote large sums of money to have that Bureau increased to expend it? It strikes me not. It would not be judicious, and I think, therefore, that a bill that appropriates $1,500,000 a year, is in all conscience enough.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I only wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER], and also of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL], to the estimates which were sent to Colonel Long, who has the supervision of this work. In that he estimates as necessary to build and outfit the two new snag-boats of the largest class, $25,000 each, and three of a lighter draft, at $15,000 each. He also recommends the repair and outfit of the large boat on hand, the Hercules. These estimates were referred to us by the chief of the Topographical Bureau. This is all they ask for, and it leaves a balance of $50,000 for the Cumberland Island dam and the working of these boats for one year. The simple question is whether we shall add $80,000 or $100,000 more than the Department asked for for the present fiscal year?

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to raise the sum from $260,000 to $850,000.

My object, Mr. Chairman, is to get for those western rivers precisely the same amount which we voted for the Collins line. I voted for that appropriation. I thought it right then, and I still think so, and would vote for it again. But, sir, I am of the opinion that this appropriation for the Mississippi river is entirely too small—I mean for the Mississippi and its tributaries. According to the report of Lieutenant Maury, there are twenty thousand miles of navigable waters. That river and its upper tributaries, lie in fifteen of the States. One half of the Union is directly interested in this matter. Now, sir, it is very well known, that that section has heretofore had but little or nothing of all the appropriations made by this Government.

The people of the West have come up liberally to maintain the Government in its revenues, and by men in times of war, and from their interior position they have had but little or nothing. Now, I do not contend that it is a sound principle to distribute money merely with the view of giving equality to the different sections; but, sir, those western rivers really need it, and when they can make a fair case for an appropriation, why should you not give them a liberal one, so as to put them on a fair footing with the rest of the Union?

I have a statement which estimates the commerce upon that river and its tributaries, upwards and downward, at more than $200,000,000. Then, you have an immense commerce passing over many thousands of miles of navigable water, of the most dangerous character in this country; and yet, sir, the obstacles are not of the kind that are most difficult of removal, such as long shoals or stony rapids. They consist mainly of snags, and some bars of mud, which can be easily displaced. I hope, therefore, when it is borne in mind that there are immense losses annually upon those rivers, by means of obstructions that can easily be removed, and that this Government has heretofore done little or nothing for that section. I trust, I say, that gentlemen will come up and give it a liberal appropriation.

But I am told by the gentleman over the way, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] that the present bill proposes to give as much money as can be expended in one year. I care nothing about that. I think it very likely that we shall not get another of these bills passed for the next ten years, (nor do I care much if we do not, as I am not partial to the system,) and as these rivers have been for fourteen years without an appropriation, I should like to give them a liberal one at this time. Let us do what is right. The Treasury is said to be now in a good condition, with a surplus of ten or fifteen millions of dollars, and let us make a liberal appropriation for that portion of country that has heretofore had but little, and is most in want.

I moved this amendment, Mr. Chairman, not as a mere matter of form, but because I think the appropriation too small; and I hope that those gentlemen who, like myself, are not very friendly to the system, will nevertheless agree that if it is to go on, and expenditures are to be made, that they shall be so arranged as to do the greatest amount of good. As this river and its tributaries lie in so many States, it cannot otherwise be improved.

I think it very likely that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated such action as this; yet all parties and all Administrations have sanctioned national appropriations. But everything is national in one sense, and local in another, and my great objection to this whole system is, that you can draw no line of distinction between what is national and what is merely local, and therefore there are likely to be great abuses. I hope that gentlemen who stand like me, not very favorable to this system of improvement by the General Government, will, if it is to go on, vote the money where it is most needed. Let us act fairly to all sections of the country, and vote for this amendment, and if it shall be adopted with some other changes, I am inclined to vote for the bill. As it now stands, however, the appropriations it makes are so unequal, and lavished with so partial a hand, where they are least needed, that the bill, as a whole, ought to be defeated for that reason alone.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. CLINGMAN—

Tellers were demanded and ordered; and Messrs. HAMILTON and BEALE were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 67; no quorum.

By unanimous consent a recount was ordered.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 85.

So the amendment of Mr. CLINGMAN was not agreed to.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Tennessee river and its navigable tributaries, above the Muscle Shoals, $138,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

I offer the amendment for the Tennessee river again, with a variation in the amount of the appropriation. It seems that all outside of the Committee on Commerce have to put their fingers upon a particular wire to have any amendment passed. In offering the amendment again to the bill, I do so without much hope that it will be adopted. The amount is based on proper estimates from the Department, and cannot be objected to on that account. That it is for a national object no one in all the opposition has denied; yet there is a fatality attending the proposition, which seems common to all, unfortunate indeed, sir. The bill reported by the Committee on Commerce seems to be so perfect in all its parts, that its friends oppose every amendment, however wise and meritorious. Up to the present hour, I suppose not less than fifty propositions have been offered and voted down. In this bill, the Ohio and Arkansas are provided for. Why is the Tennessee left out? It was in the bill reported by a similar committee to the last Congress. Has it grown less important, or less national and meritorious?

This improvement has been estimated for by the Department. Several members of that committee have informed me that they are willing to put this amendment in. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] intimated his willingness for its incorporation into the bill. I hope he will now yield it his support, and I trust that it will meet with the approval of a majority of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to an explanation of his amendment.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. My amendment explains itself. [Laughter.] Its reading is its best explanation, and I hope it will be passed. I will tell gentlemen interested in the passage of this bill that eleven votes will count in its passage. I ask the adoption of my amendment, because I believe it to be necessary and proper. If we look back into the history of this system, we find that the Tennessee river, although the fourth river in navigable extent in the United States, has received comparatively nothing from the Treasury.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman must have been mistaken in supposing I would vote for this amendment. He told me there had been surveys made for the improvement of the Tennessee river by the General Government, and that he had them in his possession. I told him that I would look at them with pleasure. I gave him no assurance that I would vote for the appropriation.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. The gentleman said that he had no objection to the improvement of the Tennessee river, and I understood him to say the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. I said on yesterday that the time would speedily come when the Tennessee river would be reached in the progress of these improvements.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Yes, sir, the time will come, I hope—and I suppose the gentleman would vote that it be improved now if it cost nothing. The honorable gentleman remarked that he had not seen the estimates. Those estimates were before the committee. They were in the hands of its chairman for several days, and if the gentleman from Maryland has not seen them it is not my fault. I have them. He can see them now. It will be my pleasure to show them to him. Here they are:

WAR DEPARTMENT, } WASHINGTON, July 13, 1852. }

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request, I have the honor to transmit you an estimate, prepared by the Colonel of Topographical Engineers, for the improvement of the Tennessee river, above the Muscle Shoals.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. M. CONRAD, Secretary of War.

Hon. WM. M. CHURCHWELL,
House of Representatives.

BUREAU OF TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS, } WASHINGTON, July 13, 1852. }

SIR: In reply to the inquiries of the Hon. Mr. CHURCHWELL, in reference to the various estimates for the improvement of the Tennessee river, I have the honor to state that these estimates were made at a period when prices of food and labor were much lower than now. The estimate for the impediments above the Muscle Shoals, has been revised by State commissioners, under this change of prices, which revision, it is believed, will approach nearer the reality of the expenditure than the estimates of 1831.

The revised estimate refers exclusively to the impediments in that river above the Muscle Shoal region, or between Kelly's Ferry and Knoxville, a distance of about two hundred and fifty miles. And from the best information which is now possessed, it is believed, that if the river were adequately improved in this distance, that it would be navigable for small draft steamboats, throughout its whole extent from Knoxville to the Ohio, and throughout the greater part of the year. These considerations make the improvement of that part of the river an object of serious importance. For this part of the river, the revised estimate amounts to—

To which add for a dredge-boat..... $166,000
And for contingencies, ten per cent..... 12,600

Making a total of..... $138,600

Respectfully submitted,
J. J. ABERT,
Colonel of Corps of Topographical Engineers.

Hon. C. M. CONRAD, Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask my colleague whether by his remark, that eleven votes would pass a bill, he alluded to the delegation from Tennessee?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. In reply to the honorable gentleman, I will state that an explanation is unnecessary. Everybody knows how you will vote.

Mr. JONES. There are eleven from Tennessee.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Yes, sir; but I did not say eleven votes from Tennessee; there are some from Kentucky who I hope will support my amendment, and who will not support the bill unless there is more liberality shown to western rivers. I should like to make an allusion to the history of this question, as it seems that from the position I have assumed, I am to be indirectly lectured by my own colleague. I beg leave to present to the consideration of the committee a test vote in the United States Senate, where, it is to be presumed, are the leaders of the parties, that it may be seen that I am not alone in that position.

In the Congressional Globe of March 3, 1847, among the proceedings of that date I find the following test vote:

"Mr. DAVIS moved that the Senate proceed to consider the bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors.

"Mr. D. explained that it was a bill from the House appropriating about $600,000 for the improvement of rivers in the West, and for certain harbors.

"Mr. BAGBY understood the object of the bill. But he hoped it would not be taken up, as it would lead to a discussion which would consume so much time as would prejudice other bills of greater importance.

"Mr. DAVIS replied, that whether there was any discussion would depend on the Senator from Alabama and his friends. He (Mr. D.) did not intend to discuss it.

"Mr. BAGBY said he would oppose the bill item by item. "Mr. DIX stated that he had introduced this bill. He had no doubt of the constitutionality of the appropriations for the objects which were specified, and he hoped the bill would be passed.

"The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to take up the bill, and the question being taken, it was decided as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashby, Atchison, Badger, Breese, Cameron, Cass, Gilley, John M. Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, Dickinson, Dix, Evans, Greene, Hannegan, Houston, Huntington, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Niles, Pearce, Simmons, Soule, Upham, Webster, and Woodbridge—32.

"NAYS—Messrs. Bagby, Benton, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Chalmers, Mason, Turney, and Vilece—9.

"The bill was then taken up in Committee of the Whole.

"Mr. BAGBY would not delay the business of the Senate by opposing the bill item by item, as he had promised, and would simply content himself with moving as a test question, to strike out the appropriation of $150,000 for the improvement of the river below the falls at Louisville; and on that question he should ask the yeas and nays without further remark.

"The question was taken, and decided in the negative; as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Bagby, Butler, Mason, Niles, Turney, and Vilece—6.

"NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashby, Atchison, Badger, Benton, Breese, Bright, Calhoun, Cameron, Cass, Chalmers, Gilley, John M. Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Dickinson, Dix, Evans, Fairfield, Greene, Hannegan, Houston, Huntington, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Simmons, Soule, Sturgeon, Upham, Webster, Westcott, and Woodbridge—38.

"The bill was then read a third time and passed."

Thus, upon the question (which was understood to be a test) there stood for it, twenty Democrats and eighteen Whigs, and only six Democrats against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is sorry to interrupt the gentleman, but he must confine his remarks to his amendment.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the amendment will pass. My time will not allow me to enter into a constitutional argument upon this subject, but I content myself by giving the opinion (as inferred from their votes) of twenty Democrats, strict constructionists, of the Senate, who voted in favor of the system on a test question—only six voting against it. I am opposed to a general and extravagant system of internal improvement; but having the sanction of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, and General Jackson, under whose administrations appropriations were made, I thought proper to ask an appropriation for an object as national and as important as any in the bill. I hope it will be granted. During a period of forty years in the history of the Administrations, from 1806 up to 1845, there has been expended for road, harbor, and river improvements, not including surveys, $17,199,223. I propose to give the amount expendent by each Administration, the year of the expenditure, the State in which expended, and the division of the Union in which expended. The information is exhibited in the following tables, viz:

It is a remarkable fact, sir, that out of the whole expenditure for internal improvement by the General Government, the southern States have received but $4,679,045, as will be seen by the table, while the northern States have received $10,822,178. The gallant State of South Carolina has not received one dollar. I mention these facts, not from any sectional feeling, but merely to state them as they are shown from the figures. When will the time arrive when western commerce and western rivers are to receive their due proportion of the revenue? Will it ever arrive? I fear not, sir, under the system adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not wish to read a lecture to my colleague, or to anybody else here, but I intend to say—

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Is the gentleman opposing the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Certainly. I do not intend to vote for the bill whether the appropriation for the Tennessee be included in the bill or not.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Of course not; that would not be expected of my colleague.

Mr. CHURCHWELL demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CASKIE. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the James and Appomattox rivers, below the cities of Richmond and Petersburg, $45,000.

Unlike my friend, Mr. Chairman, I go into this battle with a high hope, yes, a confidence of success; for I do not consider the amendment I offer to have yet been, in all that has been said upon this floor, really opposed. There are many things I desire to say—some of them relating to myself—but five minutes fly by so quickly that I must not only talk rapidly, but sacrificing all else, I shall confine myself to the simple presentation of such facts as time will permit me to adduce. It is a mistake to suppose that the people of Virginia are indifferent to these rivers. A petition for the improvement of the James river was, I am informed, presented to the last Congress. The Council of the city of Richmond has repeatedly acted on the subject. I have here before me the proceedings of a "Virginia Commercial Convention," held in the city of Richmond the 10th and 11th of September, 1851, in which, by resolution, they declared that "the bars which now obstruct the navigation of the James river should be removed."

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce seems to base his objection to our amendment, as I find him reported in the Globe, upon the idea that we claim that our amendment "should now be inserted without estimates, without surveys and without data."

Now, if I show him that this is error, that there are surveys, estimates, and data on which I ask this amendment, may I not appeal to his fairness, and the fairness of gentlemen on all sides of the House, and ask if they will not remember the maxim "equality is equity," and in this committee correct the plain injustice of the omission of Virginia from the bill? Here in this volume of Executive documents which I hold in my hand, is the report of Howard Stansbury, United States Civil Engineer, made to Colonel Abert, of the Topographical Engineers, giving the results of a complete survey of that part of the James river where the obstructions exist, to which this amendment relates. I have been informed by Professor Bache, who is now with his camp at Rosslyn, near Petersburg, engaged in the survey of the twelve miles of the Appomattox, which this amendment includes, and which survey he will follow by that of the James, as part of the Coast Survey, of which he is the head, and who has very recently made an inspection of the James, that from such examination as he has been able to make, Stansbury's Report is a very thorough and reliable document. It is also his opinion that if there be any error in that report, it is against the improvement—the professor considering that perhaps the obstructions are now less serious than they would appear from the report. Stansbury's estimate is $115,200.

And without making any complaint, I must be permitted to remark, that since we have been in this committee I have presented to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, for his examination, the report of Stansbury.

Here let me say that I trust an opportunity will be afforded the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. MORRHEAD,] who informs me that he considers his district as much interested in this matter as my own, to say a word on this amendment.

Now as to data. I had supposed that a glance at the map, and a very slight inspection of the census synopsis, which I imagine is in the possession of every member of this committee, would be sufficient to show the impropriety of the omission of Virginia from the bill.

Here are before me plenty of statistics, which I wish my time would allow me to read. I will give you some from the report of a committee of that Commercial Convention, to which I have already alluded, in which report it is stated that "the tonnage employed in the direct foreign trade between Europe and the waters of the James river, amounts to nearly 30,000 tons." To which I will add, that besides many large schooners running between Richmond and various ports of the country, there are now steam lines from Richmond to Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, which serve a very active commerce:

"In estimating the present value of the Chesapeake trade, so far as materials are at hand for a correct estimate, we will find that the James river and Kanawha canal, its principal tributary, contributed during the last year, $6,135,365 49, the products of the interior; whilst it carried into the interior, merchandise and other articles, valued at $7,727,324 29."

"The business of the Central Railroad has doubled within the past year, its downward tonnage amounting to 25,000 tons, and its upward transportation is perhaps one half that amount."

Mr. STROTHER. I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment of my colleague. I move to strike out $45,000, and insert $60,000. My reasons for so doing, I will state very briefly to the committee. It is true that the Committee on Commerce have overlooked James river, in Virginia, in the division of funds which they propose to devote to this subject; and so far as the influence and effect of the action of that committee bear upon the question, it ignores the existence of one of the largest commercial interests in this country. There is hardly any commercial portion of this country so largely demanding the favorable consideration of this body, as this very one now under consideration. The city of Richmond is now the center of internal improvements in the shape of canals and railroads, upon which have been expended, by State and individual enterprise, near $20,000,000. Improvements are reaching towards, and when completed, will grapple with the mighty commercial productions of the Mississippi valley, so that there are concentrated already at that point a large amount of productions, not only of Virginia but of part of North Carolina, seeking for foreign and home markets, to be largely increased when these improvements strike the valley of the Mississippi river. Consequently not only the interests of Virginia are involved in this question, but the interests of all the northern commercial States, and the interests of the western productive States. This tide of production flowing and to flow along these lines to Richmond and Petersburg is obstructed in its after progress to the outside markets of the country, by the impediments in James river. The owners of vessels North, and the purchasers of productions North, are interested, as much as we are in Virginia, in the removal of these impediments.

The report of Mr. Stansbury, referred to by my colleague, [Mr. CASKIE,] shows the cost of this improvement in removing these bars, by which large vessels come up to the ports of Richmond and Petersburg. So we have data upon which to make this appropriation, and upon that data I urge upon this committee that $60,000 are hardly enough to accomplish all that is desired in the removal of the largest impediments, and the giving a larger and freer flow to this tide of trade and commerce. I know that there are influences operating upon the minds of this committee against this appropriation. First, that the Representatives of Virginia, in their strict construction of the powers of this Government over this question, take ground but upon principles of justice and right. And many consider it just and proper to give to Virginia the fullest benefit of her own constitutional doctrines. These doctrines, although still regarded as of great value, are now treated as holy relics, and so far as the action of the Federal Government is concerned, are reserved entirely for exhibition at grand party festivals and conventions, and exhibited there for the veneration and admiration of party. Certainly, since the days of the Memphis Convention, where the geographical discovery was announced that the Mississippi was an internal sea—a sort of Mediterranean—and its affluents, bays, estuaries, &c., the policy of the Government upon the questions embraced in this bill may be regarded as fixed, and the Virginia construction as discarded and obsolete.

While I am a disciple of that school, I am not of the "straight sect," and believe that the Federal Government has the power to improve harbors and rivers. Furthermore, I recognize the necessity of modifying abstract opinions according to the changing, enlarging, and exciting exigencies of the laws. It would be certainly unjust to the people of Virginia, and to the people of the whole Union, for this committee to reject this amendment upon the reason stated. The system should be administered upon no principles of favoritism or of punishments, but according to the just requirements of the commercial wants of the country. I stand ready to vote for any bill that is just, and wise, and fair in its character, and against any that is not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STROTHER,] who last spoke, and in favor of the original amendment. I shall have great hesitation in reconsidering any determination—

Mr. STROTHER. I was about to say, that at the suggestion of gentlemen, if the committee is peculiarly economical upon a question of $15,000, I would withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that the amendment cannot be withdrawn until I have concluded what I have to say. I was about to say that I should have great hesitation in reconsidering any determination to which the Committee on Commerce, upon a full examination of the subject, had come. I understand this to be a matter which has not been brought before the Committee on Commerce, or considered by them. I understood further, in relation to some of the appropriations asked for here, that there have been no surveys made by which Congress could judge of the cost, or what was to be done. That objection does not exist in this case, for full surveys have been made under the authority of this Government showing that this improvement may be made at an expense less than the annual injury resulting to commerce there.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it in order for the gentleman to advocate this amendment? I understand that he should oppose the addition of $15,000.

Mr. DAVIS. It is legitimate for me to show that the addition ought not to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The first gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CASKIE] proposes $45,000. The other gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STROTHER] proposes to amend by striking out "forty-five," and inserting "sixty." The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] opposes striking out "forty" and inserting "sixty."

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has a right to oppose the addition of $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] must confine his remarks to the difference between $45,000 and $60,000.

Mr. DAVIS. If my friend does not see the pertinency of my argument, it is no fault of mine. I will go on in the line of suggestion I was about making. I was about to say, that it appears by the report of the engineer made under the authority of this Government some number of years ago, that this improvement may be made at an expense less than the annual injury which results to commerce from the existence of these obstructions. It further appears, if any gentleman will take the pains to examine into the facts, that this improvement has been agitated in Virginia for many years.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. DUNCAN. I believe there has been no opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STROTHER,] has been discussed for and against. After the vote is taken upon this amendment it will be in order to oppose the original amendment.

Mr. STROTHER. With the leave of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment.

There being no objection, it was withdrawn.

Mr. DUNCAN. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CASKIE,] upon the other side of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. How many speeches can be made upon this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STROTHER] offered his amendment, and made a speech for it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] rose and opposed it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There was an amendment made to that, and two speeches made upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds, that when the amendment was offered, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CASKIE] made a speech in favor of it. Before any opposition was made, another gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STROTHER] rose and offered an amendment to the amendment, and there was a speech for and against it. It was withdrawn, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DUNCAN] now rises to oppose the amendment offered by Mr. CASKIE.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I should like to ask if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STROTHER] had not been withdrawn, if he could go on and oppose the original amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. After it had been voted down he could have done so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Such has not been the practice before this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAMPBELL] rises to a question of order, that an amendment to the amendment having been offered before a speech was made in opposition to the original amendment, it is not in order afterwards to make a five-minutes speech in opposition to that amendment. The Chair overrules the point of order. From that decision the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAMPBELL] takes an appeal. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. DUNCAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CASKIE,] and I assign as a reason for the consideration of the House—the reason which I assigned a few days ago—that the improvement of the James river was never in any manner brought to the notice of the committee. I care not for the political opinions of the gentlemen from Virginia who represent that State upon the floor of this House. It was perfectly in the power of the business men at Richmond and other points upon James river, interested in this navigation, to send up a petition or to present themselves in person, and bring the subject of that improvement to the notice of the committee.

Mr. McMULLIN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I will ask the gentleman if the committee did not know the fact that estimates for this river were provided for in the bill of the last Congress?

Mr. DUNCAN. I stated that we had the bill before us, but we did not consider it as the rule of our action at all.

Mr. McMULLIN. I ask the gentleman if he is not now satisfied that the subject has been brought before this committee, and if it is not now competent for the committee to take cognizance of it?

Mr. DUNCAN. The question then presents itself to the House, whether they are prepared to go into an examination and introduce an important amendment upon the floor of this House, which has never been presented to the committee, in preference to some fifty other petitions of similar character for improvements upon the lakes and elsewhere, which were presented to the committee, and which they felt bound to reject under the restrictions which they imposed upon themselves in the formation of this bill. The gentlemen from the remote lakes, and from various portions of the country, have represented the state of the respective improvements before the committee. I say that if this House inserts the appropriation for this river, at this time, they ought to go further, and make some fifty more appropriations. Unless they are prepared to do this, I call upon them not to make this appropriation—though it may be a worthy one—for James river. I do not undertake to say that it is not a proper subject of appropriation; but when satisfied of that fact, I shall certainly vote with great cheerfulness for the appropriation of James river. It was impossible for the committee to make provisions for all the objects which they deem constitutional, necessary, and important. It is only a question of time. Those cases which are omitted this year may be presented next year, and will then deserve, and I hope receive, the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, moved to amend the amendment by striking out “$45,000” and inserting in lieu thereof “$75,000.”

Mr. C. said: I offer that amendment for the reason that, in my opinion, there is no appropriation that has been asked for, or presented to this House, which is more entitled to favorable consideration than the one which is now under consideration. The sum of $45,000 is less than that which is estimated for, and therefore I am willing that it should be increased to $75,000, and even more if it is necessary. My intimate acquaintance with the State of Virginia places me in a position in which I may speak advisedly upon this subject. The statistics relating to the James river have been already presented by a Representative from the State of Virginia. It has been represented to this committee that in point of importance the post office receipts of the city of Richmond, chiefly interested in this improvement, are perhaps greater than those of any other city for the improvement of whose harbors appropriations are asked, with the exception of a few large cities upon the Atlantic. The commerce of this river, and its anticipated connection with the West, gives it, in my opinion, an especial claim upon the consideration of the House.

But if it be in order, and I rise cheerfully for the purpose, I will say that, in my judgment, the course of opposition to this and similar amendments, is the most extraordinary that has ever been presented to this House. Gentlemen from the committee seem to assume that all the wisdom of the House of Representatives is in their keeping, and that this House should not take upon itself to determine the propriety of considering particular amendments. They all agree in the importance of this particular provision, but because the gentleman from the city of Richmond, who is more particularly interested in it, did not follow up that committee, and find out where their meetings were, and insist upon this appropriation which had been estimated for from time to time, and which has been in every appropriation bill for the last fifteen or twenty years, therefore it is not to be acted upon. I ask that committee why it is they have stricken out the appropriation for James river, that has been in all these bills? The Representatives from Virginia, and the people of Virginia, may very well ask why it is that the committee have assumed to strike it out, without asking the Representatives from that State whether there was propriety in it or not. I have not myself been before the committee. I desire appropriations for my own State, and I did not know that it was expected we should go before the committee. I thought all that was necessary for me, and those who are interested in these appropriations, was to satisfy the House of Representatives that it was proper, and being proper, that they would act upon it, without the necessity for the consent and sanction of a majority of a committee of this House. At the last Congress, I did apply to the Committee on Commerce, and it was then decided that the appropriation I asked for was not national. Now, it strikes me as being rather peculiar, that nothing was national that came from Florida, and this year I did not go before the committee, for I expected the same result. But I hope to induce this House to take a different view of the important interests in which my State is concerned.

Mr. ORR. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Florida. I have no disposition to debate it, and I ask that the question may now be taken.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, moved to amend the amendment by striking out “$45,000,” and inserting “$51,000.”

Mr. B. said: As is very well known to this House, I have always been opposed to this whole system. I have never voted for any of these bills, and if I ever had any difficulty in my own mind as to the inexpediency, to say nothing about the utter want of the constitutional power of Congress to pass such appropriations—if anything were wanting to satisfy us of its inexpediency, it would be the course that the Committee on Commerce, that has reported this bill, has taken in respect to it, if I may judge of that course from the remarks of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DUNCAN.] What is it? He says that there was no appropriation put in this bill for the James river because the Representatives from Virginia did not go before that committee to ask for it.

Mr. DUNCAN. I did not say any such thing. I said there were no petitions presented for an appropriation for that river.

Mr. BAYLY. Very well. The gentleman, therefore, puts the neglect of the committee in acting upon this matter upon the ground that the people from the vicinity have not petitioned Congress in respect to the subject. Well, now, sir, I have made it an invariable rule of conduct on my part, as a member of several of the committees of this House, of which I have had the honor to be a member, to put less reliance upon petitions from the neighborhood, and less reliance upon the representations of members whose constituents are immediately interested in the appropriation, than upon anybody else's, because they are always interested in making out the best case they can for their constituents, which they invariably do. Their statements are “ex parte.” A better reliance for a committee of this House on all such occasions is, to take the responsible recommendations of the Executive. There is some little responsibility there. Their estimates are not entirely made under local influences. They are not entirely under the control of local interests in these matters, and it is no excuse to this committee that members from Virginia did not go to it, to whom they ought, to some extent, to have turned a deaf ear, if they had gone. They ought to have looked to the recommendations of the Department. I undertake to say, that no river and harbor bill—

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to say a word? The committee, when they took up this matter, had recommendations from the Department for a bill; and in those recommendations, which the committee looked at officially, there was no appropriation whatever for James river; so that the attention of the committee had not been at all called to it.

Mr. BAYLY. Why did not the Administration make an estimate and recommendation? It has always been done heretofore. Why has it been omitted now? No one can be at a loss to know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to suggest that this debate is entirely out of order. Both the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] are out of order. To be in order their remarks should go to show the propriety of striking out $45,000, and inserting $51,000.

Mr. ORR. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] but if Congress is to adjourn by the 31st of August, the House should finish this bill to-day.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MEADE moved to amend the amendment by striking out the sum of $45,000, and inserting $53,000 in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will notify the gentleman beforehand that he will have to confine himself strictly to showing why $53,000 should be inserted instead of $45,000.

Mr. MEADE. I think the Chair might as well have waited until I had broken the rule before he read me a lecture.

My object in making an increase of the appropriation, is to show to this committee that this improvement deserves a higher sum than is contained in the amendment, and at the same time, to meet the objections urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, against any appropriation to this object, and in doing so, I suppose I shall be in order.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts has impliedly informed this House that every appropriation contained in that bill has had a petition in its favor before the Committee on Commerce. That of the hundred and odd appropriations, large and small, contained in that bill, every one was represented by a petition before that committee. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to make that assertion?

Mr. DUNCAN. I never said anything of that kind. I said that there were either petitions presented, or representations from members.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Virginia should confine his remarks to showing the propriety of increasing the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order, for the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia are not applicable.

Mr. MEADE. Then how was the gentleman from Massachusetts in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided that the gentleman was out of order.

Mr. MEADE. I do not wish to appeal from the decision of the Chair at all, but I wish to remind this committee that the gentleman from Massachusetts himself has admitted the propriety of this appropriation in the course of his remarks. This committee is perfectly satisfied of the propriety of the appropriation, but if the bill be passed at all, there is not a man in this House who does not feel in his heart that the State of Virginia should have an appropriation, and all that is necessary for us to do, is to satisfy this House, and not the Committee on Commerce. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me bring to the attention of the House the fact that this improvement is absolutely necessary to a continuation of the line of improvements by which the products of the Mississippi arriving by railroads to Petersburg and Richmond are to seek foreign ports.

Mr. HOWARD. I am opposed to this amendment, and in favor of the proposition of the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. CASKIE.] The gentleman has said he cannot understand why the appropriation for this river was in the bill which passed the last Congress, and excluded from the estimates of the present session in the bill now under discussion. To me, sir, it appears to be a very plain matter. There is a species of old fogeyism in the heads of all these departments, who remain in office permanently without being subject to political change and the vicissitudes of party. It becomes a life establishment upon which they quarter all their friends. The head of the bureau, therefore, feels an interest in having a moderate bill which will be certain to pass, and furnish some money to spend for the benefit of friends and employees. He looks, therefore, rather to the success of a small bill, than to any enlarged and liberal consideration of the great public interests. The character of the present bill is a very apt illustration of that fact. When the Department found that objections were made to the magnitude of the bill which passed this House at the last session, it is evident the Chief of the Topographical Corps, commenced trimming up for the present session. Hence we find the Department struck first at the new States that could not vote very formidably in Congress, and excluded from them several important subjects of improvement contained in the former bill, especially in my own State; and in one instance, when it had the approbation of the Department at the last session, and in another where there had been a regular survey and estimates sent in.

Sir, the subject of the appropriation to the improvement of James river is another pregnant illustration of this course and policy of the Department. An appropriation for this work was embraced in the bill of last Congress. It has been thoroughly surveyed by an able officer of the Topographical Engineers, and regularly estimated for. Why, then, was it not embraced in the present estimates and bill? It was well known that the Virginia members, with perhaps one or two exceptions, would not vote for the measure. It was, therefore, expedient to distribute the amount to some section where the Representatives would pursue a different line of conduct. Hence, James river was given the go-by. In other words, the measure of justice to a State or district is made to depend upon the sentiments of the Representatives, or the voting strength of the State. Sir, this monstrosity is enough to disgust the country, not only with the present bill, but I fear with the whole system.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment proposed by Mr. CASKIE.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. St. MARTIN, and FULLER of Maine, were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE offered the following amendment to the amendment:

To the State of Kentucky to enable that State to continue the improvement of the navigation of the Kentucky river, $150,000.

Mr. B. said: I have been a silent observer of this debate, sir. I have taken no part in it. I have been a curious and interested observer of it. In the early part of the debate allusions were occasionally made to some principles which ought to govern these appropriations; but for the last two days it has degenerated into a scramble for the appropriation of money among the different sections and Congressional districts of this Union—just, sir, as you have seen boys scramble over the division of gingerbread or apples.

In this state of the case, I feel it my duty to come in and ask an appropriation for my district. I represent a district, sir, which is bounded in part by the Kentucky river, four counties of which lie, as it were, in the embrace of the Kentucky river; and I feel that I should merit the condemnation of my constituents if I failed, while the committee are proceeding upon present principles, to ask an appropriation for them. I believe, sir, the engineers have made no estimates for the Kentucky river; but that is nothing. On looking over this bill reported by the Committee on Commerce, of which I have made an analysis, I find that the majority of the appropriations recommended by them have not been estimated for by the engineers, in the printed report accompanying the President's message, nor recommended by the Department.

Mr. FULLER. I would like to correct that statement.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I cannot yield, for my time is very short. My statement is strictly correct. I have carefully analyzed this bill, and I think quite as carefully as the Committee on Commerce themselves have. Neither, sir, did I go before the Committee on Commerce and ask for an appropriation for the Kentucky river. I considered that the committee were bound—contrary to the principles which have been announced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DUNCAN]—to distribute appropriations fairly among all parts of the Union according to the merits of the respective sections. I thought that we should pass a national and not a local bill, for national and not local improvements; and that the Committee on Commerce was as much bound to know those objects which were national as a court of justice is to know those laws which are general. I am emboldened by the passage of the amendment for the improvement of James river, because I believe James river runs through a single State only, and the Kentucky river runs through a single State also. The committee will perceive, sir, that I have not proposed that this money shall be appropriated under the authority of the Federal Government. I have asked for it for the State of Kentucky, to be appropriated under her authority. Why? Because being neglected for a long series of years by the Federal Government, we undertook ourselves to improve that stream, and we have made locks and dams in it, and partially improved the navigation. The State of Kentucky has the jurisdiction over it, and the control of these locks and dams.

Now, if the money appropriated should be expended under the authority of the Federal Government, the Executive might take it into his head to tear down these locks and dams, and improve the river after some other notion. We want this money to be expended under State authority. The improvement to be made with the money I ask will be connected also after a certain fashion with foreign commerce; and therefore my amendment must command the approbation and the vote of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.] The commerce floats from the Kentucky into the Ohio, from the Ohio into the Mississippi, from the Mississippi into the Gulf of Mexico, and thence to the markets of this country and of the world. It is also an inter-State stream; that is to say, commerce will be borne upon the Kentucky river from State to State; for high up upon its waters a railroad is now in process of construction—at least, the stock is nearly all subscribed—and it will be completed soon, to connect with the whole network of southern railroads, by which passengers and freight will be brought to the banks of the river and transported to other States. Therefore it is an inter-State stream upon the principle laid down and acted on in this committee. I am willing also to compare the tonnage of the Kentucky river with the tonnage of many of the streams embraced in this bill, or with the tonnage that enters many of the harbors embraced in it.

Mr. WALSH. When the honorable gentleman from Kentucky says that the committee itself should have geographical information upon all these subjects, he must mean, I presume, that that information should be furnished to the committee by the gentlemen representing the different sections of the country upon that committee. And in this connection, as party allusions have been made to this system, I would beg that gentleman and the committee to recollect that the very respectable and able gentleman representing that section of country on the committee, and appointed by the Speaker of this House, is of the Democratic party, and indulges in all the constitutional scruples held by the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Kentucky will hardly pretend that members from the Atlantic border should be as well informed upon the subject of western improvements as the gentlemen from that section of the country. So much for that portion of his remarks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to any of these improvements if the House can come to a conclusion upon them upon evidence which is sufficient to lead them to a just result. But the appropriation sought for by this amendment—and the same may be said of that sought for by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, which has just been adopted—is no better entitled to consideration than fifty or sixty other appropriations which have been shut out of this bill by the action of the committee, and therefore, if it is inserted, so far from this being a system of equality and justice, it is in every respect the reverse. Something has been said about the chickens which have been fed by the action of the committee. Sir, I congratulate the House and the country that at last the game chickens of old Virginia come under the wing of the parent hen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks are taking entirely too wide a latitude.

Mr. WALSH. Well, sir, if it is out of order to express these congratulations, on finding that Virginia is what Virginia was in former days, coming in under the Constitution to participate in all its blessings, I proceed to say that there is no safety but in reliance upon the reports of the Department. I have no personal acquaintance with the officers in that Department, but I answer to the argument which has been enforced with so much spirit and determination by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] that if those officers are not to be trusted in the performance of their duty—that if his charges are true, he owes it to his position as a member of this House, he owes it to the country—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair called the gentleman from Texas to order when he was indulging in remarks of this character; and he must now call the gentleman from Maryland to order.

The Chair decides that these remarks have no application to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WALSH. Then, sir, I say that we cannot proceed with safety in the execution of this system, but by reliance upon the integrity and intelligence of those gentlemen who are in the employment of the Engineer department. If we cannot rely upon them, either because of the want of capacity or want of integrity, it is the business of this House, as the great protector of the country, to create a new Board more subject to just responsibility, and who will be able to perform the duty more effectually and honestly.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky by reducing the amount $100,000, so as to leave it $50,000. I think that $50,000 is enough, as there has been no survey, although I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have no great confidence in the manner in which this bill or the estimates have been prepared by the head of the Topographical Bureau; and that if the estimates of the Topographical Bureau was here for $150,000, I would still vote for $50,000. Why do I say this? I say it for this reason, that the only proper person to estimate for a work is the scientific officer who makes the survey; that the information is strictly local, and that it is not within the power of the head of the department to take up that information and to undertake, intelligently, in an office in the city of Washington, to reverse all that that officer has performed, and to pronounce his work good or bad, as has been done in repeated instances in the preparation of the estimates for this bill. Sir, I do not care what gentlemen may think in relation to the position or point that I now make.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I call the gentleman from Texas to order. I understand that he has moved to reduce the appropriation proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. I insist that he should confine his remarks to the expediency of that reduction.

Mr. HOWARD. I am doing it. If the gentleman thinks I am not, let him comply with the rule, and reduce my remarks to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Texas must confine his remarks strictly to his amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I am doing so. I am showing that this reduction ought to be made, because there is no estimate from the Topographical Bureau; and then I think it is competent for me to show how much weight ought to be attached to the action of the head of the Topographical Engineers, who has prepared these estimates. Is that not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is taking very large latitude.

Mr. HOWARD. If it is out of order for a gentleman to adduce reasons in favor of a position which he assumes, of course it is impossible for us to proceed intelligibly. I undertake to say that the estimates of the head of the Topographical Bureau have not been made fairly; that he has taken the reports of his subordinate officers—the most intelligent and competent officers in his corps; that he has reduced their estimates in some instances, and rejected them altogether in others.

Mr. STUART. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HOWARD. Let the gentleman reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. STUART. It is not necessary for me to do so. The rule does not require it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman from Texas are entirely out of order. The Chair called the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] to order for making remarks of the same character.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order, and it is this: The rule requires that when one gentleman calls another gentleman to order in debate, he shall, if required to do so, reduce his point of order to writing; that the Chair may decide it. That is a privilege that the member upon the floor has a right to, and I make the point because it becomes important.

Mr. HOWARD. I demanded it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Illinois, that the Chair himself made the same point as the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With all due deference to the Chair, I want it reduced to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule does not require the Chair to reduce it to writing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair himself had made the same point of order, and the gentleman from Michigan only rose to enforce it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Is it in order for me to oppose the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. HOWARD. I will withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. My amendment proposes to appropriate $150,000, and the amendment of the gentleman from Texas proposes to reduce that amount to $100,000. I assure the gentleman, and I assure the committee, that the amount named in my amendment is little enough for the improvement of the stream. You cannot improve the Kentucky river for $150,000, much less for $50,000, which the gentleman proposes to reduce it to. Indeed, the sum I ask is only intended fairly to begin the work, and must be followed by further appropriations hereafter.

Another reason for the passage of this amendment is, that the section of country in which the Kentucky river lies, and of which it is the important stream—being the principal stream in our State, as its name proves—has received fewer appropriations than any other, and that the largest appropriations have been given to the East. I call the attention of the committee to a curious fact, illustrating how certain localities are cherished by the Committee on Commerce.

On analyzing this bill, I discovered that not a single estimate made by the Engineer department for the State of New York, and accepted by the committee, has been cut down one dollar, while the estimates have been cut down one half, and sometimes more, for most of other improvements, and especially for those in the Northwest.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Will the gentleman let me say one word?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I cannot; my time is too short.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I presume the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent the committee?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Certainly I do not, and I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I will state, then, to the gentleman from Kentucky, that, instead of the fact being as he had stated it, if he will look at the printed estimates, he will find that several works estimated for on Lake Erie have been entirely left out of this bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have examined this bill carefully, and I am not mistaken in what I say. It is true, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that some of the estimates made by the Engineer department are not contained in this bill, but it is also true that of all the numerous appropriations for the State of New York, contained in this bill, there is not one in which they have not gone up fully to the estimates of the Engineer department, while they have cut down the estimates for other portions of the country, in many instances one half.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. It is not in order to discuss the general merits of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I insist that the gentleman shall reduce his point of order to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the rule to be, that where there has been anything personal in debate, the point of order must be reduced to writing, but not otherwise.

Mr. STUART. Well, sir, I call the gentleman from Kentucky to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky must confine his remarks strictly to the reasons why the appropriation should not be reduced.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. How does the Chair decide upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART?]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not fully understand the question made by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. I submitted that it was not in order to discuss the merits of the bill, or whether it is founded upon the estimates submitted by the Departments or not, upon the amendment now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GENTRY. I submit that it is perfectly legitimate to discuss the question which the gentleman from Kentucky was discussing. He was endeavoring to show that the appropriations contained in this bill were not fairly distributed in the various sections of the country; and I hold that that is legitimate argument.

Mr. STUART. I call the gentleman to order. I ask the Chair whether this question of order is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for the reading of the 36th rule. That will show that the gentleman from Kentucky has the right to demand that the gentleman from Michigan shall reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. CARTER. I call the gentleman from Massachusetts to order.

Mr. RICHARDSON and others, objected to the reading of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has still one minute left, and will proceed in order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am prepared to show, and but for the extreme sensitiveness of the Committee on Commerce, would show that the localities from which the gentlemen come, who compose that committee, are amply provided for in this bill, while others are neglected.

Several MEMBERS. That is true.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I mean nothing disrespectful to the committee. They did what was perfectly natural. If I had been upon that committee it would have been perfectly natural for me to have cared specially for my own State. That is the course connected with this whole system, when you descend to State and local appropriations.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] is solicitous that we shall not go into the discussion of the general merits of this bill. Sir, all debate upon this bill was smothered in the beginning. You have gone into committee upon the bill, and have put the five minutes rule upon us, and now you will not even allow us to discuss it upon its merits in a five minutes speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that the gentleman cannot discuss the general merits of the bill upon an amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I do not object to the decision of the Chair, but I do object to these points of order being raised by members of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STUART. As it happens, however, I have not the fortune to be a member of the Committee on Commerce.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BRECKINRIDGE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, submitted the following amendment, to come in at the end of the clause under consideration, viz:

Provided, That the appropriations herein contained for the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Missouri, and the Arkansas rivers shall be applied exclusively to the improvement of the channels of said rivers respectively, and not to the construction of landings and harbors on said rivers.

Mr. C. said: Mr. Chairman, I believe I have at last succeeded in offering an amendment, which will meet the approbation of the committee. If it does not, all I can say in addition is, that I am opposed to making appropriations in this bill for the improvement either of harbors, or landings upon the rivers. I deny the authority, and I deny the policy or the expediency of the General Government to make them, for the reason that it is substituting individual interest for the public welfare. But I have another reason for offering this amendment. Heretofore the General Government has appropriated large sums of money—hundreds of thousands of dollars—for the purpose of making the wharves of St. Louis accessible. For the purpose of making myself understood, I will explain the position of an island in the Mississippi, opposite St. Louis, about the middle of the river, called Bloody Island. The tendency of the current is to the Illinois side of that island. The city of St. Louis, however, for the purpose of diverting the natural channel of the river to the St. Louis side of the river, without any kind of authority commenced to build a dam across that portion of the river between Bloody Island and the Illinois side of the river. After they had proceeded with the work for some time, the Illinois authorities applied to the courts for an injunction, to stop the proceeding, which was granted. The city of St. Louis, in connection with the owners of Bloody Island, made an application to the Legislature of Illinois for the privilege of building two causeways, or two dams, and to make two roads, connecting Bloody Island with the Illinois shore. The privilege was granted by the Illinois Legislature, and for the purpose of insuring the completion of the work, they entered into bonds in a large sum with the owners of Bloody Island. They commenced the work, and having filled up the channel, they failed in constructing these two causeways. A flood came, and the whole work was very much damaged, but they succeeded in doing so much as to destroy the navigation of the river upon the Illinois side.

In the bill which passed the House at the last session, and which I understand is to be offered as a substitute to this, there is an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the St. Louis harbor. I desire now, before making this appropriation which is to be made for the improvement of this river, to have inserted in the bill a provision, that it shall be applied exclusively to the improvement of the navigation of the channels of the river, and not for the improvement or construction of harbors. These owners and capitalists at St. Louis, desire to get money from the General Government for the purpose of building these two causeways, and thereby relieving themselves from the obligations they were under to construct these works, in consequence of the bond entered into by them with the State of Illinois. For the reason I have stated, I hope the proviso to the amendment may prevail. I cannot consent that appropriations shall be made, and the patronage of the General Government used, to build up a great city on the Missouri side, to the injury of others equally meritorious on the Illinois side.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish, for the information of the committee, to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAMPBELL] to this fact, that there was among the printed estimates sent to the House upon this subject, one of $50,000 for the removal of obstructions in the harbor of St. Louis. This, among other estimates, was presented to the Committee on Commerce, but they rejected it, upon the very ground which the gentleman from Illinois has now urged in favor of this proviso.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Will the gentlemen allow me to ask him one question, for the purpose of correcting the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE?] I want to know whether there is a single appropriation, reported by the Committee on Commerce in this bill, which did not have the approbation of the corps of Topographical Engineers?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of order. I want to know whether it is in order to discuss this question, in opposition to the amendment under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Maine are out of order in the course of discussion they were pursuing.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I was going on to say that we rejected this estimate, because we did not think it came within the proper range of harbor and river improvements to construct upon a navigable river anything that might be called a harbor, which was nothing more than a landing or wharf. The committee will perceive that this large appropriation is confined by the very language of the item to which the gentleman from Illinois has alluded to the improvement of the navigation of these rivers. There is no need therefore for this amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They want to improve the navigation of the Mississippi by turning its channel from the Illinois to the Missouri side; and that it would be improved by constructing these causeways. It is for the purpose of preventing this appropriation from being thus applied, under any circumstances, under the direction of the Secretary of War, that I have offered this proviso.

Mr. SEYMOUR. After this very estimate for the improvement of the St. Louis harbor having been rejected by the Committee on Commerce, and given no place in the bill, I really do not think any Secretary of War would ever take any portion of the $260,000 appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi river and its tributaries for the improvement of the harbor of St. Louis. If there is any danger of that being done by any Secretary of War we are likely to have there, perhaps it would be worth while to put the restriction in.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then why object to the amendment?

The question now being upon the amendment, Mr. CAMPBELL demanded tellers; but they were not ordered.

Mr. LANE. I do not desire to oppose this amendment, but I desire to say a few words in relation to it.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The question was then put, and the amendment was rejected—ayes 32, noes not counted.

Mr. MILLER offered the following amendment:

For the improvement of the harbor at St. Louis, $50,000.

Mr. M. said: Mr. Chairman, I beg leave, in the few remarks I intend to present upon the subject of this amendment, to call the attention of this committee to a clause in the remarks submitted by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. SEYMOUR] in opening this discussion, and then show you the inconsistency of the course taken by that committee in reference to the appropriation recommended in this amendment, with the rule laid down by the committee as indicated by the chairman in those remarks. He says:

"But the committee have prescribed another rule for their conduct. They have supposed—and that is the ground upon which they have framed this bill—that it was their duty to provide for the general wants of the commerce of the country at those localities—those great commercial depots, where it had already concentrated. They did not suppose that it was within their province to go into those parts of the country just rising into importance, where the commerce had hardly yet defined its localities, where you would not know if you appropriated to day ten or twenty thousand dollars for the improvement of a harbor, whether ten years hence there would be any trade or commerce to be benefited by it. They preferred rather to confine the appropriations to the wants of the general commerce of the country, by locating them at the great centers of commerce, where it already exists, and where it will be benefited."

Now, I desire to call the attention of the committee for a few moments to some facts in connection with this subject, which I have before me. I refer to the estimates of the Topographical Bureau, relative to this harbor, and which the Committee on Commerce had before them. At the last session a similar estimate was made for the improvement of the harbor at St. Louis.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: Does he suppose the Committee on Commerce were bound to surrender their judgments upon constitutional law to the Topographical Bureau?

Mr. MILLER. I will answer the gentleman. I did not suppose the Committee on Commerce were bound to surrender their judgment to the estimates of the Topographical Bureau, nor do I suppose that we in this committee are bound to surrender our judgment to the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce. These estimates have been furnished to the committee for their consideration, but they have seen fit to reject some of them. At one moment when an amendment is offered, not embraced in the estimates, some member of the committee gravely rises, and objects to the appropriation, because there was no estimate for it; and now, sir, when an amendment is proposed for the harbor of St. Louis, for which there is an estimate, the gentleman rises and asks whether we suppose the committee are bound by these estimates?

I desire to call the attention of the committee to a few facts, to show how inconsistent are the declarations of the chairman of the committee as to the rule which guided them, with the action of the committee, as is clearly manifested by the facts to which I refer. It is very true, sir, that St. Louis was, but a few years ago, an inconsiderable French village, with a population not exceeding six thousand, and with but little trade. Now, sir, that city numbers one hundred thousand inhabitants, and it has a commerce estimated at $60,000,000. It had, sir, according to the report of last year, over three thousand arrivals of steamboats; and yet, important as this harbor of St. Louis is, not only to the city of St. Louis, not only to the State of Missouri, but to the States of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and the Territory of Minnesota, and the country lying south of it upon the Mississippi, there is no appropriation furnished by this committee for it. I desire, sir, to know the reason why the harbor of St. Louis has been omitted?

As I remarked, Mr. Chairman, there were, during the last year, over three thousand steamboat arrivals at the city of St. Louis; each boat of this vast number freighted with the produce of our fertile lands, and the rich ores of our mines, or the manufactures and productions of other sections. And of the whole number of steamboats plying upon our western rivers, the returns show about one hundred and thirty enrolled and licensed at St. Louis, a larger number than at any other of the great cities upon those streams, and ranking in the amount of their tonnage second to, and but a little below, the tonnage of steamboats enrolled and licensed at New Orleans.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. It is unnecessary for me to say that I am emphatically opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. MILLER.] I was astonished that the committee did not see fit to adopt the amendment which I offered, and which, perhaps, would have excluded the very amendment which the gentleman [Mr. MILLER] has offered. These harbors—I will not call them harbors, for there is no such thing as a harbor on a river, the river is the harbor itself—these landings upon rivers for the benefit of localities where boats receive and discharge their freights, the General Government has already expended hundreds of thousands of dollars for the very purpose of improving them at the city of St. Louis. Is that for the benefit of the general commerce of the country? It is for the purpose of directing the natural channel of the river from the Illinois side to the St. Louis side; and the more profusely they expend the money, the more obstinately the old Father of Waters pursues his natural channel.

Sir, these claims which have been presented for harbors upon the Mississippi, have constituted one of the greatest difficulties which the friends of improvement of the channel have had to encounter in all the contests which have been had for improvements of that description. Why, sir, so local have improvements of this character been considered, that they are seldom or never embraced in any system of internal improvements. They are left to the localities, and to the cities immediately to be benefited by them.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether appropriations were not made in 1836 and in 1837 for this very harbor?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; and that is the very reason that I am opposed to it now. There has been, as I understand it, between $200,000 and $300,000 appropriated for the harbor of St. Louis, and which seems to have such an insatiable maw that it can never be satisfied. Are we to leave the rapids in the channel unprovided for, for the purpose of securing a good landing at the wharf of St. Louis? I apprehend, sir, before the committee will entertain a proposition of this kind, they will pause to consider whether it is not their duty to remove the great obstacles to the navigation of the stream, rather than to making appropriations for constructing convenient landing points for the benefit of particular cities and localities.

Sir, I am opposed to every harbor and every landing appropriation which may ever be got up in this House while I am a member of it, and I will record my vote against them. I do not oppose the amendment on account of the locality it is intended to benefit, but on account of the principle it involves. If the landing at St. Louis should be improved, other points of less importance would profit by the precedent, and there would be no end to applications for similar objects.

Mr. MILLER called for tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to strike out the clause "for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river below the rapids; the Ohio, including the repairs of the dam at Cumberland Island; the Missouri and the Arkansas rivers, $260,000;" and insert the following clauses:

That the sum of $100,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be and the same is hereby appropriated for the improvement of the Rock Island and Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

That, for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri river, by the removal of snags and other obstructions in the natural channel of said river, and for the building of a snag boat, with necessary machinery and appurtenances suitable to that purpose, the sum of $75,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the same to be expended under the superintendence of the Secretary of War.

That, for the improvement of the navigation of the Arkansas river, by the removal of snags and other obstructions in the natural channel of said river, and for the building of a snag-boat, with necessary machinery and appurtenances suitable to that purpose, the sum of $75,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the same to be expended under the superintendence of the Secretary of War.

That, for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river between Pittsburg and the Falls at Louisville, by the removal of snags and other obstructions in the natural channel of said river, and for the building of a snag-boat, with the necessary machinery and appurtenances suitable to that purpose, the sum of $100,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the same to be expended under the superintendence of the Secretary of War.

That, for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river, below the Falls at Louisville, and the Mississippi river, by the removal of snags and other obstructions in the natural channels of said rivers, and for the building of snag-boats with necessary machinery and appurtenances suitable to that purpose, the sum of $300,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the same to be expended under the superintendence of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to rule this amendment out of order, on the ground that the propositions are identical with various bills pending before the House; and hence, under the rule, they are not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I will modify the amendment by reducing the sum named in each proposition, five dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. My object in offering the amendment is to test the sincerity of gentlemen of this committee who pretend to have such a holy regard for the great West, and who desire to have a bill pass through for its benefit. Now, the Committee on Roads and Canals have had all these matters referred to them by a vote of this House, and they have had them under serious consideration, and have authorized the reporting of five different bills, which are embraced substantially in the amendment I have had the honor to offer. They appropriate a specified amount for each one of the great western rivers—for the Mississippi and its tributaries. They go further, and designate the manner in which the improvements should be made—to wit: by the removal of snags and other obstructions in the natural channel of those rivers.

If gentlemen are really sincere in desiring appropriations to aid the great West, they will certainly have no objection in striking out the clause under consideration, and substituting the one I have sent to the Chair.

The amendment I propose makes a larger appropriation for these western rivers, by some $200,000, than the one reported by the Committee on Commerce, and it will, therefore, render the bill so much the more equal in its general character than it is now. There were, sir, upon the Committee on Roads and Canals more than one or two members, coming from the valley of the Mississippi, who represented the interests of the Great West and the people who live there, and who ought to know something about their interests; and I ask you, Mr. Chairman, who, if any, have a right to be consulted about what they want in reference to these improvements, and as to how the money should be expended? Now, the Committee on Commerce have lumped the appropriation for the three principal western rivers, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. Now, every one knows, who knows anything about the western rivers, that when appropriations have been made, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, without any limitation or restriction whatever, that the judgment of the steamboat captains, pilots, and river men through the entire West, has been that the appropriation has been expended so as to do more harm than good. They are the ones who possess the proper information. Now, if you will strike out the section the committee have reported, and adopt the amendment I have sent to the Chair, then you will have the money appropriated as we, who live upon those rivers, and whose interests are involved, desire it.

I stated, when upon the floor the other day, in reference to the clause appropriating $260,000 to the Mississippi and its tributaries, that it would be in the power of the Secretary of War to expend the whole sum upon any one of those rivers, and at any point upon either, without any restriction whatever. And let me ask, Mr. Chairman, in the hands of a corrupt Secretary of War, or a designing Administration, what could be made more efficient than the exercise of that discretion in controlling a presidential election?

If this bill passes as it comes from the Committee on Commerce, you put it in the power of the present President, through his Secretary, to expend the entire sum of $260,000 at any point he chooses, for the purpose of securing votes in the pending presidential campaign. (I am happy to know, however, that at present they think their nominee is scarcely worth the candle.) I shall ask for tellers upon this amendment. I want to see western men show their hands, and I regret that we are not in the House, where we could have the yeas and nays, to show whether they are willing to vote as much money to their own section of the country as they are for the Atlantic coast.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I stated the other day to the House the reason why the Committee on Commerce placed the appropriation for these western rivers together in one sum as they have. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON,] by the amendment which he has offered, seeks to separate them, and seeks largely to increase the amount which is to be given to the western rivers. Now, the reasons stated from the Topographical Bureau, through the Secretary of War, to the committee, we judged to be good ones, and we commend them to the committee. I will repeat them. Every person who is conversant with the nature of the improvements upon the western rivers, will perceive that they are of one character, and that it consists in the construction of snag-boats and in extracting from the channels of navigation the snags and other impediments in them. Now, formerly, as the Department informed us, they have been accustomed to have separate appropriations. Each river having a separate appropriation, of course you were obliged to construct for each of them separate apparatus, because each one was entitled to the use of its own funds. Besides that, there has always been a great difficulty in operating upon those rivers, from the fact that there would be high water in one river when it is low in another.

Mr. ROBINSON (interrupting) made a remark which was inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. SEYMOUR. The Department states that this fund should be thus concentrated and kept together; and that it will be a more economical mode of operating by enabling them to transfer their body of men engaged in this service, as well as their implements of labor, from one river to another, as may be demanded by the state of the water, or other circumstances. For these reasons, and for no other, have the committee put this whole appropriation in one item. We deemed it best for us to rely upon those men who, for a long period of years, have been conversant with these matters—who have the aid of persons of great experience in the Topographical Corps, Colonel Long and others, who have had especial charge of the improvements on the western rivers—rather than resort to any conjecture upon the subject. Even if a division of this appropriation should be decided upon, we have no data before us by which we could tell how much to give to one river or how much to another.

There is another reason. This whole appropriation is but for the ensuing fiscal year—I should rather say for the present fiscal year, for we have already passed beyond the last of June, when the last fiscal year expired. The consequence is, the Department, if this sum shall be voted, will use this money only for this year, and for the purposes indicated, in operating upon those rivers this year. The next year they will ask for more, but you are first obliged to construct and collect together your boats and other implements; and it is better to have but one set of them than to have three or four different sets—one upon the Arkansas, one upon the Missouri, one upon the Mississippi, and another upon the lower Ohio.

I will add, in reference to the gentleman's amendment, that he has omitted one very important object. We have included in our bill for the Ohio, the Cumberland dam as a specific matter. It is not contained in the gentleman's amendment.

The question being on the amendment, Mr. ROBINSON demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN, and JOHNSON of Arkansas, were appointed.

The question being put, the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOLONY offered the following amendment:

For the improvement of Illinois river, $51,000; and for the construction of a breakwater and piers at the port of Waukegan, Illinois, $15,000; also, $31,000 for the Tennessee river.

Mr. Chairman, we have been trying for the last two days to so far improve this very unjust bill as to make it acceptable to the country, all without success, sir. But, sir, after voting down all amendments for the Illinois, for harbors of refuge upon the lakes, for the Tennessee, and other important tributaries of the Mississippi, as highly inexpedient, if not unconstitutional, notwithstanding a hundred millions of dollars, and much more, are demanding these appropriations for its safety, the committee have just voted $50,000 for James river, upon which floats annually not $2,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks are not in order.

Mr. MOLONY. The application I am going to make, will convince the Chair and the committee that they are in order.

I take that vote in behalf of James river as a good omen, as an indication that this committee have determined to reconsider their votes, and yet do justice to the Illinois river, the Tennessee, and the commerce of the lakes, by passing the amendment which I have submitted. It cannot be, sir, that this committee are prepared to place themselves on the record—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the gentleman's remarks to be out of order. They are not in explanation of his amendment.

Mr. MOLONY. I am coming directly to that explanation. The Chair will see the order of my remarks before I get through. I repeat, can it be possible that this committee are prepared to declare an appropriation to James river constitutional and expedient, while the vast commerce of the Illinois, Tennessee, and the lakes, which loudly demand—

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to talk about the Tennessee river.

Mr. MOLONY. That is a part of the very amendment now pending. I was proceeding to say when interrupted by the Chair, that the passage of this amendment was loudly demanded by the wants of a great commerce suffering for the want of it, and that the committee, standing upon the record against it, after voting for the James river appropriation, could not vindicate before the country its character for impartiality and justice; it would be parallel with the act of the Committee on Commerce, who have taken to New York the lion's share of the appropriation reported by them. The committee owe it to themselves to reconsider their votes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks are not in order.

Mr. MOLONY. I was going only to add—and pass this amendment.

Mr. STANLY. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. If I can get an opportunity, I shall offer an amendment which will be decisive as to these amendments.

Mr. MOLONY demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then put, and the amendment of Mr. MOLONY was disagreed to.

Mr. BISSELL. I submit for the consideration of the committee the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Hudson river, above its highest navigable point, $50,000; and, for the improvement of the Illinois river, $300.

Mr. Chairman, I still think that in a bill of this sort something ought to be appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river. Of course I must admit, in deference to the committee who reported this bill, that that river is of very insignificant importance, compared with the other rivers, which that committee has so amply provided for. By itself it may be entitled to no consideration whatever, in the opinion of those gentlemen. With a view, therefore, to entitle the Illinois to the sum of $200, I have coupled the proposition with one for an additional appropriation of $50,000 for the Hudson. This, I hope, may render my amendment acceptable to the committee who have this bill in their especial charge. But, as the committee, in getting up the bill, have taken care to provide in advance for the Hudson, to the extent of $50,000, which is deemed sufficient for all the navigable portion of that river, the additional $50,000 now asked for is proposed to be expended exclusively above the highest navigable point. [Laughter.] Now, I do hope that this very liberal proposition will secure to my amendment the favorable consideration of the Committee on Commerce, and especially of its able chairman; and that thus we may obtain for the Illinois river the $200 prayed for. [Renewed laughter.] I admit that, compared with the Hudson, the Illinois river, although occupying a precisely similar commercial position, is a very insignificant stream. And so the Committee on Commerce have evidently regarded it. I do well remember, from my early reading, that when the renowned Dutch navigator, old Hendrick Hudson, first entered, and sailed or floated up the river, which properly bears his name, he supposed he had discovered, what so many have sought in vain for since, the northwest passage to China; and he took an extra drink of schnaps on account of it. [Laughter.] I presume, from the high appreciation in which the Committee on Commerce seem to hold that river, and the partiality evinced for it, over all other rivers, especially of the West, that they have adopted the views of the honest Dutch navigator concerning it; though it does seem as though my friend, the honorable chairman of that committee [Mr. Seymour] had lived long enough on the banks of the Hudson to have learned that the importance which its discoverer attached to the stream was altogether imaginary. [Laughter.]

A VOICE. Was it the committee that took an extra drink?

MR. BISSELL. No; it was the discoverer of the Hudson that took the extra drink. The committee have merely taken an extra share of the appropriations provided for in their bill.

Seriously, Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to show, on previous occasions, that the Illinois river was entitled to a place in this or any similar bill which may come up for the consideration of Congress. It constitutes, as I have before said, an important link in the chain connecting the lakes with the Atlantic ocean on the west, being connected with the lakes by a most excellent and costly canal. I have likened it to the Hudson, which, in a similar manner, is connected with the lakes by a similar canal. The commerce upon it is immense, and rapidly increasing in magnitude and importance. For want of improvement, its navigation is rendered difficult, and is almost wholly obstructed at certain seasons of the year. The Government has never yet expended a dollar on that great river, while others of scarcely as much importance, though with different geographical situations, have been improved year by year with money taken from our National Treasury. I have before called the attention of the House to the fact, that the bill which passed this body during the last Congress contained an appropriation of $50,000 for this river, and that in framing this bill the Committee on Commerce have coolly rejected that item without giving us a why or a wherefore. As an Illinoisian, feeling a deep interest in the welfare of my State, and as a lover of justice in the abstract, I shall feel constrained to withhold my support from this bill in its present shape. Nor do I see how any western man, in view of its gross inequality, can vote for the bill in the absence of those modifications which a due regard to the commerce of the great West demands.

MR. SAVAGE. I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment. I think that his State has had enough in the way of public land, without appropriating her public money.

MR. BISSELL. If that be the ground upon which an appropriation is refused for the Illinois river—and it has been so intimated by gentlemen before, when speaking in favor of the bill—I am glad to hear it announced, and wish it to be understood. We of the new States, where these lands lie, and where we are struggling to make improvements, want no better ground to justify our opposition to the bill. We never dreamed of paying in this way for those lands.

MR. SAVAGE. I was opposed to the appropriation of public land which was made to his State; and I am opposed now to the appropriation of the public money. More especially have I a right to complain when I have witnessed appropriations of every kind for the improvement of the waters touching the State of Tennessee refused. The State of Illinois, which has received such liberal grants of the public land, is the last State which I supposed would have asked for an appropriation of the public money. I am not only opposed to appropriations for Illinois, but to appropriations for any of these States. I belong to that class of politicians who are opposed to a general system of internal improvements; but while strongly opposed to a general, I am much more hostile to a partial, unjust, and iniquitous system like that which is endeavored to be fixed upon the country by the present bill.

THE CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot discuss the merits of the bill.

MR. SAVAGE. I did not rise to make special objection to the gentleman's appropriation. I think his State has as much right to the public money as the State of New York. It has had liberal appropriations of the public land, but my State has had neither money nor land from the Government; and I could not well see other States receiving appropriations of land and money without objecting.

MR. DEAN. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

And the further sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated to remove obstructions from every stream west of the Allegheny mountains which is navigable twenty-five miles for scows; and the further sum of $25,000 to make each place that is now damp a proper receptacle for water; and the like sum to Professor Espy for furnishing, by scientific means, a sufficient supply of water for the same.

MR. GOODENOW. I submit that the amendment is not in order.

THE CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly feels itself authorized to rule it out of order.

MR. DEAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] has offered an amendment which is not complete within itself. He moves the appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the Hudson river above its navigable point. No man from New York—no man in this committee who is interested in the navigation of this river, or the general commerce of the country, has asked for such an amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks are not in order.

MR. DEAN. I am speaking to my amendment. It is necessary, in order to perfect the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Bissell,] that I should offer this amendment. If the Hudson river is to be improved above tide-water, and above the place where it is navigable, the streams west of the Allegheny should be improved in the same manner. And the only way we can improve those rivers is to furnish them with water. That is all they want. They have not water enough; but there is a good place for a river all along there anywhere, if you can only furnish the proper quantity of water. Professor Espy says that he can do it. [Laughter.] I say that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] is perfected by the amendment I now offer. I hope that my amendment will be adopted and voted for by those gentlemen who are in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Bissell.]

MR. DUNHAM. I think that amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Dean] is in perfect keeping with this bill, with the action of this committee, and with this whole debate. He proposes that we shall be furnished with water. I think the best supply for absence of water is wind, and we need not go far, not further than the gentleman himself, to find the machine by which we could be supplied with wind for almost any commercial and manufacturing purpose which we need in that western country. [Laughter.]

I think it ill becomes a gentleman from an eastern State to offer such an amendment as this. When the State from which he comes has had improvements made out of the General Treasury these many years, and when the commerce of his State has been created and is now maintained by the West—when its wealth has been built up from the hard earnings of these western and northwestern States, it ill becomes him to stand up in this House and attempt to cast ridicule upon the country which has made his own. He may well boast of the improvements of his State, of her wealth, of her peculiar position as the great thoroughfare for our commerce which has enriched her; but it seems to me that it is not very generous for him to ridicule our honest though humble efforts to improve the channels of our commerce. We have grown up by our own exertions; by our own exertions we shall continue to grow, and prosper, and wax great, until the heart of this country will be in the western valley. You ask us not only to support your commerce, make your improvements, but you levy taxes upon us for the purpose of building up your manufactures; and when we come here and ask that an humble mite may be granted us out of the Public Treasury for works of general importance, a Treasury which we supply by an unjust, unequal, and partial system of taxation, arranged for your benefit, we are to be met with scorn, and taunts, and ridicule, when you have been draining that same Treasury for years and years. Others from the West may submit to it, but I, for one, will not.

Talk about our want of water! Why, it is the commerce that floats upon our western waters, that has filled the coffers of the State of New York, and the New England States. Our want of water! It is upon the bosom of our western waters that the productions of your manufactories which have been built up by the partial exercise of the powers of this Government, find a way to market, and that you have become rich, and have grown proud and insolent, as you show here upon this floor and elsewhere.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DEAN's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

MR. COBB. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

For the improvement of the Coosa river, above Greensport, in the State of Alabama, and below Rome, in the State of Georgia, $20,000.

I will make no speech upon it. The amendment speaks for itself.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BISSELL's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

MR. HUNTER. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the original clause:

Sixty thousand dollars of the same to be expended in the improvement of the Ohio above the Falls at Louisville.

The committee will perceive that I do not propose in this amendment to make an appropriation of a single dollar more than is in the bill. In the present reading of the House bill, it strikes me that the whole amount will be expended below the Falls. Sixty thousand dollars is the amount estimated for above the Falls, and I ask only that the reading of the bill shall be changed, so that this amount shall be expended above the Falls.

The question was then taken on Mr. HUNTER's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

MR. GENTRY. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Tennessee river above the Muscle Shoals, $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

This amendment differs somewhat from those heretofore offered and rejected by the committee. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] proposed an amendment for this river, to be expended in part above, and in part below, the Muscle Shoals. I am not sure whether the amount to be expended above the Muscle Shoals, was the same as proposed in my amendment. My colleague [Mr. Churchwell] offered an amendment for the improvement of the Tennessee and its tributaries. This amendment proposes simply to improve the Tennessee river above the Muscle Shoals. I do not care about saying much in its favor. It speaks for itself. It ought to speak for itself, and if the members of this Congress had looked to the geography of that country, its commercial wants, and the military necessities to be subserved by this proposition for an appropriation to that stream, there would be no need for urging it upon their favorable consideration. I do not believe that there is a single item in this bill, of all the various improvements proposed to be made by it, that is so important as this. The immense system of railroad improvements in the southern Atlantic States connect with the Tennessee river at Chattanooga. The Tennessee river is the connecting link between that point and the vast valley of the Mississippi. It is over that river that Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota will have to transport their productions to the markets which the southeastern Atlantic States furnish; and it is over the same channel of communication in time of war, when your southeastern Atlantic sea-board shall be invaded by a foreign foe, that the military strength and resources of the upper valley of the Mississippi must go to the rescue. A small expenditure of money will make this communication complete and ample for all the purposes of commerce, and for the purposes of military defense.

NEW SERIES....No. 124.

It is surprising that men who pretend to the character of statesmen should undertake, in attempting to revise a system of public policy which has been suspended for years, should have failed to embrace this improvement in their bill. If they have any right to set up a claim to the character of statesmen, in seeking to renew this system, they should endeavor so to shape its details as to commend it to the approval of the country, and not overlook such a stream as this. Why exclude one of the most important tributaries of the Mississippi, connecting the mighty valley of the Mississippi with the southeastern Atlantic States of the Republic? I repeat, that in a commercial and military point of view, this appropriation is infinitely more important than any appropriation embraced in this bill. If wise statesmen desire to revive an important policy, if they seek to give it permanence, and maintain it, how can they expect to do so when its opponents can point to this odious and unreasonable discrimination against this stream? With such a glaring evidence of the inequality of the system, the people of that great valley will withhold their favor from those who endeavor to withhold the constitutionality and expediency of such a system. I believe in the expediency of the power under the Constitution, and in the expediency of exercising that power if it shall be so exercised as to distribute its benefits fairly in all the different parts of the country. If you adopt a principle, you must follow it out to its results, and let every section of the country have all the benefits which that principle can confer.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to make a suggestion to the House in regard to this matter. We have not made a single step in this bill to-day. As those who are in favor of it desire to finish it to-day, and as those who are opposed to it are desirous of getting clear of it, I hope that we will sit here to-day until we have made some progress.

Mr. GENTRY demanded tellers on his amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Tennessee, and BRECKINRIDGE were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 34, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We have been some time engaged in the consideration of this bill. I have not trespassed upon the committee for one moment, and now, with a view of testing the sense of the committee, and for the purpose of endeavoring to get at something that we can make some progress in, I move to lay aside this bill, that we may take up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the motion to be in order.

Mr. ORR. Well, sir, I ask for tellers upon it.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is this: That after the House has ordered the debate to close, under the rule, it is imperative upon us to go on and act upon every amendment that may be pending or offered to the bill, and report the bill to the House. While I concede that you may lay aside a bill before the House has closed debate upon it, I make the point that you cannot do it after the debate has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken. The House has ordered the debate to be closed upon this bill. The order is, that the committee shall proceed to vote upon such amendments as may be pending, or offered to the bill, and then report the bill to the House. We are acting under that order.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, we can lay aside the bill for the present, and resume its consideration hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JONES. From that decision I appeal.

Mr. ORR. I ask for tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ASHIE and DISNEY were appointed.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. If the committee should resolve to lay the bill aside, and take up the appropriation bill, what will be the situation of this bill?

Mr. DUNHAM. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the question before the committee. A motion is made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to lay aside this bill and take up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. The Chair decides, that inasmuch as the House has closed the debate upon this bill, and ordered that the committee shall vote upon the amendments that may be pending or offered, and then report the bill to the House, it is not in order to lay the bill aside. From that decision the gentleman from Tennessee takes an appeal.

The question was then put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 84, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. SMART moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STANLY. I desire to bring this matter to a close, and get the committee to decide whether they will amend the bill or not. I do not know any mode in which that question can be more satisfactorily tested, than by the one which I now propose. I desire to offer as an amendment, to come in at the end of the clause we are now at, the whole of the bill of last session, omitting only such items as are provided for in the bill, and with the addition of three small items—$30,000 for the navigation of the Cumberland river, $50,000 each for the Illinois and Tennessee rivers, and $2,000 for the survey of the Pascagoula river, in Mississippi, which the State Legislature has asked the General Government to improve. This embraces all the amendments which have been offered, and if the committee will vote upon it, it will test the question whether the bill is to be amended or not, and enable us to get through our labors.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to raise a question of order in reference to that amendment. The question that I wish to submit to the Chair is this, that inasmuch as a large number of the items embraced in the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, have already been presented to this committee and voted upon, the proposition is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the amounts are precisely the same that have been voted upon; but even if they were, the Chair thinks that being combined with others, the amendment would be in order.

Mr. SKELTON. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, for the reason that it is calculated to kill the bill, and entirely to destroy the system of the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country. Upon the same ground, I am opposed to all the amendments that have been offered here to-day. Now, sir, upon what principle have the gentlemen who offered these amendments proposed them? Upon pure national and patriotic grounds or upon mere sectional grounds? They say they want their own districts improved, and that is a very commendable desire. So do I want mine improved, and for that very reason I am opposed to these amendments. My State gets only $11,000—a very small sum, and not as large as we are entitled to, but we are willing to take it rather than destroy the chance of ever getting anything. What will be the effect of the adoption of this amendment? Why, it is very evident that this House will never appropriate four millions of dollars in a single year. Last year's session demonstrated that fact, and I appeal to those who are friendly to these improvements to vote against amendments of this kind, and against all amendments, for the reason that that is the only way in which we can get the western rivers improved at all.

I have as deep an interest in the West as in my own State. I should like to see the whole country benefited, but we must wait. We cannot do everything in a day. We might spend a hundred millions of dollars during the coming year in the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and spend it with benefit to the country; but then we cannot have a hundred millions of dollars to spend in a single year. We shall destroy the system entirely by carrying it forward too rapidly. Let us then proceed gradually and judiciously. If our western friends are not dealt fairly by at this session, let them wait until next session. I will guarantee that there is a disposition on the part of the members from the East to do ample justice to the West.

Mr. MEADE. I would ask the gentleman if he proposes ultimately to spend the one hundred millions of dollars upon internal improvements?

Mr. SKELTON. I have no doubt that that sum will be spent, in the course of years, gradually and judiciously. This House has selected a judicious, high-minded, and intelligent committee to report on appropriations of this kind. If gentlemen want rivers and harbors improved, let them submit their propositions to the committee that has been appointed by the Speaker, and that has the confidence of the House, and let them be carefully examined by that committee. Now, I confess that I cannot judge of the propriety or impropriety of the various expenditures on western rivers, but I trust in the Committee on Commerce. I have confidence in their integrity; I have confidence in their intelligence, and I am willing to trust to them, not because I believe their report to be right, judicious, and fair to all sections of the country, but because I believe that this is the only plan by which we can carry forward these improvements.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the committee take a recess till seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question now being upon Mr. STANLY's amendment—

Mr. APPLETON, of Maine, called for the reading of the amendment.

[A message was here received from the Senate, announcing the passage, by that body, of the following bill:

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James C. Watson, of Georgia.]

Mr. ASHE. Is it in order to offer an amendment to an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. ASHE. I offer the following:

For the improvement of the mouth of the Cape Fear river, at the main bar, $20,000.

Mr. Chairman, I deferred offering this amendment to the original bill reported by the Committee on Commerce, until, by the action of the House, the appropriate occasion should occur for me to offer it; but as the substitute offered by my colleague [Mr. STANLY] will, if adopted, cut me off from any other opportunity, I must now do it. The Committee on Commerce has been liberal in its appropriations to North Carolina, and for that reason I feel much reluctance to interfere in the detail of their report; but the urgent condition of the commercial interest of my section leaves me no option. Two of the largest towns in North Carolina are situated on this river. The State, in the last six or seven years, has most generously appropriated $5,000,000 towards their improvement. This action of the State was met in a proper spirit by the people. Enterprising, active, and energetic, they have done their utmost to forward their own prosperity. The result of their conduct is strikingly manifested in the altered condition of the town of Wilmington itself. In the last ten years they have much more than doubled their population, and added fourfold to the amount of their real and personal property. The foreign tonnage of the port has increased from 8,000 to 23,000. They are, in fact, surrounded with all the inciting elements of great prosperity; but their prospect is not cloudless. To their great terror and dismay they find for the last five years the principal inlet of the harbor, known as the Main Pass, has been filling up in a most astounding manner. Five years ago, vessels drawing fifteen feet water could come in and out; but now vessels drawing only eight or nine feet, are debarred from entering. This disastrous filling up of the inlet has been occasioned, as they believe, and as a delegation composed of merchants of the highest respectability stated before the committee, by the operations of the Government works. Very soon after the erection of Fort Caswell, the military department discovered its foundation was being completely washed away by the channel of the river. In order to prevent this, three or four jetties were run out from the main land into the channel. These jetties have indeed protected, as intended, the fort, but as a necessary consequence, have filled up the channel. This is the actual state of the case, and I most earnestly ask the committee, then, if this case is not entirely analogous to the case of Savannah, represented by my honorable friend, [Mr. JACKSON?] Could you have a case which would appeal more strongly to your sense of equality and justice? I think not.

Mr. MEADE. I would suggest to my honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. ASHE,] for whose proposition I entertain the kindest feelings, that he alter his amendment in such a manner as to provide for changing the appropriation of $50,000 for reopening a communication between Albemarle sound, North Carolina, and the Atlantic ocean, at Nag's Head, to the improvement of Cape Fear river; for if I understand anything about that coast and the trade upon it, Nag's Head is comparatively a very unimportant place, and it certainly could not class among the national objects for appropriation. It is astonishing to me that when North Carolina was brought to the attention of the Committee on Commerce, they should, in their comparison of the various points worthy of appropriation, have selected Nag's Head in preference to Cape Fear river. I admit every word the gentleman has said about the importance of improving that river.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. The reason why the appropriation of $50,000 has been made to Nag's Head, as it has been called, though it is laid down in the charts as Roanoke inlet, is for the purpose of opening a connection between Albemarle sound and the Atlantic ocean for the general commerce of the country, for the whole trade that passes from North to South. Make this improvement, and you have an inland communication by passing down the Albemarle sound much safer than by going outside, where you are exposed to the most dangerous coast on the whole Atlantic. There are more localities on the North Carolina coast to be provided for than in any part of the country.

Mr. MEADE. Before Nag's Head is improved with a view to admit vessels into Albemarle sound, the gentleman had better, in connection therewith, first have turned his attention to the improvement of the Roanoke river, because, unless the navigation of that river is improved the improvement of Nag's Head will be of little service to the general commerce of the country. Here is the town of Wilmington, a large exporting and importing place, situated upon Cape Fear river, and I should have supposed the Committee on Commerce, in consideration of its importance and need of improvement, would have made this appropriation of $50,000 to that object. But with all respect to my friend, I think he requires of us more than the due share of North Carolina, when he asks for an appropriation of $50,000 for Nag's Head, and $40,000 in addition for the improvement of Cape Fear river.

The question now being upon the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. ASHE demanded tellers; but they were not ordered.

The question was then put, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question now recurred on Mr. STANLY's amendment.

Mr. ASHE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and DISNEY were appointed.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 49, noes 82.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "for," in the clause "For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, below the rapids; the Ohio, including the repairs of the dam at Cumberland Island; the Missouri and the Arkansas rivers, $250,000," and insert the following:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, below the mouth of the Missouri, $100,000

For the improvement of the Mississippi river above the mouth of the Missouri, $50,000

For the improvement of the Missouri river, $50,000

For the improvement of the Ohio, above the falls at Louisville, $50,000

For the improvement of the Cumberland dam, $50,000

For the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river below the falls, $25,000

For the improvement of the navigation of the Arkansas river, $40,000

For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river, $30,000

For the improvement of the navigation of the Tennessee river, $40,000

For the improvement of the navigation of the Cumberland river, $30,000

For the repairs of the piers at Big Sodus Bay, on Lake Ontario, $15,000

For the improvement of the Pascagoula river, $10,000

For the construction of snag-boats on the western and southern rivers, $200,000

$590,000

Mr. M. said: The amendment comprises nearly all that can be profitably expended in the year, between the present time and the time for the next appropriation bill of the next session of Congress, upon the western rivers; and it does not leave out either the upper or the lower Mississippi, or the lower or upper Ohio, or the Tennessee, or the Cumberland, or the Illinois, or the Pascagoula; but it takes care of them all. It makes a proper appropriation for the Cumberland dam, and presents to gentlemen from the valley of the Mississippi, in the concrete, what we have been trying for three days to get in the segregate. There is no object for which appropriation is provided for in this amendment for which Congress has not appropriated heretofore. It increases the appropriation to the whole West and to the whole South about $250,000, of which amount is appropriated to the construction of snag-boats $100,000, and the remaining $150,000 is apportioned among all the rivers of the West. There is an appropriation, also, which has been recommended by the estimates of this year for Big Sodus Bay upon Lake Ontario. The Committee on Commerce, I perceive, have put into their bill Little Sodus Bay, for which there was no estimate, and for which there was no recommendation; and they excluded from their bill Big Sodus Bay, for which there was a recommendation and an estimate. But what they expected to gain by it, or what they expected to effect by it, I do not know. Big Sodus Bay is estimated for, and Little Sodus is not.

Mr. DUNCAN. Will the gentleman allow me to explain why the committee did that?

Mr. MARSHALL. Not in my five minutes. The gentleman can do that presently. There is some explanation for it, but it is very curious to me that a committee that goes by estimates should do that.

But there is in this amendment an appropriation of $100,000 for the Mississippi below the mouth of the Missouri, and I ask any gentleman here if he supposes that that is an improper amount to be appropriated. If there be any appropriation here that is not properly called for, or that cannot be properly expended, why the Secretary of War, exercising his discretion, will not expend it.

My amendment has this advantage over the proposition of the committee, it indicates upon the part of Congress where the money is to be expended, and selects the works upon the part of Congress to which the appropriations are made, instead of doing that which Congress does annually for the Post Office Department, for the Engineer Department, and for every other department of this Government—the voting of sums in the aggregate, and leaving it to the Executive Department to appropriate them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to adjourn without having done anything to-day? [Laughter.]

Mr. DISNEY demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I do not expect to occupy my five minutes, but I wish to call the attention of the committee and the attention of my colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL,] to the fact that he has thought proper to include the Illinois river in his omnibus amendment, and to exclude an important river of his own State, which bounds in part his own district, and in part my own. I allude to the Kentucky river. It is peculiarly unfortunate that an amendment asking appropriations for the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, should be encumbered with items which are wholly indefensible upon any principle that would place the slightest limit upon these expenditures.

The Illinois river takes its rise in the State of Illinois, and empties itself at the edge of the State of Illinois. It is a local and a State stream purely, and becomes national, according to the argument of some gentlemen, because at a high point upon its waters it is connected with the lakes by a canal, and thereby connects the lakes with the Mississippi and the southern Atlantic States. Now, sir, I put it to the committee, that if this makes a national stream of the Illinois river, you can make a national stream of every piece of water that flows in any portion of the United States.

Upon the same principle, the Kentucky river is now in process of being made a national stream, although to speak seriously about it, it is a little river which takes its rise in the mountains of Kentucky, and empties at the borders of the State, and upon which, for the greater part of the year, you cannot get a steamboat to run without the building of locks and dams to carry it up; and yet we are building a railroad which will connect its waters with the Southern, Atlantic, and the Gulf States. It is as much a national stream as the Illinois river is a national river.

I am opposed, sir, openly and unalterably opposed, to appropriations to local State streams.

Well, sir, Big Sodus Bay. I had supposed that Big Sodus Bay was in the bill, and not Little Sodus Bay, and a great many gentlemen were of the same opinion. But it turns out that Big Sodus is excluded, and Little Sodus put in. The committee have worded it artfully—"for the improvement of Sodus bay, Lake Ontario, Cayuga county, New York," &c. I understand that Big Sodus and Little Sodus are but a few miles apart; that very little commerce goes into either of them; that there are not two hundred people at either place, but that they are intended principally for harbors of refuge. What do we want with two harbors of refuge within five or six miles of each other? The time does not suffice to enter into this matter, but I protest against meritorious appropriations being endangered by a connection with others which ought not to pass.

Mr. MASON. I move to add $50,000 for the Kentucky river; $20,000 for the Big Sandy; [laughter;] and $50,000 for the Wabash.

I voted against this bill at the last session of Congress, because the committee could not amend it so as to make it national. I believe this bill to be strictly national, according to the views of some gentlemen as to what makes a bill for internal improvements national—that is, that there is some appropriation in it for his particular district and locality. [Laughter.] I think that is the correct definition of nationality as applied to making internal improvement bills in this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the three rivers named in his amendment.

Mr. MASON. I am doing so; and the principle and definition laid down brings my river in. [Laughter.] Big Sandy is in my district. [Laughter.] That, sir, acting upon the principle which controls the action of others here, renders it entirely national. [Laughter.] The bill reported by the committee, not including that river, is, of course, not national to me. My colleague from the Lexington district, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] through whose district the Kentucky river runs, cannot vote for this bill unless that stream is included, for that would be entirely against principle.

Now, sir, I do not expect to vote for this bill, because I have no idea in the world that Big Sandy will be included. [Laughter.] I cannot possibly vote for a bill unless it is national, by being connected with my district. [Laughter.]

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, the whole matter is a perfect farce. When gentlemen undertake to lay down a system for national internal improvements, they turn it into a burlesque by making appropriations for so many little local improvements near or in their own districts. I shall vote against this bill, because, though ostensibly a national one, and laid down upon principles, it is in reality a scramble for appropriations to particular localities.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call the gentleman to order. He is speaking against his own amendment? [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. I make my remarks under the idea that my amendment will not be carried.

Mr. ALLISON. I am opposed to the amendment. Let us have the vote.

The question was then put, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CARTTER. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of Salt river, $5,000,000, to be expended before the 4th of March next, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been suggested to me.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CARTTER. Does the gentleman deny the nationality of this river? [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. I had supposed that the friends of those who were to sail up that river would provide for its improvement. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CARTTER. If my friend from Tennessee had noticed the particular phraseology of the amendment, he would not have risen to a question of order. I provide in that amendment that the appropriation shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, with a view of leaving it in the hands of its friends, [laughter,] presuming that he will not misappropriate it. [Renewed laughter.] But there is no doubt about the nationality of that stream. It has been nationally navigated for a great many years. I have been up it myself recently. [Laughter.] I know something of its navigation, and from what little observation I have made, I know that it has snags in it; and I do not wish to leave to those who have got to take the passage quite as hard a trip as I have had. I hope it will be voted early, with a view of providing an open navigation there in season, for somebody has got to occupy it. [Laughter.] The prospect now is, that the gentlemen who are in favor, par excellence, of improvements of rivers will have occasion to occupy it, and I ask them to come forward and vote for it. There can be no equivocation as to its nationality. It runs through all of the States, and through all of the districts of the States. [Laughter.] It embraces a portion of all the constituencies, and therefore must be of necessity national; and if you depart from the works which ought to be legitimate—works upon the high seas of the nation—and go to expending the national treasure upon rivers, I insist this one shall have the first place.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is not my intention to reply to my colleague. I appeal to gentlemen whether we are not doing injustice to ourselves, and whether we should not proceed to vote upon this bill. Can we add to our own reputation and to the character of the country by this trifling?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. G. I know when I am in order, and I am arguing in behalf of those very gentlemen who are calling me to order. What is the scene we have presented to the country for the last three days? Amendments have been offered which no man expected to carry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. My colleague does not expect to carry his amendment, I am sure. I am opposed to the amendment of my colleague, and also to that submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CARTTER. My opinion is, that if we continue this character of legislation the majority of the members of the House will be interested in the appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the appropriation for Salt river. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do verily believe if we go on three days longer that we will all have to travel up Salt river, [laughter,] for we are now trifling with our own reputation and the character of the country.

The question was put, and the amendment of Mr. CARTTER was rejected.

Mr. SMART. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. WILLIAMS and SCURRY were appointed.

The question was taken, and the committee refused to rise, the tellers having reported—ayes 56, noes 69.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky.

Tellers were demanded, and ordered; and Messrs. MOJONY and HUNTER were appointed.

The question was put, and the amendment was disagreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 41, noes 71.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I move to strike out from the clause under consideration the word "repair," and in its stead to insert the word "removal," so that the appropriation will be for the removal instead of the repair of the Cumberland dam.

It will, Mr. Chairman, be recollected by the committee that opposite the mouth of the Cumberland river is the Cumberland Island, and that the main channel of the Ohio river runs between the Cumberland Island and the Illinois shore. An appropriation was made by Congress to construct a dam from the head of the Cumberland Island to the Illinois shore, for the purpose of diverting the main channel of the river from the Illinois and to throw it upon the Kentucky shore, and thereby to improve the harbor of Smithland—if I may call it a harbor. The dam was constructed. It has not benefited the harbor of Smithland, but it has destroyed the navigation of the main channel of the river. It may be urged that the navigation of the main channel has been destroyed by the breaking down of the dam, but my information is—and I have received it, being a member of one of the committees, from certain persons who appeared before it—that you cannot, by the construction of any dam there, make the navigation as good as it was by the natural channel. Then, sir, if it does not improve the navigation of the Ohio, why have it repaired? Remove it and let the river be in the condition it was before the construction of the dam. You have placed there an obstruction, and it is the duty of the Government to remove it, unless it will improve navigation. But it is said that it will improve the Cumberland river. It may improve the entrance into that portion of the channel which is next to the Kentucky shore; but how can it improve the Cumberland river? It may facilitate the entrance to that river, but will it improve the navigation of the river above the entrance? What good will that effect? None, but to allow boats to land with more facility at Smithland. And is the whole country, is the whole commercial interest connected with the navigation of that river, to be tied down to the interest of Smithland? Is every other interest to give way for the purpose of building up a small town there? The object of the amendment is to remove that obstruction.

Mr. GREY. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, and am authorized to assure this committee that the gentleman is very greatly mistaken in his intimation that the "Cumberland dam" was built for the benefit of the town of Smithland. It was built for the purpose of improving the navigation of both the Ohio and the Cumberland rivers, and I will show to this committee how fully, and in what way, it effected the purposes of its erection; for, sir, I am intimately acquainted, from frequent personal observations, with the localities at and about that point.

"Cumberland Island" is opposite the mouth of Cumberland river. Those two rivers are running nearly a west course, when the Ohio, about three fourths of a mile above Smithland, divides itself around the island, one division of its waters coming into the Cumberland immediately opposite Smithland, (which is on the Kentucky side of the Cumberland river,) the other passing to the north, or Illinois side of the island; the Illinois being very greatly the widest, but about the same in depth with the Kentucky chute; but the shoal, or bar, which was the greatest obstruction in the Cumberland, was at or near the confluence of the two rivers, which is about two miles below Smithland. The dam from the head of the island to the Illinois shore, forced the main channel of the Ohio through the narrow, or Kentucky chute, into the Cumberland, immediately at Smithland; thence down the Cumberland, and thus deepened the water at the junction of the Cumberland with the Illinois chute, (two miles below Smithland.) Although the dam was never completed, yet whilst it was unbroken it made the navigation of both rivers far better than it ever was before or since, and will do so again. But, sir, if the dam is now removed, (which will cost a larger expenditure than to repair it,) it will pass much the largest half of the waters of the Ohio down the Illinois side of the island, which will, at its junction with the Cumberland, again increase the bar, and stop up the mouth of the latter river, as was the case before the dam was erected.

This did, and, if the dam is removed, will again result from the fact that the Ohio is a much larger stream than the Cumberland at their junction, and its greater volume of water will force its channel, and throw the washings out of its channel into the mouth of the Cumberland river, and thus form a sand bar, destructive of the navigation of the Cumberland. But repair the dam, and from the head of the island around the south, or Kentucky side, will be a greatly better channel than the Illinois side will ever be, even if the dam were removed, because the water on the Illinois side is spread out over so wide a channel.

Sir, will you make an appropriation to remove the obstructions to its four or five hundred miles of navigation, and then make an appropriation which entirely stops up the Cumberland river at its mouth from all steamboats?

Cumberland is one of the most valuable rivers in the South or West. The evidences of its importance, and the necessity for repairing that dam, is proven by the preamble and resolutions adopted by the Legislatures of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, by which both these States have memorialized Congress on this very subject, and instructed their respective delegation in Congress to obtain an appropriation for the repair and completion of that dam. Since that dam has been broken, the Cumberland bar at the mouth of the Cumberland has so greatly increased that boats cannot now come up to Smithland or into the Cumberland river, and a small "chicken-coop" of a steamboat of seven or eight inches draught is in low water plying between Smithland and the mouth of Cumberland river.

Mr. SAVAGE moved that the committee rise. Tellers were called for and ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and FULLER, of Maine, were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 67.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. That was the last vote we took.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that it is always in order to make a motion that the committee rise.

Tellers were demanded and ordered on the motion that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, (Messrs. MASON and ORR acting as tellers,) and there were—ayes 8, noes 69. No quorum voting.

[Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the roll must be called.

The roll was then called, and the absentees noted.

The absentees having been reported to the House, and there being a quorum now present, the committee resumed its session.

The tellers having resumed their places, the question was again put upon the motion that the committee rise, and there were—ayes 58, noes 55.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. OLDS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 282, making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and had made progress therein, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a petition from citizens of Jersey City, asking that some action of Congress be had for the relief of the Irish exiles, Mitchell, O'Brien, and others. I ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Objection was made.

On motion by Mr. FULLER, of Maine, the House then adjourned till to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

Also, the petition of William Price, praying for compensation for extra services as watchman in the Census office.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 29, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and a petition of citizens of Dewittville, New York, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the petition of John Carroll Brent, and other citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, praying that the jurisdiction of the corporation of said city may be extended over the Eastern Branch bridges; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a petition of the citizens of Springfield, Massachusetts, praying that the armories of the United States may be placed under the superintendence of civil instead of military officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a representation of the petit jury of the criminal court of Washington county, District of Columbia, respecting the necessity of providing a room for the court in which to hold its sessions; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITION WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Obed Hussey, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which various memorials on the subject were referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill granting certain additional powers to the corporation of Washington; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of Henry A. Amelung, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to test the plan of Henry A. Amelung, to prevent steamboats and other vessels from sinking; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CLEMENS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Whitmarsh B. Seabrook, Joseph Whaley, and others, praying payment for military services during the last war with Great Britain, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the memorial of Mrs. Elizabeth Armistead, widow of General W. K. Armistead, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Mrs. Asenath M. Elliott, widow of the late Captain E. G. Elliott, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill "to amend an act to divide the district of Arkansas into two judicial districts, and for other purposes," have directed me to report it back with an amendment.

As this bill has not yet been printed, I ask that it may be taken up, so that it may be ordered to be printed in its amended form. The amendment of the committee is simply to amplify and make more explicit the original bill. I ask that the bill be now taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section provides that from and after the passage of the bill, the counties of Sevier and Sebastian, in the State of Arkansas, shall be included within the judicial district created by the act of March 3, 1851, styled the "Western District of Arkansas." The second section provides for an additional term of the circuit court of the United States for the "Eastern District of Arkansas," to be held at Little Rock annually.

The third section provides that the existing laws of the State of Arkansas for the punishment of crimes which are not locally inapplicable, shall, after the passage of the act, be in force in that part of the Indian country included within the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, and that all acts and parts of acts for the punishment of crimes in the Indian country inconsistent with the foregoing enactment be repealed, except—1st, So much of the laws of the United States as provides for the punishment of treason, robbery of the mail, counterfeiting the coin or securities of the United States. 2d, The various laws now in force regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and for maintaining peace upon the frontier.

The amendment of the committee is to add to this: "and 3d, Such other laws for the punishment of crimes and offenses against the laws, treaties, or authority of the United States, over which the courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the bill as amended be printed.

DEPOSITORY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate—

1st. At what period a depository of the Treasury was established at California, and at what point?

2d. What deposits such depository was authorized to receive, and what deposits were made with him, as acknowledged or recognized by the Treasury Department?

3d. When did the monthly statement of the Treasurer of the United States, required by law to be published, first announce that a depository had been established in that State?

4th. If such depository was authorized before or after Collector King's appointment at San Francisco, why was not the amount on deposit given in said monthly statements previous to November last?

5th. State the dates and amounts of the bonds (if any) given by collectors Collier and King, as designated depositories of the public money.

FORTS AND NAVAL DEPÔTS.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate, for the action of Congress at its present session, the amount necessary to construct a fort and naval depot at San Francisco, California, and the amount that can be advantageously expended in the construction of said work, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1853; also, the whole amount necessary to complete the defense of Garden Key, or Tortugas Island, Florida, with the amount that may be advantageously expended on the same during the said year, and similar information in relation to Fort Delaware, Delaware river, and such other important points as may be most exposed in case of war, and which require immediate efficient defense.

TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. BRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the amount of trust funds in the Treasury (specifying each) at the close of each of the last four fiscal years; also, the causes of the usual differences or discrepancies between the statements of balances in the Treasury at the end of fiscal years, as exhibited in the an-annual reports on the finances, and the annual reports on the receipts and expenditures of the United States, stating the same for each of the fiscal years ending 30th June, 1849, 1850, and 1851.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to report, by bill or otherwise, a practical plan for the accomplishment of the following objects:

1. For the repair of the Long Bridge across the Potomac for temporary use as a service bridge.
2. The erection of a new bridge over the Potomac river, at the Little Falls, to supply the place of the chain bridge carried off by the late flood.
3. The erection of a new bridge across the Potomac river, at or near the site now occupied by the Long Bridge, according to the plan adopted by General Andrew Jackson, President of the United States, and approved by him on the 3d of April, 1833.

I do not wish to call up the resolution for action now. I merely ask that it may be laid on the table and printed. I have also collected a great deal of statistical information, and I will ask that that be printed for the use of the Senate. It is a very important matter.

The resolution and statement were ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON informally laid on the table the following, which he gave notice he would offer as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Illinois; which was also ordered to be printed:

And that they inquire into the practicability and expense of constructing, at some point west of Georgetown, a suspension bridge, a stone bridge, or a bridge of such character as may be adapted to the transit as well of ordinary travel as of railroads, in case that should be considered the most convenient point in the District of Columbia for connecting the northern with the southern line of railroads.

SECRETARY OF THE CENSUS BOARD.

The joint resolution explanatory of an act supplementary to an act approved 23d of May, 1850, came up on its third reading.

Mr. MANGUM. I apprehend that that resolution, which was yesterday ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, upon very little consideration, is founded in a mistake in fact. I am not prepared to give a full and clear investigation of that mistake this morning, but hope to be in the course of a day. I move to reconsider the vote ordering the joint resolution to a third reading, and that that motion lie on the table until I shall be prepared to make an explanation of the subject to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to the delay, which, however, can be obtained without making a motion to reconsider the vote. I wish distinctly to state to the Senate, that if the Secretary of the Census desires to be heard upon this question, I have no earthly objection to it.

The motion to reconsider was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS. I give notice, in order that the parties may be prepared, that I shall call up the joint resolution to-morrow.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOWNS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the settlement of a certain class of private land claims, within the limits of the D'Antrive claim, and for allowing preemption to certain purchasers and actual settlers, in the event of the final adjudication of title of said D'Antrive in favor of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. STOCKTON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill amendatory of the several acts regulating the appraisement of imported merchandise, and the more effectually to prevent frauds on the revenue, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SURVEY OF THE WHALING GROUNDS AND #### ROUTES OF COMMERCE ON THE PACIFIC.

Mr. GWIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill "authorizing an exploration and reconnoissance of the courses of navigation used by whaling vessels in the regions of Behring's Straits, and also of such parts of the China Sea, Straits of Gaspar, and Java Sea, as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding to and from China.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that will not be done. It wants only fifteen minutes of one o'clock, when the Indian appropriation bill comes up as the special order. I want to put that bill through, that we may not be forced to interfere with private business to-morrow.

Mr. GWIN. It will take but a short time to consider the bill which I propose to take up. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] has a few remarks to make upon it, and then I think it will pass without opposition.

Mr. HUNTER. I am very sure that it cannot be passed in fifteen minutes. I think we had better dispose of one subject at a time.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes on the bill. I hope it will be taken up now. I have been waiting several days for an opportunity to get the bill up.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator consent to put the bill aside at one o'clock?

Mr. SEWARD. I will pledge myself to receive a proposition from the honorable Senator from Virginia, at any time, to do it.

Mr. GWIN's motion was agreed to.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to cause an exploration and a reconnoissance to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of the courses of navigation used by whaling vessels in the region of Behring's Straits, and also of such parts of the China sea, Straits of Gaspar, and Java seas, as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding to and from China, and that for this purpose, the President shall be authorized to employ one or more suitable vessels of the Navy and such officers of the Navy and Army of the United States, as shall be necessary. It also proposes to continue the act in force two years.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, some years ago, when ascending the Alabama, I saw a stag plunge into the river, and gallantly gain the western bank, while the desponding sportsman, whose rifle he had escaped, sat down to mourn his ill luck under the deep magnolia forest that shaded the eastern shore. You, sir, are a dweller in that region, and are, as all the world knows, a gentleman of cultivated taste and liberal fortune. Perhaps, then, you may have been that unfortunate hunter. Howsoever that may have been, I wish to converse with you now of the chase, and yet not of deer, or hawk, or hound, but of a chase upon the seas; and still not of angling or trolling, nor of the busy toil of those worthy fishermen who seem likely to embroil us, certainly without reluctance on our part, in a controversy about their rights in the Bay of Fundy, but of a nobler sport and more adventurous sportsmen than Izaak Walton, or you, or Daniel Boone, or even Nimrod, the mightiest as well as most ancient of hunters, ever dreamed of—the chase of the whale over his broad range of the universal ocean.

Do not hastily pronounce the subject out of order or unprofitable, or unworthy of this high presence. The Phœnicians, the earliest mercantile nation known to us, enriched themselves by selling the celebrated Tyrian dye, and glass made of sand taken from the sea; and they acquired not only these sources of wealth, but the art of navigation itself, in the practice of their humble calling as fishermen. A thousand years ago, King Alfred was laying the foundations of empire for Young England, as we are doing now for Young America. The monarch whom men justly have sur-named the Wise as well as the Great, did not disdain to listen to Oeher, who related the adventures of a voyage along the coast of Norway, "so far north as commonly the whale hunters used to travel;" nor was the stranger suffered to depart until he had submitted to the King "a most just survey and description" of the Northern Seas, not only as they extended upwards to the North Cape, but also as they declined downwards along the southeast coast of Lapland, and so following the icy beach of Russia to where the river Dwina discharged its waters into the White Sea, or, as it was then called, the Sea of Archangel. Perhaps my poor speech may end in some similar lesson. The incident I have related is the burden of the earliest historical notice of the subjugation of the monster of the seas to the uses of man. The fishery was carried on then, and near six hundred years afterwards, by the Basques, Biscayans, and Norwegians, for the food yielded by the tongue, and the oil obtained from the fat of the animal. Whalebone entered into commerce in the fifteenth century, and at first commanded the enormous price of seven hundred pounds sterling per ton, exceeding a value in this age of ten thousand dollars. Those were merry times, if not for science, at least for royalty, when, although the material for stays and hoops were taken from the mouth, the law appropriated the tail of every whale taken by an English subject to the use of the Queen, for the supply of the royal wardrobe.

In 1486 the Portuguese reached the Cape of Storms, and, in happy augury of an ultimate passage to India, changed its ill-omened name to that of Good Hope; and immediately thereafter the States of Europe, especially England and Holland, began that series of voyages, not even yet ended, in search of a passage to the East through the floating fields and mountains of ice in the Arctic ocean. The unsuccessful search disclosed the refuge of the whales in the bays and creeks of Spitzbergen. In 1575 a London merchant wrote to a foreign correspondent for advice and direction as to the course of killing the whale, and received instructions how to build and equip a vessel of two hundred tons, and to man it exclusively with experienced whale hunters of Biscay. The attraction of dominion was stronger in that age than the lust of profit. The English now claim Spitzbergen, and all its surrounding ice and waters, by discovery. The Dutch, with truth, alleged an earlier exploration, while the Danes claimed the whole region as a part of Greenland, a pretension that could not then be disproved; and all these parties sent armed forces upon the fishing ground, less to protect their few fishermen, than to establish exclusive rights there. After some fifty years, these nations discovered, first, that it was absurd to claim jurisdiction where no permanent possession could ever be established, by reason of the rigors of climate; and secondly, that there were fish enough and room enough for all competitors. Thenceforward, the whale fishery in the Arctic ocean has been free to all nations.

The Dutch perfected the harpoon, the reel, the line, and the spear, as well as the art of using them. And they established, also, the system which we have since found indispensable, of rewarding all the officers and crews employed in the fishery, not with direct wages or salaries, but with shares in the spoils of the game, proportioned to skill and experience. Combining with these the advantages of favorable position, and of frugality and perseverance quite proverbial, the Dutch even founded a fishing settlement, called Smeerenburgh, on the coast of Spitzbergen, within eleven degrees of the North Pole, and they took whales in its vicinity in such abundance, that ships were needed to go out in ballast to carry home the surplus oil and bone above the capacity of the whaling vessels. The whales thus originally attacked, again changed their lurking place, Spitzbergen was abandoned by the fishermen, and the very site of Smeerenburgh is now unknown. In the year 1496, Sebastian Cabot, in the spirit of that age, seeking a northwestern passage to the Indies, gave to the world the discovery of Prima Vista, or, as we call it, Newfoundland, and the Basques, Biscayans, Dutch, and English, immediately thereafter commenced the chase for whales in the waters surrounding it.

Scarcely had the colonists of Massachusetts planted themselves at Plymouth, before the sterility of the soil and the rigor of the climate forced them to resort to the sea to eke out their subsistence. Pursuing the whales out from their own bays, in vessels of only forty tons burden, they appeared on the fishing ground off Newfoundland in the year 1690. Profiting by nearness of position and economy in building and equipping ships, and sharing also in the bounties with which England was then stimulating the whale fishery, they soon excelled all their rivals on the Newfoundland waters, as well as in Baffin's Bay and off the coast of Greenland. Thus encouraged, they ran down the coasts of America and Africa, and in the waters rolling between them they discovered the black whale, a new and inferior species, yet worthy of capture; and then stretching off toward the South Pole, they found still another species, the sperm whale, whose oil is still preferred above all other; and thus they enlarged the whale fishery for the benefit of the world, which since that time has distinguished the two branches of that enterprise geographically by the designation of the northern and southern fisheries. In 1775 the fisheries were carried on by the Americans, the English, the Dutch, and the French. The French employed only a small fleet, the Dutch a larger one of 129 sail. The English had only 96 ships, while the Americans had 132 vessels in the southern fishery, and 177 in the northern fishery, manned with 4,000 persons, and bringing in oil and whalebone of the value of $1,111,000. This precociousness of American naval enterprise elicited from Burke, in his great speech for conciliation to the colonies, a tribute familiar to our countrymen, and perhaps the most glowing passage that even that great orator ever wrote or spoke:

"Look at the manner in which the people of New England have of late carried on the whale fishery. Whilst we follow them among the tumbling mountains of ice, and behold them penetrating into the deepest recesses of Hudson's Bay and Davis's Straits, whilst we are looking for them beneath the Arctic circle, we hear that they have pierced into the opposite region of Polar cold—that they are at the Antipodes, and engaged under the frozen serpent of the South. Falkland Island, which seemed too remote and romantic an object for the grasp of national ambition, is but a stage and resting place in the progress of their victorious industry. Nor is the Equatorial heat more discouraging to them than the accumulated winter of both the Poles. We know that whilst some of them draw the line and strike the harpoon on the coast of Africa, others run the longitude, and pursue their gigantic game along the coast of Brazil. No ocean but what is vexed with their fisheries, no climate that is not witness to their toils. Neither the perseverance of Holland, nor the activity of France, nor the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise, ever carried this perilous mode of hardy enterprise to the extent to which it has been pushed by this recent people—a people who are still, as it were, in the giste, and not yet hardened into the bone of manhood."

But Britain did not conciliate. The Revolution went on, and the American whale fishery perished, leaving not one vessel on either fishing ground.

Yet it is curious, Mr. President, to mark the elasticity of our countrymen in this their favorite enterprise. A provisional treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain was concluded on the 30th of November, 1782. "On the 3d of February, 1783," (I read from an English paper of that period,) "the ship Bedford, Captain 'Moore, belonging to Massachusetts, arrived in 'the Downs. She passed Gravesend on the 4th, and on the 6th was reported at the custom-house in London. She was not allowed regular entry 'until after some consultation between the Commissioners of Customs and the Lords of the Council, on account of the many acts of Parliament yet in force against the rebels of America. 'She was loaded with five hundred and eighty-seven barrels of whale oil, and manned wholly 'with American seamen, and belonged to the 'island of Nantucket. The vessel lay at the 'Horsley-Downs, a little below the Tower, and 'was the first which displayed the thirteen stripes 'of America, in any British port."

Nevertheless, the lost vantage ground was not easily nor speedily regained. The effort was made against protection, against exclusion in foreign markets, and against bounties by the English Government equivalent to forty dollars per man employed, or fifty per cent. on the value of every cargo obtained—bounties not occasionally nor irregularly offered, but continued from 1750 to 1824, and amounting in the aggregate to £3,000,000. Nor was this all. These bounties, enhanced with additional inducements, were offered to the Nantucket fishermen on condition of their abandoning their country and becoming inhabitants of the adjacent British Colonies, or of the British Islands. It seemed, indeed, that a crisis in this great national interest had come. Happily there was, on the French side of the channel, at least, one unwearied friend of America, as there were many watchful enemies of England. La Fayette wrote several letters to Boston and arrested an immigration from Nantucket to the British Colonies and Islands, already on the eve of embarkation, and then addressed himself to the French monarch and his court. France saw at once the danger of a transfer of so great a number of seamen, together with the very secret, art, and mystery of whale hunting, to her hereditary and relentless enemy. The good but ill-fated Louis XVI. equipped six whaling vessels, with American harpooners, on his own account, and offered a bounty of nine dollars per man, payable by the Royal Treasury, to every American fisherman who should emigrate to France. In a whole year, only nine families, containing thirty-three persons, accepted this offer; and therefore the King, in compliance with La Fayette's first advice, adopted the expedient of discriminating in favor of American cargoes of oil and whalebone in the French market. The American whale fishery began to revive, and in 1787, 1788, and 1789, it employed an average of one hundred and twenty-two vessels. But it still labored under the pressure of competition, stimulated by bounties both in England and in France. In 1790, the Great and General Council of Massachusetts appealed to Congress for protection to this great interest of that Commonwealth. Mr. Jefferson, the Secretary of State, submitted an elaborate reply, which, while it was liberal in its spirit, nevertheless closed with the declaration, that "the whale fishery was a branch of industry 'so poor, as to come to nothing with distant nations who did not support it from their treasures; 'that our position placed our fishing on ground 'somewhat higher, such as to relieve the National Treasury from giving it support, but not to permit it to derive support from the fishery, nor to 'relieve the Government from the obligation to 'provide free markets for the productions of the 'fishery, if possible."

The enterprise had not yet languished into life, when the French Revolution of 1789 occurred, which involved Europe, and ultimately the United States, in wars that swept the latter, as well as the French and Dutch, from all the fisheries, and left them in the exclusive enjoyment of Britain, who achieved in those wars her now established preëminence as the conqueror of the seas. At their close the British had 146 vessels in the northern whaling ground, which captured no less than 133 whales, and thus obtained 13,590 tons of oil and 438 tons of whalebone; and 56 ships in the southern whale fishery, equally successful. The Americans now reëntered the game, and the tables were speedily—and, as we think, permanently—turned in their favor. In 1824, the British became discouraged, and withdrew their bounties; and in 1842 they had no more than 18 vessels in the north fishery, which captured only 24 whales. The southern fishery declined still more rapidly; so that, in 1845, not one British whaler appeared in the South Seas. Since that time, all nations have virtually abandoned this "hardy form of perilous industry" in favor of the Americans. The entire whaling fleet of the world, in 1847, consisted of about 900 vessels, 40 of which belonged to France, 20 to Bremen and other ports in Northern Europe, 20 to New Holland and other British Polynesian Colonies, and all others, more than 800 in number, with a tonnage of 240,000 tons, belonged to the United States. The capital thus employed exceeded $20,000,000 of dollars, and the annual productions of the fisheries amounted to $13,000,000. With the decline of this enterprise in Great Britain, her commercial writers began to discountenance whale fishing altogether; and while they now represent it as a new gambling adventure, they endeavor to stimulate the people of continental Europe to substitute vegetable oils for those procured in the seas.

Mr. President, pray consider the cost, time, dangers, and hazard of the whale fishery. Each vessel with its outfit is worth $30,000, and carries thirty able-bodied seamen, and is afloat on a single voyage one or two, perhaps three years. It finds the whale never below the sixtieth degree of latitude, and can remain there only during the brief polar summer of three months. The whole time may elapse without a whale being seen. When discovered, every stage of his capture is toilsome, and attended with multiplied dangers to the assailants, increased by the shoals, the ice, the storms, and the fogs, which protect the animal against his pursuers. The statistics are absolutely frightful to a landsman or a common seaman. In 1819, of sixty-three British ships sent to Davis's Straits, ten were lost. In 1821, out of sixty-nine, eleven were lost. Of eighty-seven ships that sailed for Davis's Straits in 1830, no less than eighteen were lost, twenty-four returned clean, while not one of the remainder had a full cargo, and only one or two half fished.

Pray consider now, sir, that the great triumph of the American fishermen was achieved, and is still sustained, not only without aid from the Government, but practically also without aid from the capital or enterprise of general commerce, and, indeed, to quote the nervous language of Jefferson, "with no auxiliaries but poverty and rigorous economy." The whaling fleet of the United States, in 1846, consisted of seven hundred and thirty-seven vessels. Of the thirty States, only five, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New York, were represented; and all of them except New York are the States least blest in fertility and climate. New Hampshire having only a single port, sent out only one vessel. Rhode Island, one of the three most diminutive States, equipped fifty-two. Connecticut, a small State, sent out one hundred and twenty-four. New York, with her extended territory, vast wealth, and stupendous commercial establishments, sent only eighty-five; and all the rest proceeded from that State, inferior to many others in extent, wealth, and commerce, but superior to them all in intellectual and social development—Massachusetts.

Wealth does nothing, patronage does nothing, while vigor does everything for the whale fishery. In Great Britain, London resigned it in favor of those poor and obsolete towns, Hull, in England, and Peterhead, in Scotland, as soon as the Government bounties ceased. So of the eighty-five vessels which, in 1846, represented New York in the fishery, only one went up from the port of New York, the commercial capital of the State and of the continent, while no less than eight proceeded from Cold Spring, a mere nook in the mountains which crowd toward each other just above the city, as if to prevent the waters of the Hudson from their destined meeting with the tides of the ocean. All the others were sent forth from New Suffolk, Greenport, and Sag Harbor, inconsiderable villages or hamlets on the outward coast of Long Island. Massachusetts exhibits the same case. Boston finds more lucrative employment for her capital in spindles, in railroads, and even in her fields of ice and quarries of granite; and so leaves the profits and toils of the whale fishery to Freetown, Falmouth, Sippican, Wareham, Plymouth, Holmes's Hole, Fall River, Provincetown, Fairhaven, New Bedford, and Nantucket, towns which, but for their pursuit of the whale fishery, would scarcely have been honored with designation on the chart, or names in the gazetteer. Most wondrous of all, Nantucket is a sandy island, fifteen miles long, and three miles broad, capable of maintaining by agriculture only one hundred persons, and yet it was the cradle of the whale fishery; and neither any town in America, nor in England, nor even in France, has ever successfully established, or at all maintained, the whale fishery without drawing, not merely its knowledge of whale-hunting, but the officers and crews of its vessels, chiefly from that sandy shoal thus rising above the surface of the sea.

Need I dwell here on the whale fishery as a source of national wealth, and an element of national force and strength? The number of those who are actively afloat in the pursuit ranges from 15,000 to 20,000, while twenty times that greater number of persons are indirectly engaged in the culture of hemp and the manufacture of cordage, the building of ships, furnishing their supplies, manufacturing and preparing the oil and whalebone, in sending them to market, and in the various other occupations incidentally connected with the trade. The wealth thus acquired leaves all the resources of the country untouched. Dr. Franklin cheered the fishermen of his day with the apophthegm that whosoever took a fish out of the sea always found a piece of silver in his mouth, and our experience has confirmed its truth, although it is now rejected by the commercial writers of England.

We are the second in rank among commercial nations. Our superiority over so many results from our greater skill in ship-building, and our greater dexterity in navigation, and our greater frugality at sea. These elements were developed in the fisheries, and especially in the northern fishery. We think that we are inferior to no nation in naval warfare. The seamen who have won our brilliant victories on the ocean, and on the lakes, were trained and disciplined in this, the severest of all marine service; and our naval historians agree that it constituted the elementary school of all our nautical science. What, then, would compensate us for the loss or for the decline of the whale fishery?

Mr. President, I have tried to win the favor of the Senate toward the national whale fishery for a purpose. The whales have found a new retreat in the seas of Ochotsk and Anadir, south of Behring Straits, and in that part of the Arctic ocean lying north of them. In 1848, Captain Roys, in the whale ship Superior, passed through those seas and through the straits, braving the perils of an unknown way and an inhospitable climate. He filled his ship in a few weeks, and the news of his success went abroad. In 1849, a fleet of 154 sail went up to this new fishing-ground; in 1850, a fleet of 144; and in 1851, a fleet of 145. The vessels were manned with thirty persons each; and their value, including that of the average annual cargoes procured there, was equal to $9,000,000, and thus exceeded by near $2,000,000 the highest annual import from China. But these fleets have been beset by not only such dangers of their calling as customarily occur on well-explored fishing grounds, but also by the multiplied dangers of shipwreck resulting from the want of accurate topographical knowledge—the only charts of these seas being imperfect and unsatisfactory. While many and deplorable losses were sustained by the fleets of 1849–'50, we have already information of the loss of eleven vessels, one thirteenth part of the whole fleet of 1851, many of which disasters might have been avoided had there been charts, accurately indicating the shoals and headlands, and also places of sheltered anchorage near them. These facts are represented to us by the merchants, ship-owners and underwriters, and are confirmed by Lieutenant Maury, who presides in this department of science in the Navy as well as in the labors and studies of the National Observatory. We want, then, not bounties, nor protection, nor even an accurate survey, but simply an exploration and reconnaissance of these seas, which have so recently become the theater of profitable adventure and brave achievement of our whale hunters. This service can be performed by officers and crews now belonging to the Navy, in two or three vessels which already belong or may be added to it, and would continue at most only throughout two or three years. Happily, the measure involves nothing new, untried, or uncommon. To say nothing of our recent search for the lamented Sir John Franklin, nor of our great exploring expedition under Captain Wilkes, we are already engaged in triangulating a coast survey of the Atlantic shore. Charts, light-houses, and beacons, show the pilot his way, not only over that ocean and among its islands, but along all our rivers and even upon our inland lakes. The absence of similar guides and beacons in the waters now in question results from the fact that the Pacific coast has but recently fallen under our sway, and Behring's Straits and the seas they connect have not until now been frequently navigated by the seamen of any nation. Certainly somebody must do this service. But who will? The whalers cannot. No foreign nation will, for none is interested. The constitutional power and responsibility rests with the Federal Government, and its means are adequate.

California is near this fishing ground. Her enterprising citizens are already engaged in this pursuit, and henceforward the whale hunters of Nantucket must compete with a new rival possessing the advantage of nearness to the scenes of their labors. California, therefore, joins Massachusetts in this reasonable demand.

Mr. President, the small exploring fleet thus proposed would be obliged to quit the Northern seas early in September, and could not return to them until the succeeding June. I propose that it should spend that long season in performing a service not dissimilar under milder skies, in that part of the Pacific ocean and its adjoining seas, which is usually traversed by vessels sailing from New York and San Francisco to China and the Indies. Remember, sir, if you please, that not only has no Asiatic prince, merchant, or navigator ever explored this one of all the oceans the broadest and most crowded and crowned with islands, but that they have forbidden that exploration by European navigators, who have performed whatever has been done at the peril and often at the cost of imprisonment and death. We have made no accurate survey, for we have only just now arrived and taken our stand on the Pacific coast. We are new on that ocean—nay, we are only as of yesterday upon this continent; and yet maps and charts are as necessary to the sea-faring man on that ocean as on any other, and just as necessary on every ocean as monuments and guides are to him who traverses deserts of sand or wastes of trackless snow.

Lieutenant Maury informs us that every navigator of those waters is painfully impressed with a sense of surrounding dangers—they exist, and yet the only charts that have been made fail to indicate in what forms or in what places they will appear. So imperfect is our topographical information, that a large island called Ousima, supposed to be thickly inhabited and highly cultivated, lies in the fair way to China, and yet no vessel has ever touched or gone around it. It would repay tenfold the cost of the whole exploration, if we should find on that island a good harbor and a friendly people.* Horbergh's charts of these passages, are the best. But these are of old dates, and although they have been corrected from time to time, yet they are very imperfect. The shoals in the China Sea, the Sea of Japan, and the Straits of Gaspar, are represented to us by navigators, as being formed of coral, a mixture of animal and vegetable organization, and therefore increasing rapidly in magnitude as they approach near to the surface of the waters. It is particularly necessary to explore and note the shoals and islands lying between the coast of Palawan, on the China Sea, and that of Cochinchina, and also the shoals in the vicinity of West London, Prince of Wales, and Paulo Sapata Islands. The perils existing there oblige ships going up and coming down through those seas against the monsoons, to beat at disadvantage, while an exploration would probably disclose eddies and currents which would allow of straight courses where now no one dare pursue them. Clement's Strait and the Caranata Passage are filled with the same dangers. Again, the great outlet from the China sea into the Pacific ocean, by the Balisee, and adjacent passages between the islands of Luconia and the coasts of China and Formosa, need to be surveyed, although the islands are generally well designated on the maps. Then proceeding northwardly, a regard to the safety of the whaler demands that the islands between the coasts of China and Japan, and from them to the Loo Choo Islands, and so on to the Russian possessions, and along them eastwardly to Behring's Straits, should be surveyed. The last attempt to perform that duty was made by a small Russian fleet, which was captured and destroyed, while its officers and crew were imprisoned by the Japanese. Lastly, as we advance eastwardly in the very track pursued by our whalers and China men, we encounter islands, and many shoals imperfectly defined, and especially the Bonin Islands; while prudence requires a careful reconnaissance also of the Fox Islands, which, although lying somewhat northwardly of the passage, might, if well known, afford shelter in case of inclement weather. This reconnaissance in a temperate latitude is demanded by the merchants, underwriters, and navigators, in all our Atlantic as well as in our two Pacific ports, and the argument for it rests on the same foundation with that which supports the proposition for the more northwardly exploration. Sir, the mails and a certain class of passengers will be carried by us, or by the English steamers, from California. And the Chinese port is Shanghai. And yet for want of such a survey as this, you cannot choose or establish a coaling station, although the length of the voyage is seven thousand miles.

Sir, have you looked recently at the China trade? It reaches already seven millions in value annually. Have you watched the California trade? Its exports in bullion alone already exceeds $50,000,000 annually, and as yet the mineral development of that State has only begun. The settlement of the Pacific coast is in a state of sheer infancy. There is, speaking relatively, neither capital nor labor there adequate to exhibit the forces of industry that might be employed in that wonderful region. Nor is California yet conveniently accessible. The railway across Panama is not yet completed. The passage through Nicaragua is not perfect; that which leads through Tehuantepec is not begun; nor have we yet extended, even so far as to the Mississippi, the most important and necessary one of them all, the railroad across our own country to San Francisco. The emigrant to the Atlantic coast arrives speedily and cheaply from whatever quarter of the world; while he who would seek the Pacific shore, encounters charges and delays which few can sustain. Nevertheless, the commercial, social, and political movements of the world are now in the direction of California. Separated as it is from us by foreign lands, or more impassable mountains, we are establishing there a custom-house, a mint, a dry-dock, Indian agencies, and ordinary and extraordinary tribunals of justice. Without waiting for perfect or safe channels, a strong and steady stream of emigration flows thither from every State and every district eastward of the Rocky Mountains. Similar torrents of emigration are pouring into California and Australia from the South American States, from Europe, and from Asia. This movement is not a sudden, or accidental, or irregular, or convulsive one; but it is one for which men and nature have been preparing through near four hundred years. During all that time merchants and princes have been seeking how they could reach cheaply and expeditiously, "Cathay," "China," "the East," that intercourse and commerce might be established between its ancient nations and the newer ones of the West. To these objects Da Gama, Columbus, Americus, Cabot, Hudson, and other navigators, devoted their talents, their labors, and their lives. Even the discovery of this continent and its islands, and the organization of society and government upon them, grand and important as those events have been, were but conditional, preliminary, and ancillary to the more sublime result, now in the act of consummation—the reunion of the two civilizations, which, having parted on the plains of Asia four thousand years ago, and having traveled ever afterwards in opposite directions around the world, now meet again on the coasts and islands of the Pacific ocean. Certainly no mere human event of equal dignity and importance has ever occurred upon the earth. It will be followed by the equalization of the condition of society and the restoration of the unity of the human family. We see plainly enough why this event could not have come before, and why it has come now. A certain amount of human freedom, a certain amount of human intelligence, a certain extent of human control over the physical obstacles to such a reunion, were necessary. All these conditions have happened and concurred. Liberty has developed under improved forms of government, and science has subjected Nature in Western Europe and in America. Navigation, improved by steam, enables men to outstrip the winds, and intelligence conveyed by electricity excels in velocity the light. With these favoring circumstances there has come also a sudden abundance of gold, that largely relieves labor from its long subjection to realized capital. Sir, this movement is no delusion. It will no more stop than the emigration from Europe to our own Atlantic shores has stopped, or can stop, while labor is worth there twenty cents and here fifty cents a day. Emigration from China cannot stop while labor is worth in California $5 a day, and in the West Indies $10 a month, and yet is worth in China only $5 for that period. Accordingly we have seen sixty-seven ships filled, in three months of the present year, with seventeen thousand emigrants in the ports of Hong Kong, Macao, and Whampao, and afterwards discharge them on the shores of California, and of Cuba, and other islands of the West Indies.

Sir, have you considered the basis of this movement, that this country and Australia are capable of sustaining, and need for their development, five hundred millions, while their population is confined to fifty millions, and yet that Asia has two hundred millions of excess? As for those who doubt that this great movement will quicken activity and create wealth and power in California and Oregon, I leave them to consider what changes the movements, similar in nature but inferior in force and slower in effect, have produced already on the Atlantic coast of America. As to those who cannot see how this movement will improve the condition of Asia, I leave them to reflect upon the improvements in the condition of Europe since the discovery and colonization of America. Who does not see, then, that every year hereafter, European commerce, European politics, European thoughts, and European activity, although actually gaining greater force, and European connections, although actually becoming more intimate, will, nevertheless, ultimately sink in importance; while the Pacific ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast regions beyond, will become the chief theater of events in the world's great Hereafter?

* Within the last year the Mennon, an American ship, valued with her cargo at $500,000, was lost in the Straits of Gaspar.

Who does not see that this movement must effect our own complete emancipation from what remains of European influence and prejudice, and in turn develop the American opinion and influence, which shall remould constitutional laws and customs in the land that is first greeted by the rising sun? Sir, although I am no socialist, I nevertheless cannot reject the hope that peace is now to have her sway, and that as war has hitherto defaced and saddened the Atlantic world, the better passions of mankind will soon have their development in the new theater of human activity.

Commerce is the great agent of this movement. Whatever nation shall put that commerce into full employment, and shall conduct it steadily with adequate expansion, will become necessarily the greatest of existing States; greater than any that has ever existed. Sir, you will claim that responsibility and that high destiny for our own country. Are you so sure that by assuming the one she will gain the other? They imply nothing less than universal commerce and the supremacy of the seas. We are second to England, indeed, but, nevertheless, how far are we not behind her in commerce and in extent of empire! I pray to know where you will go that you will not meet the flag of England fixed, planted, rooted into the very earth? If you go northward, it waves over half of this continent of North America, which we call our own. If you go southward, it greets you on the Bermudas, the Bahamas, and the Caribbee Islands. On the Falkland Islands it guards the Straits of Magellan; on the South Shetland Island it watches the passage round the Horn; and at Adelaide Island it warns you that you have reached the Antarctic Circle. When you ascend along the southwestern coast of America, it is seen at Galapagos, overlooking the Isthmus of Panama; and having saluted it there, and at Vancouver, you only take leave of it in the far northwest, when you are entering the Arctic Ocean. If you visit Africa, you find the same victorious cross guarding the coast of Gambia and Sierra Leone and St. Helena. It watches you at Cape Town as you pass into the Indian Ocean; while on the northern passage to that vast sea it demands your recognition from Gibraltar, as you enter the Mediterranean; from Malta, when you pass through the Sicilian Straits. On the Ionian Islands it waves in protection of Turkey; and at Aden it guards the passage from the Red Sea into the Indian Ocean. Wherever western commerce has gained an entrance to the continent of Asia, there that flag is seen waving over subjugated millions—at Bombay, at Ceylon, at Singapore, at Calcutta, at Lahore, and at Hong Kong; while Australia and nearly all the islands of Polynesia acknowledge its protection.

Sir, I need not tell you that wherever that flag waves it is supported and cheered by the martial airs of England. But I care not for that. The sword is not the most winning messenger that can be sent abroad; and commerce, like power, upheld by armies and navies, may in time be found to cost too much. But what is to be regarded with more concern is, that England employs the steam engine even more vigorously and more universally than her military force. Steam engines, punctually departing and arriving between every one of her various possessions and her island seat of power, bring in the raw material for every manufacture and supplies for every want. The steam engine plies incessantly there day and night, converting these materials into fabrics of every variety for the use of man. And again, the steam engine forever and without rest moves over the face of the deep, not only distributing these fabrics to every part of the globe, but disseminating also the thoughts, the principles, the language, and religion of England. Sir, we are bold indeed to dare competition with such a Power. Nevertheless, the resources for it are adequate. We have coal and iron no less than she, while corn, timber, cattle, hemp, wool, cotton, silk, oil, sugar, and the grape, quicksilver, lead, copper, silver, and gold, are all found within our own broad domain in inexhaustible profusion. What energies we have already expended prove that we have in reserve all that are needful. What inventions we have made prove our equality to any exigency. Our capital increases, while labor scarcely knows the burden of taxation. Our Panama route to China has a decided advantage over that of the Isthmus of Suez, and, at the same time, vessels leaving that country and coming round the Horn will reach New York always at least five days sooner than vessels of equal speed can double the Cape of Good Hope and make the port of Liverpool.

Mr. President, we now see how conspicuous a part in the great movement of the age, California and Oregon are to sustain, and that, as yet, they are separated from us and isolated. They will adhere to us only so long as our government over them shall be conducted, not for our benefit, but for their own. Their loyalty is great, but it cannot exceed that of the thirteen ancient American colonies to Great Britain; and yet the neglect and oppression of their commerce undermined that loyalty, and resulted in their independence. I hear often of dangers to the Union, and see lines of threatened separation drawn by passionate men or alarmists, on parallels of latitude; but, in my judgment, there is only one danger of severance, and that is involved in the possibility of criminal neglect of the new communities on the Pacific coast, while the summits of the Rocky Mountains, or of the Snowy Mountains, mark the only possible line of dismemberment. Against that danger I would guard as against the worst calamity that could befall, not only my country, at her most auspicious stage of progress, but mankind also, in the hour of their brightest hopes. I would guard against it by practicing impartial justice toward the new and remote States and Territories, whose political power is small, while their wants are great, and by pursuing at the same time, with liberality and constancy, the lofty course, to which they invite us, of an aspiring, yet generous and humane national ambition.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the bill will not be postponed. It ought to be acted on immediately.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no speech to make upon the bill, but I am unwilling to see it passed in its present shape. As it stands it vests unlimited discretion in the President of the United States. There is no limitation as to the amount which may be expended. The only limitation is that vessels of the Navy are to be employed.

Mr. SEWARD. I have an amendment which I think will remove the objection of the honorable Senator. It has been printed and laid on the tables of Senators. It is in the nature of a substitute, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause an exploration and reconnaissance to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of the track of navigation pursued by whaling vessels in the region of Behring Straits, and also of such parts of the China Sea, the Straits of Gaspar, and Java Sea, as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding from Atlantic or Pacific American ports to China and Japan; and that for this purpose the President is authorized and requested to provide one or more suitable vessels, or assign them from vessels now in the Navy, and such officers of the Navy and Army of the United States as shall be necessary; and the sum of $135,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense of carrying this act into execution.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force two years.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1853;" the question pending being upon the second amendment of the Committee on Finance, which was to strike out "ten," and insert "two," in the following clause in relation to the Miamies:

"For permanent provision for the purchase of one thousand pounds of tobacco, ten thousand pounds of iron, and one thousand pounds of steel, stipulated in the 4th article of the treaty of October 23, 1826, $770."

Mr. HUNTER. The change is made to make the provision correspond to the treaty. Owing to some mistake the House of Representatives put in "ten thousand," instead of "two thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment of the Committee on Finance was stated to be to strike out from the appropriations for the Menomonees the following:

"For additional compensation for the sale of their lands in the State of Wisconsin, by the treaty of October 18, 1848, $221,840; the same to be paid in such sums and at such times, with the approbation of the said nation, as the President may think most conducive to their prosperity and happiness."

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, this amendment relates to the last treaty made with the Menomonee tribe of Indians. According to that treaty a provision of $350,000 was given to that tribe for the cession of lands which they made at that time.

Commissioner Medill, when he went to the treaty ground, was instructed by the President that he might give them at the rate of nineteen cents per acre—which was the price that had been paid to the Menomonees for a previous cession of land—for a quantity of land not exceeding 3,230,800 of acres. These instructions were given in pursuance of an opinion of the then Attorney General, who, I believe, is the present Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Toucey,] in which the belief was expressed that this was the extreme limit of the rightful demands of the Menomonee tribe of Indians. They had made a treaty formerly, by which, for $791,310 50 they had ceded lands to the United States. This was to obtain the residue of their lands. Some difficulties had existed between the Menomonees and other tribes as to their rightful boundaries. The question was submitted to the Attorney General, and he came to the conclusion that they could not claim more than that amount of land. The President accordingly instructed the commissioner that he should not give more than such a sum per acre for so many acres, but he did not instruct him that he should go to the extreme limits which were allowed him under this commission.

It appears from the report of the commissioner, and indeed from other testimony, that when he got upon the ground, the Menomonees claimed a much larger quantity of land than was supposed to belong to them. They claimed about 8,000,000 of acres. Indeed the commissioner himself found that in the map upon which the Attorney General and himself had previously acted, there was probably a mistake; and he thought, as he reported when he came back, that their lands were about 4,000,000 of acres. He made a bargain with them by which he obtained a cession of all their rights, whatever they were, for the sum of $350,000. Much testimony was taken upon both sides, and the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in the report which he has given us on the subject, decided that it was a contract of hazard; that the Indians on the one hand insisted that there was this large amount of land—larger than it has turned out to be—whilst the commissioner refused, on the other hand, to give more than the sum which they finally accepted.

The exterior lines of the surveys of the land have been run, and it appears from them that something like five millions of acres were ceded by these Indians under that treaty. They have set up a claim, not under the treaty, but an equitable claim for compensation for this additional amount of land. They have claimed it because, as they allege, there was fraud on the part of the commissioner who negotiated the treaty. In relation to the question of fraud, there has been much testimony, and I am informed by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. Atchison,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the question was raised at the time when the treaty was ratified by the Senate, and that the Committee on Indian Affairs was then satisfied that there was no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the commissioner. And the Senate must have been satisfied for they ratified the treaty. Nor is the circumstance that a less compensation was given than that which was the extreme limit fixed by the instructions of President Polk to be considered as having vitiated the treaty, because that fact was before the President when he communicated the treaty to the Senate; and that fact must have been before the Senate when they confirmed it. Mr. Medill, in his report, says that he was authorized to have given this sum, but that he obtained the cession for less; and he himself supposed that the lands ceded amounted to about 4,000,000 acres.

In relation to the question of fraud, there are persons who have charged it upon the commissioner, and there is a good deal of testimony in the Department on the subject. On the other side, there is testimony to prove—and that, I believe, of very high character—that nothing of the sort can be attributed to him. Among the persons who deposed that the allegations are false, so far as Commissioner Medill is concerned, are Colonel Lee, of the Army; Mr. Martin, who, I believe, formerly represented the Territory of Wisconsin as Delegate in the House of Representatives, with whom the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Dodge] is well acquainted; Mr. Ellis, a former Indian agent; and Mr. Bruce, the late Indian agent. All these gentlemen depose that nothing of the sort can properly be charged to Commissioner Medill, who negotiated the treaty.

This claim of the Menomonee Indians is founded upon the charge of fraud, and the further allegation—that there was an inadequacy of consideration—that having sold so much land they ought to have received more than was given them under this treaty. There is no pretext of doubt in relation to the construction of the treaty itself. It is clear and specific. The present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in examining the testimony, came to the conclusion that fraud could not be imputed to the commissioner who negotiated the treaty, and he came to the conclusion that the treaty bound the Indians—that it was a contract of hazard; but he also said that he believed that, so far as the Indians were concerned, it was a hard bargain, and in order to rectify it, he proposed to go back to the provisions of a former treaty—the treaty of 1831, under which the President was allowed, without any further treaty, without the necessity of negotiating this last treaty, to remove the Indians from those lands, and make them such further allowances in the shape of annuity as he might think to be just and proper. Under that authority, derived from the Indians by the treaty of 1831, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs came to the conclusion that the Executive had the power to settle this question, and he proposed to give such additional allowance as would amount to the sum authorized by President Polk in his instructions, if Commissioner Medill had gone to the extreme limit of those instructions; that is to say, he proposes that we should appropriate such a sum as, in addition to the $350,000 paid, would amount to the price of 3,023,800 acres of land, at about nineteen cents an acre. The House of Representatives have put into the bill a provision making that appropriation.

This appropriation the Committee on Finance, after a careful consideration, determined ought to be stricken out. We were of the opinion that it ought to be stricken out, because, if we go upon such testimony as this, if we set aside treaties thus made by our officers—treaties in relation to whose construction there can be no sort of doubt—we may go through the whole catalogue of Indian treaties, and set them all aside. We lay the foundation for new claims in relation to almost every Indian treaty which has ever been negotiated, because you may take any of them, and on their face prove an inadequacy of consideration, if you argue upon the supposition that the Indians were the proprietors of the land. As I said yesterday, I am told in the Department, that the Osages have ceded in all more than one hundred and forty millions of acres of land for something like $400,000; and they are a more numerous tribe, I believe, than the Menomonees. If you pass this, how could you refuse their demands, when they come with their maps and the treaties in their hands to show that the consideration was inadequate, unless, indeed, you could go upon the supposition that the Indians were deceived, and the commissioner had been guilty of fraud? I think, with the testimony before us, it would be doing great injustice to Commissioner Medill to make any such admission. So far as the facts are concerned—so far as any comparison is proper to be instituted between the quantity of land ceded and the amount of money given, the commissioner made no concealment of the facts. He reported it to the President in the report which accompanied the treaty. He said he believed there was more land than was supposed by the Attorney General at the time the instructions were given. But he did not, nor do I, acknowledge, that this Government, in its past transactions with the Indians, ever supposed that they were entitled to demand of us the full value of the lands as owners. Sir, they could only be regarded as having some possessory title, and, as I said yesterday, all that could be fairly asked of us, would be to make such provision for them as would open up to them chances for future improvement and civilization; as would protect them in peace and quiet; as would give them what would place them in such a position as ought reasonably to satisfy a tribe of their number and position.

This tribe numbers about two thousand five hundred persons, all told. They received by the cession of 1831, something like $700,000. They received, under this treaty of Commissioner Medill, something like $350,000—making upwards of $1,000,000 in all. They received, too, in exchange for their former possession, a tract of country, which, I am told, comprises about 600,000 acres of land, to which they will be removed. And it seems to me, when we come to look at what is necessary for their comfort, that this is an ample provision. If we have made an ample provision for them, what more can be required of us? If we are to suppose that they are the owners of the land, we should not be satisfied with giving them nineteen cents an acre; for it is worth much more. If we believe that, in equity, we ought to give them this price—which is a high price for Indian lands—then this appropriation will not do, for it does not amount to the difference between the amount which we have actually given them, and the amount which would be due upon the land which they actually sold, if we were to value them at nineteen cents an acre. They sold upwards of 5,000,000 of acres, and their claim in the whole would be, therefore, if we were to give them that amount per acre, upwards of $900,000, and the sum necessary to be appropriated to make up the difference, instead of being only $220,000, would be something like $600,000.

But, Mr. President, suppose we make the appropriation, will the Indians get the benefit of it? Is not that one objection to making these appropriations in gross? So strongly does the Commissioner of Indian Affairs seem to feel this, that he recommends that whatever additional compensation is given them, should be given in the shape of annuities, from year to year. And that was the original promise made by the President, in the year 1831—that if he should remove them, under that treaty, he would pay them an additional compensation in the shape of an annuity. It seems to me that something of this sort ought to be done. Why, sir, I found a contract in the Department in relation to this very tribe, by which one agent—and I do not know that they have more than one—was to get one third of the amount which they were to receive. It is true, and is just to that agent, to state that the sub-agent who transmitted the contract and the correspondence, says he consulted the Indians, and they declared that they were willing to make the contract—that it was fairly made. But the very fact that they should have made so improvident a contract, is proof that it will be throwing away the money to appropriate it in gross, as is proposed to be done here. If we do give them additional money, it ought to be done with such safeguards as would secure the enjoyment of it by the Indians themselves.

The whole question with me is this, whether these two thousand five hundred Indians have not been sufficiently provided for by this and former treaties? It strikes me that they have been; but if it should turn out that they have not been, I should be willing to make further provision for them, not in the shape of compensation for their lands, but in order to discharge ourselves of the obligation of securing their comfort and providing for their future home by suitable arrangements and provisions for them. That I should be willing to do. But if we act upon the principle that the Indians, or their agents, can come here and set aside treaties by private parol declarations on the part of the commissioner, or transactions at the time, or secret and private understandings on the part of the Indians themselves, or mistakes and misunderstandings on the part of the Indians, then we shall never know what we are confirming when a treaty is sent for ratification to this body.

If this appropriation be made, and this principle be carried out, the whole system of Indian treaties ought to be abolished; because it will be impossible that the Senate can know what bargain they are making when they act upon an Indian treaty. If it is favorable to the Indians, it binds us, of course; because they are the weaker party. If it is unfavorable to them, or if they produce testimony to show that there were private declarations, or fraud, or anything of that character on the part of the commissioner, they may come here and disturb the treaty, and set aside its provisions, introduce new contracts and new agreements upon which the Government has to act.

I think, therefore, for the sake of example, that this item should be stricken out. But there is a difficulty in relation to these Indians, for which I am willing to provide. They will soon have to remove, owing to the action of Congress. At the present session, the inhabitants of Wisconsin have been pressing to have these Indian lands, which were ceded, put into market. If the lands are put into market, it will be necessary to remove the Indians. They are not willing to go to the country reserved for them, and which is theirs by right; but they are willing to go, and, as I understand at the Department, the people of Wisconsin are probably willing that they should be temporarily placed in a portion of the northern part of that State. Under these circumstances, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has drawn up an amendment, which I shall offer, if this provision be stricken out by the Senate—to appropriate $25,000 to remove them temporarily to this place, until it can be seen whether an arrangement can be made with the government of Wisconsin, to make a permanent exchange with the Indians, and to give them some more permanent location in some portion of the State. If the Legislature of Wisconsin should be unwilling to make such an arrangement, of course the Indians will have to go further west, to the lands which belong to them; but if the people are willing, and the Indians themselves desire it, it would seem to be fair to make this arrangement. In order to make such an arrangement possible, it would be necessary to make some provision for their removal, and their temporary settlement.

Mr. ATCHISON. Mr. President, I concur in the object which the Senator from Virginia has in view—to strike this clause from the bill. This matter was before the Committee on Indian Affairs in 1848, when the treaty was submitted to the Senate. The charge of fraud and mistake was then investigated by the committee and by the Senate. Charges were made, letters were written, and memorials were sent on against the ratification of that treaty. Specifications were sent forth against the conduct of Commissioner Medill, who negotiated the treaty. We gave it a close investigation, and Commissioner Medill, upon every charge, and upon every specification, proved them to be entirely false, and himself to be entirely innocent, by the very best men in the State of Wisconsin, who testified in his favor. But suppose there was a mistake—and I am willing to admit that perhaps the Indians, at the time, were not fully aware of the extent of their claim—this is not the time to make an appropriation, and it is upon that point that I wish to address a few remarks to the Senate.

Suppose they are entitled in equity and good conscience to $220,000, in addition for their lands, I say this is not the time to make the appropriation, in my opinion; because they are in an unsettled state. They were to have removed within two years after the ratification of the treaty, to the territory set apart for them by it, upon the Crow-Wing river west of the Mississippi. They have examined that country; they have explored it through a delegation, and are of the opinion that it is not a country suitable for them, and they are unwilling to remove to it for the reason that it is a barren country, entirely void of game; and for another more potent reason with them: they say that they will be hemmed in on one side by the Chippewas, and on the other by the Winnebagoes, their hereditary enemies; and they being a small band compared with either the Chippewas or Winnebagoes, are unwilling to go there. What is their condition? There is no other land set apart or appropriated for them. They are still in the State of Wisconsin. The white settlers are pressing upon them; and place them wherever you may in the limits of that State, I doubt very much whether the Legislature of Wisconsin will ever give their consent that the Menomonees shall permanently live within the limits of their State. It is against their policy. It is preparing trouble in the future, if the Legislature should consent. They may consent to their remaining there for a few years; but this Government must provide some home for them.

Then I see no necessity for this appropriation at this time, even admitting their claims to be just; because they cannot use it. They have no use for it; and I think the Government will be acting very foolishly to make the appropriation, and place it in the hands of the Indians, or their agents, whosoever they may be; because a home must be provided for them; and a territory, perhaps, that would be large enough, and would suit them, would cost not merely ten, fifteen, or twenty cents an acre, but might cost from fifty cents to a dollar an acre. Therefore, I think there is no necessity for the Indians having the money at this time; particularly so since the chairman of the Committee on Finance intends to propose an appropriation of $25,000 for their present subsistence and accommodation. Then, without going into the question whether there was fraud perpetrated or not; or whether there was a mistake as to the quantity of land or not; or whether we have paid them too small a price for their land, it seems to me to be inexpedient to make the appropriation at this time.

When the proper time arrives, I shall be willing to deal liberally with them—not only justly, but liberally. If $220,000 shall not be sufficient to establish them in their new homes, and start them as an agricultural people, I shall be willing to take half a million out of the Treasury for that purpose. Therefore, I think we had better agree to the amendment proposed by the committee, and when the time arrives when this money will be necessary and beneficial to the Indians, we may consider it, and if there be equity in their claim, make the appropriation.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Before the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to strike out that clause from the bill, I will ask to substitute the amendment which I send to the Chair, in lieu of the whole of that clause. In other words, I move to strike out the objectionable portion of the bill, and to insert what I send to the Chair.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That an additional compensation for the sale of their lands by the treaty of October 18, 1848, for the excess of land actually ceded over the quantity owned by them, as ascertained by the official opinion of the Attorney General, at the same rate as that paid for said territory, assuming the quantity as that fixed in said opinion, may be allowed in the discretion of the President of the United States: Provided, That the same shall be subject to all necessary deductions for expenses of procuring a new home, removal there to, and subsistence for twelve months thereafter: And provided further, That the balance shall not be paid until after such removal, and then in such manner as the President may direct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he proposes to strike out precisely what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] proposes to strike out.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am aware, Mr. President, of the difficulty which may arise under the rule of the Senate, and I shall, therefore, withdraw my amendment for the present, and confine myself to what the Senator from Virginia proposes to strike out; and if that motion prevails, then I will offer my amendment.

Mr. BELL. The proposition of the Senator might be made by way of amendment to the clause. He has a right to move to amend it before the question is taken on the motion to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to propose to strike out precisely the same matter which is proposed by the Senator from Virginia to be stricken out. Therein is the difficulty.

Mr. WELLER. The motion of the Senator from Virginia is simply to strike out.

Mr. BELL. The Senator from Arkansas may leave a word or two of the original clause standing, and so shape his amendment as to move to amend the clause.

Mr. WELLER. There is no necessity for that, for the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas is to strike out and insert; and, as I regard the rule, a motion to strike out and insert has precedence of a mere motion to strike out.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I can obviate the whole difficulty, by attaching my amendment to the preceding clause. I find it will make good sense, if so attached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from Arkansas that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia is to strike out another clause, and not the one to which the Senator proposes to attach his amendment. The motion of the Senator from Virginia is therefore first in order.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Then I will address my remarks to the question on the amendment proposed by the committee. It matters but little whether the question be in the precise form of my amendment or that of the committee. The amendment which I propose, instead of making an appropriation upon what I conceive to be an artificial and arbitrary basis, which I think cannot be justified upon any correct principle, provides for an extra allowance to the Menomonees upon what I consider a true and just principle. It is to allow the Indians the same rate of compensation for the country which they thought they had ceded as for that which they did actually cede, providing only for the excess in quantity over that which it was supposed they owned, by that which has been ascertained to be the amount belonging to them at the date of the treaty. That excess amounts to about two millions of acres—an excess which, in proportion to the land which the Indians were induced to believe from the map at the Land Office belonged to them, is such as to strike the mind of every Senator as amounting on its face to a palpable mistake.

Mr. President, I throw out of consideration altogether what I regard as an unproved charge against the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in reference to a fraudulent concealment of the real quantity of land at the time of making the treaty. That forms no part of the ground upon which I have gone in coming to the conclusion that this is a just claim; but I put it upon the ground of a claim coming under the head of what lawyers class as mistakes. I throw out all charges of fraud—charges which I regard as neither substantiated by testimony, nor sustained in view of the known probity and integrity of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who negotiated this treaty. But there are some facts upon record, apart from those to which the Senator from Virginia has alluded, as being merely parol declarations of credible witnesses; which are enough to show that there was a glaring and palpable mistake between the amounts of land which the Indians supposed they were ceding, and that which they actually did cede, which must strike the mind of every Senator as being an amount too large to have been covered up from the knowledge of the Indians. A simple and brief history of the case, as it appears from documents on file in the Indian Office, will show that what I have remarked is strictly correct.

In 1848 the Government, desiring to obtain the lands of the Menomonees, about which there was a dispute in regard to the quantity, referred the matter to the then Attorney General, who examined the subject, and who ascertained to his own satisfaction that there was not more than 3,860,000 acres justly belonging to them. For this the commissioner was authorized to pay at a rate not exceeding eighteen cents per acre. He called the Indians together, and offered them for the whole amount of their lands $350,000, which was at the rate of about eleven and a half cents per acre for what they were induced to believe they owned at that time. Preparatory to this the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had been furnished with a map at the Land Office, according to which the Indians were represented as owning about 3,000,000 acres. That map was exhibited upon the council grounds, and, according to that, we allowed them for only 3,000,000 acres. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not conceal the fact that he went upon that map as containing the true boundaries of the country. Subsequent discoveries made at the Land Office have revealed the fact, that instead of there having been only 3,000,000 acres ceded, there were nearly 5,000,000.

More than this: There was a rude map constructed by the hands of the Indians by such means as they could command, by which they showed and contended that they owned more than was shown by our map. The commissioner discountenanced and repelled that presumption, and they were compelled to submit to the offer made for the amount of land as disclosed by the map of the commissioner. They therefore ceded a quantity of land according to their map, so that it was said by a member of the House of Representatives that "we bought according to the Indian map, and paid according to our map," making a difference of 2,000,000 acres.

Mr. DESAUSSEURE. I would ask the Senator from Arkansas, if he will permit me, whether it is a fact that the actual quantity of land has been ascertained by a survey? I have heard otherwise. I have heard that the survey has not been completed, and by turning to a memorandum which has been laid upon our tables, it will be found that in the report made by the Commissioner to the Secretary of War, after the treaty, he said that, while in the country, he ascertained "there was an error in the map" in his possession "in relation to the location of a small lake that determined the course of one of the boundary lines," the correction of which would probably increase the number of acres "to about four millions." He further says, that "the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon the evidence now in his possession, estimates the tract as having contained at the time of the treaty, five millions. 'Estimates,' mark you. Not that it is surveyed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I can give the Senator from South Carolina the basis on which the Land Office made the estimate. It was from an estimate made under the inspection or by the measurement of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the authority of the Land Office. In making out a map, the Corps of Topographical Engineers estimated the amount between certain boundaries, and those boundaries were afterwards ascertained to be true, and that amount shows a slight excess over five millions of acres in the country. The discrepancy arises in this way: there was a particular lake which governed one of the boundaries of the country. The situation of this lake was laid down incorrectly in the map which governed the decision of the Attorney General. They found that that lake was one or two hundred miles further off than was at first supposed, varying the amount of land by that much, and embracing in all, an excess of two millions of acres. The map which has been recently made out, properly locates this lake, which governs the Wisconsin boundary, and thus we have five millions of acres, according to the estimate made by the Corps of Topographical Engineers.

I believe, Mr. President, that I have now stated the entire history of this claim. It consists of the fact that there was an official document made out under the inspection and by the advice of an officer of the Government; that by that map the Indians were represented as owning 3,000,000 acres; that in consequence of a mistake in one of their boundaries, we took, by treaties made in general terms, all their lands, and swept away from them about 2,000,000 acres more than they thought they were selling at the time. This, therefore, as it seems to me, constitutes a just and equitable claim on the Government in their behalf for this excess; and in placing it upon this principle, and allowing for that excess, I have allowed at the same rate for this excess as the price would be per acre by paying for 3,000,000 acres the sum of $350,000. That is the position of the matter, and the ground on which I place it.

One word more, and I have done. It was thought by my colleagues on the Committee on Indian Affairs, who investigated this claim, that the time had not arrived to do justice to these Indians; that the whole appropriation was premature; and that the fact that they had not yet removed to their new home was sufficient to show that we ought not to settle the claim, or make the appropriation, until a home was provided for them. That state of affairs leads me to a precisely opposite conclusion from that to which the worthy chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs was brought. I think that the allowance should be given for the very purpose of removing that difficulty. It is true that the country assigned to them is found to be inhospitable in climate; and worse than that, it was in the neighborhood of their implacable enemies, with whom they would be exposed to be in an eternal state of warfare. They chose, therefore, to remain upon the land which they had ceded, in the State of Wisconsin. Whether this desire of theirs will be granted, it remains for the Legislature of Wisconsin to determine. But how is a country to be obtained for a home for them, and how are their removal and subsistence to be provided for except out of this appropriation which the other branch of Congress have been disposed to grant?

This is what I provide for. My amendment provides for procuring them a home, and for their removal, and subsistence for twelve months. It provides that the balance shall not be paid until these contingencies are met; and it seems to me, that the amendment obviates all the difficulties to which the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs have referred. It only provides for the payment of the money when all these problems have been solved.

As to the time when justice should be done, I think, as a general principle, it is true, that it should be done as soon as we are satisfied that it is due, and that it ought to be performed at all. This is no old and stale claim revived from the musty archives of the Government, for the benefit of heartless agents, or to satisfy the cupidity of speculators; nor is it one of that class which has arisen from an attempt to overreach the Indians, and impose a hard bargain upon them. This is not an old claim, but one which has been closely followed up in different forms, from the first. Immediately after the treaty was ratified, the Indians sent delegates on here in order to correct it; but they were unsuccessful, as the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has told us. They have never lost sight of the claim. When the claim first appeared, it was not for the justice of Congress, but against the whole effect of the treaty, which they alleged was a fraudulent one; but they were unable to substantiate the fraud by evidence. The subsequent claim has been placed on the ground of a palpable mistake, and on that ground I think that we ought to make the allowance.

This is a claim in which I have little interest, and with regard to which I have no feeling at all; and in expressing these views, I have only attempted to show what were the views of the friends of this claim in the other House. I leave it for other gentlemen to dispose of as they see fit.

Mr. WALKER. I in part represent the State in which these Indians reside, and in which this money, if paid to the Indians, will probably be expended. It might be inferred, therefore, that I should be one of the most zealous friends of this item in the appropriation bill; but I entirely concur with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in the sentiments they expressed. I think the item ought to be stricken out of the bill. That we acquired more lands from the Menomonees by the treaty than was contemplated by this Government at the time, I have very little doubt; but I am not aware that in the negotiation with these Indians, or with any other of the tribes, we have been at all times particular to ascertain the precise number of acres, and then pay the Indians per acre for what they concede. We know that the lands purchased from the Indians, generally, are in an unsurveyed district of country; and that to arrive at a lumping bargain it is usual to make an estimate of the quantity contained within the tract. In this case the estimate was too low, and there is an excess over the quantity supposed to have been purchased, thus entitling the Indians to some allowance.

I concur with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in the opinion that this is not only an improper time to make this appropriation, but that the manner of this proposed appropriation is also improper. I object to the appropriation being made at this time, and also to its being made in gross; and it occurs to me, as it may have occurred to other Senators, that the lips of the chairman of the Committee on Finance have given utterance to one reason which ought to determine us against it, and that is: Some person has, at one plunge, at one grab, secured one third of the whole amount which these Indians may get, either at this time or hereafter! And it seems to me that is not all; but that a member of one branch of the Government is also to pocket $30,000 out of this appropriation, if it should pass. That has been intimated to me, and I heard it in such a manner that I think it may be fully proved.

A SENATOR. To what branch of the Government does that person belong?

Mr. WALKER. To the legislative branch.

That there is a secret, lurking desire to cast censure on the once commissioner, Mr. Medill, is to my mind self-evident. So long ago as 1842, when that gentleman was in the House of Representatives, he had occasion to make a speech, in which he visited a certain other person who has been high in authority in Wisconsin, with charges of the most flagrant crimes. That those charges have never, to this day, been answered is true. That they were well made I believe, and the community believes, because they were not answered. That that individual, therefore, secretly treasured up in his heart the determination to have revenge, I believe. The time has arrived. As soon as this treaty was made, there came forth charges of fraud against Mr. Medill, and they have been pressed zealously ever since. Although the present Commissioner states that there is no proof of fraud, this appropriation is sought for; and not only is there thus to be a triumph over Mr. Medill, but some of those who make the charges of villainy and avarice against him, are to pocket $30,000 out of the money of the Indians.

What do you propose to accomplish for the Indians by making this appropriation at this time? It is very evident that you are about to fill the pockets of others. But do you place in the hands of the Indians anything that will be available even as a temporary benefit? Would not the grant of this money be an injury to them? They are now living in the midst of the white population; the Government formerly assigned to them a home, a distant one it is true, west of the Mississippi; they visited it, and found that it was a country where they would be starved to death, or where those who escaped starvation would be killed by the Sioux, by the Chippewas, or by the Winnebagoes.

They shrunk back to Wisconsin, for starvation or death by the tomahawk were all that awaited them in that country, and they are now located in the midst of the whites; where the Maine liquor law does not extend, but where they can obtain as much liquor as they desire. If this appropriation shall be made, drunkenness, dissipation, and death will prevail among those unfortunate people, and what they do not spend in that way, they will be swindled out of; the money will be gone before they have proceeded a mile from the place where it has been placed in their hands, or tied up in the corners of their blankets.

Is this the way to treat these Indians? They are now in a country where they can exist, at least. Will you furnish them with this money which will do them no good? You will not only do them no good, but by giving it to them, you will inflict a positive injury.

When the time comes for their removal—and I am sure that the Legislature of Wisconsin will not consent that they shall remain in that State—it will be proper for the Government of the United States to look at the condition of these Indians, and consider the treaty they made, and how hard that treaty is; and to consider the means of giving them a home, and of providing them temporarily with the means of subsistence, until they are able to provide for their own maintenance. Such a course would be statesmanlike, just, and honest; but how often is it, when you make a treaty with the Indians, that any claims they may have against the Government are suppressed? In all probability until some secret agent, the enemy of his country, and the enemy of the Indians alike, has dug it up and exposed it, and then, after he obtains an assignment of the claim, we pay, not the Indians, but this agent for having extracted it from the Government. I am opposed to this course altogether, and I do hope and trust that the appropriation will be stricken out of the bill.

I am equally opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,] because, as I have already said, we do not know what to do with the Indians. Suppose you adopt the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas, what will you do with them? Does his proposition suppose that the President shall explore and survey a country for them? Not at all. It is not an appropriation for any such purpose.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I think the Senator from Wisconsin misunderstands the object of my amendment. It does provide for and make the payment of this allowance to the Indians, subject to the procuring of a new home for them, as well as to pay the expense of their removal, and the cost of their subsistence for twelve months afterwards. I embraced these objects in my amendment, because I believe it was stipulated by the treaty of 1848, and is an ordinary stipulation, which is found in all our treaties with Indians which relate to their lands. It will be recollected that by the treaty of 1848, we assigned to these Menomonee Indians a new territory west of the Mississippi, which they did not like; and now the choice with them is between going to that territory or to some new country, to be assigned to them by the Government of the United States, or their taking a portion of the ceded territory; but in either case they must become a serious charge to the United States. If the State of Wisconsin agrees to allow them to remain there, then I think it would not be going beyond the limits of justice to say that they ought to have as much of their territory restored to them as was taken by this mistake, and for which they were not paid. But, in any case, the purchase of a new country, and the removal and subsistence of these Indians in that country for twelve months, as is proposed by my amendment, is to be paid for out of this surplus, and the balance is not to be paid to them until they have removed from the ceded territory to such country as may be provided.

In regard to the balance itself, I have adopted the provision in the original terms of the bill—that it shall be paid to them in such manner as the President of the United States may direct.

While I am up I will merely say to the Senator from Wisconsin, that if such a disposition of the money as I have proposed does not suit him—if he fears it is to go into other channels than those that will benefit the Indian, you have only to adopt the expedient which has been twice resorted to by the Senate—the paternity of which so justly belongs to the Senator from Wisconsin—which is, that the money shall be paid into the hands of the Indian himself, and to no other person. That is an amendment which I will not offer myself, for I have some doubts as to whether it would work altogether well; but if any other Senator chooses to offer it I will not make any opposition. I know it was agreed upon in the case of the $2,000,000 which were paid to the Creeks, and also in the same amount which was paid to the Cherokees; and the plan has been repeatedly resorted to for the purpose of breaking down the influence of agents, and of uprooting that kind of influence by which many gentlemen suppose the proceedings of Congress have been and may be surrounded. I merely throw out these suggestions, which I think are a sufficient answer to what has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to agents, and the hands into which this money is to go, and the agencies—the corrupt agencies—by which these claims have sometimes been fished up.

Mr. WALKER. The explanation of the Senator does not obviate the difficulty to which I was alluding when I took my seat. Neither the President nor any member of this Government knows what to do with this money. The Indians themselves should be consulted as to where they will go. If they will not go to the home which has been provided for them, it is impossible to determine at present where they will go. They desire to remain temporarily in Wisconsin, and Wisconsin has consented that they may remain there for a short time, and be located in the northern part of the State, I believe; but it is utterly impossible for them to remain there for a very long time. Settlers are now scattered over the whole of the "Menomonee purchase." At this very session we have granted preemption rights to the white people there, of whom there are now twenty thousand. As soon as the settlers advance, the Indians must go. Will the Senator tell me where he proposes to locate them, even with all this money which it is proposed to appropriate? No, sir. If he asks the Indians, can they take him where they will go? No, sir. Would he appropriate this money before this Government or the Indians know what to do with it? It seems to me it is trifling to think of such a thing. What is the amendment of the Senator? It is to pay, instead of the sum of $221,840, which the House have put in the bill, the sum of $600,000.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. With the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will state that I think his reckoning is entirely wrong. I made a calculation of the sum which it would be required to pay according to the conditions of my amendment, and the conclusion to which I came was, that it would make but a few thousand dollars more; not more than $4,000 or $5,000 more. I thought the amount was so small, that it would be better to take that sum than make an arbitrary allowance. My proposition is to pay them for the additional 2,000,000 acres at the rate of eleven and a half cents an acre. The amount is easily determined.

Mr. WALKER. That is not what is argued, nor what I believe will be the effect of the amendment. If you give the same price which was paid for the land which has been purchased from the Indians, you will have to pay according to the rate which is demanded for the whole land, which is eighteen and nine tenths cents per acre. I have calculated the amount upon 5,000,000 acres—

Mr. BELL. It amounts to $400,000.

Mr. WALKER. I made my calculation on the supposition that we were to pay nineteen cents per acre for 5,000,000 acres, which amounts to $950,000; I then make a deduction of the sum paid under the treaty, which was $350,000, and that leaves the sum to be paid $600,000. The Senator from Arkansas proposes to pay only eleven and a half cents per acre. But besides that, it is subjected to the manifest objection of the assignments which have been made of this claim, by the Indians.

Now, sir, when it is made, let it be ascertained where the Indians are to go, and let Congress appropriate so much money as is necessary to buy them a home, if a new home is to be provided. If we have land, they should be content if we give them land and charge them for it. Then what will be necessary to remove them, appropriate for that purpose, together with what will be necessary to furnish them with necessary blacksmithing, and to provide the means to keep them from famine until they can be established in a new home? How do you know what to do with them now? If you appropriate the money now, how do you know what will become of it? One third of it will go into the hands of agents, and then the rest will be drawn by—I will not say whom. That is what will become of it; and who else is to have a "finger in the pie" I do not know. But so long as it can be ascertained that it will be necessary to locate them in their new home, just so long as the money now paid will support them they will pay it out till it is all gone, and none of it will benefit the poor Indians. The poor Indians? Why it is the cormorant agents who surround this Capitol who will get it, who give us more trouble than all the Indians would with arms in their hands!

Sir, if you were to propose to appropriate ten millions, to be expended in Wisconsin among the citizens of my own State, I should oppose it, if given upon this plan, when I know that the benefit is to redound to those who have done nothing but cheat the Indians. It is entirely useless; it is worse than useless; it is injurious; and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Finance will succeed in his proposition to strike out the appropriation.

I do not know to what extent my colleague concurs with me. I should be glad to have his concurrence, and to hear his views upon this matter. But whatever those views may be, I am opposed to this appropriation. I hope it may be stricken out, and that the rights of the Indians may be guarded; and whenever it is necessary that the patronage of the Government should be extended to them, it may be done. I hope that when we extend our hand to them, and say, "Take the fish," they may not find, when they seize upon it, that it is a stone.

Mr. BELL. I believe the Senate are ready for the question. I merely wish to say, that in common with the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I have looked a little into this claim, and I concur, in the main, in the views expressed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] with regard to the policy of going back and overhauling this treaty to discover whether strict and adequate justice was done to these Indians. Nevertheless, I see in the condition of the Menomonees something which will force itself on the sympathy, if not on the justice, of Congress, to induce Congress at some time to make an additional appropriation for their final settlement.

I do not believe that if we were to make this appropriation, and if it could be the last appropriation that would be made for any of these considerations, we should lose anything; for I think that Congress will have to make an appropriation or a donation for the relief of these Indians. They are now in Wisconsin, but are not entitled to a foot of land which they can claim as their own. They have been permitted by the Legislature of the State and by the President of the United States, to remain where they are for the present; but that permission is merely temporary. In accordance with the terms of the treaty of 1848, six hundred thousand acres of land were provided for them. They have explored that country, and pronounced it to be unsuitable to them. For many reasons they declined going there, and the Government has not insisted that they should occupy the lands which were assigned to them. A considerable difficulty will arise when ever you come to remove them, as to the place where they are to be located.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] has stated that the Legislature will never permit them to form a permanent residence within the limits of that State. I have heard it suggested, on the other hand, that they probably would be permitted to remain. If the Senator from Wisconsin is correct in his supposition, then it is a subject which should be looked to by the executive branch of the Government. I would be glad if the Senator from Wisconsin would point out a district of country which would be suitable for the location of these Indians.

Mr. WALKER. That is just where I despair, and where the Government ought to despair, and where the Senate must despair; and, therefore, I consider this appropriation useless for the present. It should not be made until some place shall have been determined on.

Mr. BELL. My opinion is that there will be great difficulty, unless the two Houses of Congress, and those who take an interest in the northwestern country, will agree that a portion of the territory which we acquired from the Sioux should be appropriated to these Menomonees. Unless we agree that they shall have a location in the southern portion of the Minnesota Territory, I know of no country suitable to their condition to which these Indians can be removed. I have thought a little on this subject. I have examined the map, and ruminated on the condition of that country generally. You cannot force them further west, because you will at once place them amongst powerful and hostile tribes; and unless you give them a location in the southern part of the Territory of Minnesota, I cannot see where they are to go. They will be without a home; the authorities of the State of Wisconsin will not allow them to remain, and yet I do think that every consideration of ordinary sympathy, and the necessity of giving protection and guardianship to these poor creatures, does call upon the State of Wisconsin, if they have a territory they can spare, to allow them to rest within their borders.

Mr. WALKER. I was not arguing a question of morals, or of what ought or what ought not to excite sympathy; but I was speaking of the fact that Wisconsin has no country to which the whites will not advance, and hence it will be unwise to give these Indians any portion of the country there for their permanent location.

Mr. BELL. I do not know how it would be unwise, nor is it for me to say what the State of Wisconsin will do, or what generosity or humanity the people of that State will finally exhibit towards these Indians; but here is the dilemma—where are the Indians to go? They are two thousand, or two thousand five hundred in number; they are partially civilized; they live neither by the chase nor by plunder, and if you drive them away, where will you send them to? You cannot send them among the wild men of the far West. It therefore becomes a serious question, and I hope the State of Wisconsin will assign them some portion of that country, so that they may remain in that territory. I know that the people of the State of Wisconsin are generous in their sympathies; and so, indeed, are the people of the United States everywhere—the people of the Northwest as well as the people of other portions of the Union. That, however, is a question which we cannot settle here.

The Senator from Wisconsin has said, and perhaps properly, that we cannot settle the question of morality and sympathy here. No doubt the Senator thinks the people of his State will not do so, but I trust they will; for in their present condition these Indians must become a source of great annoyance to the inhabitants of Wisconsin. If that State would assign to them a hundred thousand acres, or fifty thousand acres, it would do not only an act of common humanity and generosity, but it would aid that part of the country generally in getting rid of a great difficulty. But this may be said to be aside from the question.

But whatever money you propose to give upon principles of generosity or liberality, or, if you please, on the ground of an injustice done through a mistake in the treaty of 1848, it should be reserved to a time when they and we can know where they will go and have a permanent home. The paying of a small amount, to enable them to remove to a portion of Wisconsin, would be only a temporary expedient, as the difficulties that now exist with regard to the settlements in the Northwest will accumulate every year. It is a question which requires the careful consideration of the Government. I foresee that. I hope they will have a portion of the territory assigned them in Wisconsin. If the State of Wisconsin will consent to that, then it will be time for the Congress of the United States to step forward and show their generosity, or justice, if you please, by giving further compensation for lands which we have acquired by the treaty of 1848.

From the examination which I have given to this question, I see no ground for further compensation upon principles of strict justice. I should like to know from the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,] where he obtains his evidence of a distinct definitive boundary of the Menomonee country. The treaty of 1848 cedes all the lands to which they had any claim. They never had any separate and distinct boundary to their lands, so far as I understand the history of that tribe. The treaty of 1831 specifies a boundary "claimed" by the Menomonee Indians; it is true. But what is the fact with regard to the claim made by these Indians? We have had to extinguish the title of the Sioux, the Chippewas, and the Winnebagoes, to portions of this very Menomonee country. The claims of many other tribes have been extinguished to large portions of this very territory, by three or four distinct treaties. There never was a time when the Menomonees could claim a boundary free from the adverse claims of the Sioux, the Chippewas, or the Winnebagoes, to certain parts of it.

I do not mean to go into a detailed statement of this subject. I admit that whether there is justice in the claim or not, we shall find ourselves in a situation in which we shall be compelled to make some further compensation to the Indians on some ground or other; but now is not the time. I think this clause ought to be stricken out.

Mr. CASS. I have listened to this discussion with a good deal of interest, with a view to make up my own mind in regard to it, and the conclusion to which I have come is this: I am clearly of opinion that something should be done for these Indians, but I am very much in doubt as to what should be done. For myself, I must say that I have not facts enough before me to enable me to come to an ultimate decision in that respect.

The treaty between the United States and the Menomonees, by which the latter ceded their lands, provides that they should cede all their lands to the United States, and the United States gives them another country containing six hundred thousand acres, in a territory which was ceded to the United States by the Chippewas. I do not know where it is; but I suppose north and west of Wisconsin. Does it extend to the wet, marshy country on Lake Superior?

Mr. WALKER. I believe it is beyond the Mississippi, on the Crow-Wing river.

Mr. CASS. It is said that there is not a sufficient quantity of good land within that boundary to support the Menomonees. That we do not know. The Menomonees were to remove to it within two years.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe I can furnish the Senator from Michigan with the information he requires. Does he wish to know what we propose to do with the tribe?

Mr. CASS. I merely wished to know what the character of the country is. The treaty stipulation in regard to the removal of the Indians from Wisconsin is clear; it says that they may remain two years within the State, and even longer if the President gives no notice.

There is a singular provision in one article of the treaty; it is, that they may go and examine the country which was set apart for them, and yet by that very treaty they were not allowed to refuse to remove there. We guarantied to them by treaty the possession of this territory which they decline to accept; but we should know something about the nature of that country, and whether it is capable of supporting these Indians before we think of providing another country for them. I would ask the Senator from Virginia whether this country is capable of supporting them?

Mr. HUNTER. I can answer the Senator from Michigan, if he will allow me. The country is not suitable to the taste of these Indians. In all probability it is capable of supporting them; but one great difficulty is that it throws them into contiguity with powerful hostile tribes. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs told me that he thought he could make an arrangement with the last Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, but that he had failed; and that he hoped to succeed with the next Legislature in making an arrangement by which they might be located on the Wolf and Oconto rivers. I have an amendment which he recommended, proposing an appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of removing them there temporarily. The necessity of removing them from their present home is, that the people of Wisconsin wish to put this land into market.

Mr. CASS. Then, if I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the difficulty is not in the nature of the country, but in its contiguity to hostile Indians. I know these Indians well. There is something curious in relation to their history. They have never sought to be engaged in any contest with hostile tribes surrounding them. It is their boast that they have never killed a white man. They were never hostile to us. Although they have been living in contiguity with the Winnebagoes, and the Chippewas, and the Sacs and Foxes, and other tribes ever since the French owned that country, I venture the assertion, on my firm belief, that they never took a scalp. I have not the remotest idea that if you transfer them to a point west of the Mississippi, to which the Sacs and Foxes are contiguous, one drop of blood will be shed in consequence. Twenty years ago, I descended the Mississippi river with a party of Chippewas who had been in a state of war with the Sioux. After going down the river some five hundred miles we approached the Sioux and Buffalo country, and they became alarmed. They landed and saw the foot-prints of the Sioux, and found some hieroglyphical marks on the bark of a birch-tree, which had been put there to show that the Sioux had been there, describing the number of the parties, and what they had done, which was to them all as clear as daylight from these hieroglyphical marks. The flag of the United States was there, and I told them there was no danger.

We went down the Mississippi as easily as we would now go down the Ohio. There was no danger, and my opinion is, that a small force of the United States sent into that country with them would obviate all difficulty. But still I would not force them to go there if the country is not suitable for them, for they are the best and most peaceable Indians that are to be found in any part of the country. They have subsisted very much upon the wild rice, and hence have been called the Wild-rice Indians. They gather immense quantities of it in their canoes, in the fall, from the lakes, where it remains during the winter. And beneficent it is in nature, to give them this means of subsistence, which sows itself, so that they are not even under the necessity of preserving grain for seed; for the Indians generally, will very often eat up their seed grain when they have it, and they would eat up this if they could.

There is one thing that I beg Senators to consider. We are parties, judges, and executioners in this case, and therefore it becomes us, in the position we occupy before the country and the world, to deal, not with strict justice as between white man and white man, but liberally and generously. Let me tell you there is not a Menomonee, there is not an Indian from one end of the country to the other, that knows the difference between 1,000,000 of acres and 5,000,000; they have not the slightest conception of it. You undertake to bound any country by miles, and they know nothing at all about it; but all you can do is, to name certain places with which they are acquainted, and tell them that those places are the limits of which you speak, and they will understand you; but whether that country contains 1,000,000 or 5,000,000 of acres, they have no conception.

One thing with regard to Colonel Medill. I have not the slightest idea that he ever intended any fraud or the least wrong in the treaty that he made. Probably there is more land than was supposed. Colonel Medill specified that the Indians should have a certain sum. They estimated the land at so much, and he said he would give so much for it. The Indians could not know anything more about the transaction, if limited to a certain number of millions of acres, than if it had been in Chinese. We had it our own way, and the signature of these Indians made to the treaty should no more preclude them from having justice done than if they were blind on that point. If we assumed that there were three millions of acres, and we agreed to pay so much per acre, and it turns out that there were four millions of acres, we are bound, upon every principle of justice, to make up the difference, and not say we bought three millions, so and so, and it turns out that there are four or five millions. I repeat, that, upon every principle of justice, we should do what is right, whatever may have been the treaty.

I have great doubts about the propriety of paying them $250,000 as proposed, either individually or collectively. I do not believe that it would do them any good. I would much prefer that we should provide a country for them, in which they can live. They do not raise any large quantity of agricultural products; nor do they hunt. They are rather disposed to live on a few vegetables, and the wild rice. The country they occupy is not a hunting country, nor are they capable of hanging on to the chase like the Sioux; and I should wish to send them to such a tract as would induce them to attend to agriculture; a country which they could improve, and such a country we should find for them in the United States, and put them fairly and honorably in possession of it. When the time comes, we should make up any difference to which they may be entitled, and give them every cent of it; but it would be much better to throw this money in the river than to pay it to them now in gross. Provide for them a small sum now; act justly with them; send some person to investigate the actual position of their affairs; or charge the commanding officer, or the Governor of Minnesota to make an examination, and ascertain whether they are in the slightest danger from the interference of the Sioux; and if there should be any danger, let the Government step between them and the Sioux. I repeat that I think it would be better to take this course, reserving to ourselves such action as circumstances may render necessary.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. In order that the amendment may be put in proper parliamentary shape, I have modified it so as to strike out the words "$221,840; the same to be paid in such sums, and 'at such time, with the approbation of said nation, 'as the President may think most conducive to 'their prosperity and happiness,' and insert, in lieu of it, the following:

For the excess of land actually added, over the quantity owned by them, as ascertained by the official opinion of the Attorney General, at the same rate as that paid for said territory, assuming the quantity as that fixed in said opinion, may be allowed in the discretion of the President: Provided, That the same shall be subject, after all necessary deductions, for expenses of procuring a new home, removal thereto, and subsistence for twelve months thereafter: And provided further, That the balance shall not be paid until after such removal, and then in such manner as the President may direct.

So that the same clause may read:

"For additional compensation for the sale of their lands in the State of Wisconsin, by the treaty of October 18th, 1848, for the excess of land actually added, over the quantity owned by them, as ascertained by the official opinion of the Attorney General, at the same rate as that paid for said territory, assuming the quantity as that fixed in said opinion, may be allowed in the discretion of the President: Provided, That the same shall be subject, after all necessary deductions, for expenses of procuring a new home, removal thereto, and subsistence for twelve months thereafter: And provided further, That the balance shall not be paid until after such removal, and then in such manner as the President may direct."

Mr. HUNTER. This amendment, I think, is premature, and will hardly accomplish the object that was designed. It certainly would throw these allowances of money into the hands of the agent, as it seems to me. But I propose, if the Senate should strike out the provision in the bill, as recommended by the Committee on Finance, to move to insert the following provision:

For expenses of their removal from their present location to the district of country on the Wolf and Oconto rivers, designated in the report of Superintendent Murray to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated September 30th, 1851, $25,000.

This is an amendment drawn up at the Indian department, and suggested by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and is designed to meet this state of things. These lands are about to be offered for sale. The whites will go in among the Indians and disturb them, and thus lead to collision, which it is desirable to avoid. The district of country here designated belongs to the United States. The Indians are willing to go to it. The Commissioner says there is a very great sympathy felt for them among the people of Wisconsin, and he supposes, from what he can learn, it will be agreeable to those people that the Indians should be located in this way, and we can provide for them temporarily until it shall be ascertained to what other place it will be best to remove them. The Indians are dissatisfied with the country set apart for them by the treaty of 1848. The Indian department hopes to be able, when it shall have had time to look around, to make some more suitable provision for them; and this is designed for a temporary resting place, and for a permanent settlement, if the Legislature of Wisconsin shall agree to that.

It seems to me that it will be enough to do this now. We cannot know what it may be necessary to appropriate to obtain a permanent home for them, because we cannot know where it may be located. Whenever that is ascertained, I shall be willing to vote—not upon the idea of paying them for their lands—what may be necessary to secure to them a suitable and proper home, one which they can enjoy—where they may live in peace and happiness; but where that may be we cannot tell until the case is investigated—until further examination is made into the countries open for Indian settlements and the peculiar wants of these people. Therefore I think it will be better to strike out this appropriation and insert the amendment which is suggested by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and which I shall offer if the Senate will agree with the Committee on Finance in striking out this appropriation.

Mr. CASS. I would ask the Senator where is the country to which he proposes to remove the Indians? Is it in Wisconsin?

Mr. HUNTER. It is.

Mr. CASS. I think there can be no difficulty in saying that the Legislature of Wisconsin, and of all of the northwestern States, will not consent to a permanent residence of any band of Indians among them. They would not drive them away from lands which they now occupy; but I do not believe they would suffer any band of Indians to settle permanently upon a new tract.

Mr. HUNTER. This is not proposed as a permanent arrangement, unless the Legislature shall say that it is to be permanent. It is intended merely as a temporary arrangement. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs tells me that he believes it to be the wish of the people of Wisconsin to have them settle there.

Mr. CASS. If it is to be a temporary arrangement I have no objection.

Mr. ATCHISON. Does the Senator propose to locate them on the Fox river?

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir, but on the Wolf and Oconto rivers, on territory which forms a part, I believe, of their cession.

Mr. CASS. I would ask the Senator one other question. I did not hear the terms of his proposition; and what I wish to know is, whether it would allow provisions to be issued to the Indians to supply their necessities?

Mr. HUNTER. The phrase which I use is: "For expenses of their removal." I suppose that $25,000 will be enough to provide for those expenses, including the issuing of provisions. It was my design to include provisions.

Mr. CASS. It would be a very dangerous experiment to remove the Indians, and set them down in the wilderness, without any provision for their support. Therefore, I wish some provision made for them. I have my doubts as to whether the sum proposed to be appropriated by the Senator from Virginia, will be sufficient.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Finance—as there appears to be some difference as to what the Commissioner on Indian Affairs has recommended—whether the amendment which he proposes now to submit, as he says upon the recommendation of the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, is in lieu of the appropriation which came from the House, and which was also recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs? The very appropriation which we have been discussing was recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who made a very elaborate report after a careful investigation of the subject. Now, here is another amendment not embraced in the original bill, proposed to be offered by the Senator from Virginia; and I wish to know, whether it is supposed by the Commissioner that this temporary provision is to be in lieu, and to obviate the necessity of the provision which came from the House?

Mr. HUNTER. The amendment was drawn up to meet the case of this appropriation being stricken out. I did not understand the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as withdrawing his original recommendation. But, if the Senate should strike out the provision appropriating $220,000, then he recommends that this other provision should be made. And I certainly understood that, if it was made, it would enable them to get along until next session very peaceably and comfortably.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was not agreed to.

The amendment of the committee to strike out the clause was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I now offer the following amendment:

For expenses of their removal, and provisions, from their present location to the district of country on the Wolf and Oconto rivers, designated in the report of Superintendent Murray, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated September 31, 1851, $25,000.

Mr. WELLER. I think that amendment had better specify on its face that it is for the temporary removal of the Indians; and I think also that it is proper that it should contain a provision making it dependent upon the Legislature of Wisconsin assenting to it. I do not think it is proper that we should go into any of the sovereign States of this Union, and undertake to remove the Indians from one portion of the State to another without the consent of the local authorities. But as this amendment is now drawn up it might admit the construction that we intended that the Indians should reside there permanently. It would be better to insert the amendment I have suggested for the purpose of rebutting that presumption.

Mr. HUNTER. I am perfectly willing to insert the word "temporary;" but it cannot be necessary to have the consent of the Legislature of Wisconsin to the temporary removal of the Indians. It is proposed to remove them to Government lands which have never been offered for sale.

Mr. WELLER. If the lands belong to the Government, I suppose there can be no doubt as to the authority of the Federal Government to place the Indians there.

Mr. HUNTER. I modify the amendment by inserting the word "temporary" before the word "removal." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. It is the opinion of many Senators, with whom I concur, that we should have an Executive session to-day. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 29, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion to lay upon the table House bill No. 290, "granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa Railroad, commencing at the village of Pontiac, in the county of Oakland, and terminating on the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, in the county of Ottawa."

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

TOWN OF BELLEVUE.

Mr. CLARK. I should be gratified if the House would allow me to take up a bill, the object of which I can state in one minute by the clock. The Government laid off several towns in the State of Iowa, amongst others Bellevue, and reserved in each section a small strip of land from sale and occupation except as a common. The citizens of that town desire that that strip of land should be relinquished to them in order that they may control it for public purposes, for putting up warehouses for the storage of wheat and other products. There is but one section in the bill, and it can be read in one minute.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it comes out of the morning hour I do not care.

Mr. CLARK. I will not take more than a minute's time.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I wish to know if it will come out of the morning hour. If so, I object.

Mr. CLARK. I desire that it shall not come out of the morning hour.

Mr. CABELL. I have no objection, then.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to it.

Mr. CLARK. It will not take one minute to read the bill. The people there are waiting, and anxious for its passage, and I hope that the gentleman will withdraw his objection. It can be passed while we are talking about it.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will include it in the morning hour I will not object.

OAKLAND AND OTTAWA RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The objection is not withdrawn, and the question now is upon laying bill No. 290 upon the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. STUART. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was then called, and 129 members answered to their names.

On motion by Mr. STUART, all further proceedings under the call were then dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion to lay the bill upon the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 63, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, William Appleton, Bartlett, Beale, John H. Boyd, Burrows, Caldwell, Caskie, Chaistain, Cleveland, Daniel, Dawson, Dimmick, Dockery, Dunan, Dunham, Edmundson, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Goodenow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hascall, Hebard, Hibbard, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Millson, Morehead, Murphy, Newton, Perkins, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Savage, Schermerhorn, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stratton, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, and Wildrick—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, Barrere, Bell, Bragg, Brenton, Brooks, George H. Brown, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Evans, Picklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howard, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Miller, Molony, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Pennington, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Robinson, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Scurry, D. L. Seymour, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Thurston, Townshend, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Williams—82.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. STUART. The question, as I understand, is now upon the engrossment of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the previous question was demanded.

Mr. STUART. It was demanded, but not seconded. I made the motion for the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I appeal to the gentleman before he moves the previous question, to allow me to offer an amendment. I desire that it should be read. I will then vote for the previous question, and for the bill, if my amendment be adopted. The amendment is very short, and I hope that the gentleman may consent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] to yield me the floor to offer an amendment.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that both amendments will be allowed to be offered. Let the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] come in first, and mine follow.

Mr. STUART. I propose to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and I yield the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit the amendment which I asked leave to offer.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] to allow my amendment to be added at the end of his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask for the reading of my amendment, and I will say also to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that I have no objection to the reading of his amendment, if he desires it, but I cannot consent to its being offered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that my amendment may be admitted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have the floor and I shall be compelled to occupy it, as I have some remarks to make. I regret to refuse anything to the gentleman from North Carolina, but when I shall have expressed some views upon the propriety of the amendment which I have submitted, I shall be compelled to call the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman hear my amendment? It is a very short one—but a single sentence.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will permit the gentleman to make a motion in reference to the reading of his amendment, if I am at liberty to do so.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] will be first read.

The amendment was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That to aid in the construction of the railroads hereinafter mentioned, there shall be, and hereby is, granted to the respective States hereinafter named, for the aforesaid purposes, and no other whatsoever, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for six sections in width on each side of said roads; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of the said roads are definitely fixed by the authorities aforesaid, sold any part of any section hereby granted, or that the right of preemption has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by the Governors of said States, respectively, to select from the lands of the United States most contiguous to the tier of sections above specified, so much land in alternate sections, or parts of sections, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, or to which the right of preemption has attached as aforesaid, which lands, being equal in quantity to one half of six sections in width on each side of said roads, the States aforesaid, respectively, shall have and hold to and keep for the use and purposes aforesaid, and for no other purposes. And the sections and parts of sections of land which, by such grant, shall remain to the United States within six miles on each side of said roads, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold. And that all the rights, privileges, and liabilities herein conferred on the State of Michigan in the provisions of this act, in relation to the use by the United States of the said railroads for the transporting the property, troops, and mails of the United States, the time for completing the said roads, and the modes of applying the avails of the public lands for the construction of the roads, shall be and hereby are adopted in relation to all the States and railroads, respectively, hereinafter named, in as full and ample manner as though specially enacted in relation to each of the same, to wit:

And also, to the States of Florida and Alabama, for a railroad from a point on Pensacola Bay, in Florida, by Montgomery, to Talladega, in Alabama, with branches from said road, to the waters of Mobile Bay or Tensaw river, and to a point on the Chattahoochee river—the route of said road and branches to be designated by the authorities of said States, respectively.

And the routes of the said roads and branches shall be on the most direct and feasible lines between the places named for their commencement and termination; and in all cases where the said routes, or either of them, are not now located and determined, the proper authority of each State, respectively, through which said roads, or parts thereof, run, or to which the preceding grants are made, shall determine the same. And all mineral lands, excepting those subject by law to private entry, are hereby expressly reserved to the United States from the lands hereby granted.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now offer my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot consent to allow the amendment of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] to be offered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman to allow it to be read.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask permission to read the amendment myself. It is very short.

Mr. JOHNSON. I must decline it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope, then, that the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to know whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] is in order? If I understand it, these very propositions which are embraced in this omnibus, have been passed upon by the House at a former period of the session. Many of them, if not most of them, have been in separate bills. The point of order I raise is this: that the House has decided upon these separate bills and refused to pass them, and it is not in order to embrace them in this omnibus, and present them as an amendment to the bill now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.] The amendment is not in and of itself any of the bills that have been or are before this body, and therefore is not out of order upon that ground.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order, and it is this: that it is not in order to ingraft a general bill upon a special case; and the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas being a bill general in its character, is not germane to the original bill, which provides for a special object. They have no connection whatever.

The SPEAKER. The original bill proposes to grant certain benefits to the State of Michigan; the amendment proposes to grant precisely similar benefits to other States. Whilst the Chair is not very clear that the policy is good, or that the objection might not originally be at least plausible, still in conformity with the decisions which the present occupant of the chair has made, and with decisions made by others before him, the Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SKELTON. From that decision of the Chair I appeal; and I ask for the yeas and nays upon the appeal.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TUCK. I call for the reading of the 55th rule.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"55. No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the decision of this House, made upon the 1st day of April, 1850, may be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object.

Mr. ORR. Is this matter debatable? Has not a motion been made to lay the appeal upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. ORR. Then I object to any discussion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Gentlemen do not want light.

The SPEAKER. All debate is out of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I take it to be in order at this stage, to move to lay the whole subject on the table; and I make that motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That motion is not in order pending the question on the appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is a question of order before the House which must first be decided.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from North Carolina would control the whole matter. The decision of the Chair will be ineffectual certainly, if the House decides that the whole subject shall lie upon the table. Both are privileged questions; but the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina covers the whole ground, and, in the opinion of the Chair, is in order.

Mr. STUART. If this decision be right, it would be out of the power of the House—[Loud cries of "Order!"] If a motion is now in order to lay the whole subject upon the table, I ask the Chair if a question of order on an appeal could ever be determined by the House?

The SPEAKER. Nor would there be any necessity that it should be determined.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. CLINGMAN's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Babcock, Bartlett, Beale, Bell, Bibb, Bingham, Bovee, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brooks, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Curtis, Daniel, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Duncan, Durham, Edmundson, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Hamilton, Isham G. Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McMillin, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Perkins, Polk, Robbins, Robt, Robinson, Ross, Savage, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Stone, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, and Wildrick—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, Barrere, Bissell, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, E. Carington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Conger, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Henn, Houston, Howard, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Miller, Molony, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Penniman, Phelps, Porter, Rantoul, Richardson, Sackett, Scurry, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Walsh, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—62.

So it was ordered that the whole subject lie upon the table.

Great noise and confusion prevailed in the Hall.

Mr. STUART. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and I also move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. CLEVELAND. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. STUART. I have a question of order which I desire to submit to the Chair.

Mr. JONES. My question of order is, that this bill having once been laid upon the table, and that vote reconsidered, it is not in order to move a reconsideration of it again.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is a different bill; it has been amended.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is mistaken. There has been no amendment or alteration of the bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. An amendment has been moved, which changes the position of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee will be decided when the bill comes up again. The motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] is now pending, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STUART. I have a question of order which is in advance of all these, if I can get the ear of the Chair to state it. I made a motion to reconsider the vote, and I also moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that that is the question which must first be put.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir; but I had a right to submit those two motions, and I submitted them before the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that that is the history of the matter. It had escaped the attention of the Chair.

Mr. STUART. I say that I have a right to have my motion submitted.

The SPEAKER. Certainly, but the right of the gentleman from Connecticut to move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table is very clear.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman from Connecticut never was recognized.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Yes, sir, I was.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman was not recognized by the Chair.

[Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!" and great confusion.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the question. A motion was made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. The Chair states, however, that when this subject is reached again, the gentleman from Connecticut will have a right to make the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to submit a question of order to the Chair. I know it is the custom here for gentlemen to move the reconsideration of a vote, and to make another motion to lay that upon the table, those motions both relating to the same subject; but the question I wish the Chair to decide, if this is the proper time, is, whether a gentleman can make a motion to reconsider, and then make a motion on an entirely different subject before the first motion is submitted to the House or decided?

The SPEAKER. Being both privileged motions, the Chair thinks that it is in order under the practice of the House.

Mr. JONES. I do not believe there is such a case upon the records of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there are very many in the practice of the body.

Mr. KING, of New York. I ask what has become of the first question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee? [Mr. JONES.]

The SPEAKER. That question will be decided when the motion to reconsider again comes up.

Mr. KING. Then the motion to reconsider has not been entertained. It has only been presented, and the question of order upon it is pending.

The SPEAKER. It is presented, and the point of order will be decided when the subject comes up again.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask for a vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. For the purpose of acting understandingly on this subject, I wish to put a question to the Chair. When a motion is made to reconsider, the House may consent to pass over that motion and go to something else; but the House has not consented to enter the motion to reconsider made by the gentleman from Michigan, and it is still before the House. It is a privileged motion, and any member has a right to call it up for action at any time. But it has not yet passed from under the consideration of the House, and how, then, can the gentleman make another motion upon a separate and distinct subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Michigan has a right to move to reconsider, and his right is also clear to move to suspend the rules to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STUART. The morning hour had expired when I made my motion.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to determine whether they will agree to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CLEVELAND. If the House refuses now to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, will not this subject come up as the first business?

The SPEAKER. It will; and the question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee will then be decided. The Chair does not see that the rights of any gentleman are compromised.

Mr. STUART. The motion to reconsider must go over until the morning hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That is true. It will have to go over to the morning hour, belonging, as it does, to the morning hour.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to propound one interrogatory to the Chair. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] submitted the motion to reconsider, and then moved to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Could he then have called the previous question on it, and then have moved that the House adjourn, before taking his seat, or being recognized by the Chair on any one of those motions?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee appeal from the decision of the Chair? If the gentleman appeals, the Chair will reply, and give a great many examples within his recollection.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the reading of the 56th rule.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I object.

The SPEAKER. Debate is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask a question of the Chair, if it is in order to do so. The Chair has decided that the motion to reconsider belongs to the morning hour, and I desire to know if any member has not a right to insist upon a vote on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. There can be no question about it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I insist upon a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to make a single remark in explanation. Suppose the House determines that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] had not a right, at the time, to make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] insists upon the vote on the motion to reconsider—which it would be his right to do, unless it was superseded by another question privileged in its character—and that is the precise question or proposition made by the gentleman from Michigan—the only thing that could be effected by the gentleman from Tennessee would be to put the gentleman from Michigan down, and to put the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] or some other gentleman up, to make a privileged motion that would take the House from the proposition which he seems desirous to get at. That is the whole history of the matter.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] will withdraw his appeal.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call the attention of the Chair to the 56th rule.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is debate in order now, or is it proper to have a vote upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. An appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair, and that appeal is debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the appeal debatable now? I understood the Chair to decide that it belonged to the morning hour.

Mr. JONES. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw his appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FULLER. I will withdraw the appeal.

Mr. JONES. Now, admitting that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] had the right to make both motions without taking his seat, I submit that the motion to reconsider takes precedence of the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The 56th rule expressly provides that—

"When a motion has been once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof, on the same or the succeeding day; and such motions shall take precedence of all other questions, except the motion to adjourn."

Mr. STUART. But in this case one motion is in the morning hour, and the other is not. That makes a distinction.

Mr. JONES. That makes no difference. A reconsideration is moved. The rule provides that a motion to reconsider shall take precedence of all other motions, except a motion to adjourn; and therefore the motion to reconsider submitted by the gentleman from Michigan must take precedence of the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee answer the Chair one question?

Mr. JONES. I will, if I can.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman will find trouble to answer it satisfactorily to himself.

This appeal, and everything connected with it, belongs to the morning hour, and must go over to the morning hour. If the motion to reconsider be made, the whole debate upon that motion must be confined to the morning hour; and if any gentleman rises in his place and moves to go to the consideration of any other business, it is in order, notwithstanding the motion to reconsider is one of a privileged character. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee agree that this statement is correct?

Mr. JONES. I think it is not exactly correct, because the 56th rule provides that a motion to reconsider shall take precedence of all others, except the motion to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the Chair and the House will allow me, I think I can save some trouble in regard to this matter by making a simple statement to the House. It is evident that the whole difficulty upon this subject has arisen out of the hostility which has been excited on account of the omnibus bill presented by myself this morning. I will now state to the House that I am satisfied entirely by the vote of 100 to 60 upon this omnibus bill, indicating the feeling of the House in regard to that bill this morning. I do not desire to embarrass the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and I will say that, after the immense majority against that omnibus bill this morning, I am satisfied that the proposition cannot prevail; and when the proper time arrives, I pledge myself to withdraw it. I look upon it as killed by that vote.

Mr. HAMILTON. There will be objection to withdrawing that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the appeal from the decision of the Chair to be withdrawn?

Mr. FULLER. I will withdraw the appeal.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw his appeal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. If the House refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, will the motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was laid upon the table, be the first business in order?

The SPEAKER. It will be first in order in the morning hour only.

Mr. HARRIS. But the motion to reconsider, being a privileged motion, is it not competent to call it up at any time? Is it not in order to call it up immediately?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it can only be called up as a privileged motion, connected with and as a part of the business of the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. I think, according to the 56th rule, it may be called up at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CARTTER. I call for a vote upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; we have wasted time enough uselessly in the discussion of this question.

The SPEAKER. No debate upon this question is in order.

The House was divided upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and there were—ayes 78, noes 71.

Mr. FOWLER demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Tennessee, and CLINGMAN were appointed.

The question was again taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 71, noes 86.

So the House refused to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

REPORT ON PRINTING.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask if the first business in order is not now the consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I rise to a privileged question. I move now to take up the motion to reconsider the vote by which this land bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the Chair to answer my inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] moves to call up the report of the Committee on Printing, the consideration of which was postponed till to-day.

Mr. SKELTON. I move to lay the motion upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey cannot make that motion, because the motion to reconsider is not before the House. The Chair decides that both these motions are distinctly privileged motions by the rules of the House. He decided some minutes since that the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was also a privileged question, which would take precedence of a motion to reconsider a vote, which is in itself a privileged question by the rules; and the rules declare that it shall be put if any gentleman desires it, to the exclusion of all other motions. Yet the rules are as positive and distinct that it is in order at any time for the Committee on Printing to report. The power of that committee to report at any time is perfectly clear; and in the opinion of the Chair, that report having been made, and its consideration postponed till to-day, carries with it the right to call up the report for consideration at the time to which its consideration was postponed. The Chair decides therefore that the consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing is the first business in order.

Mr. STANTON. My object is not to call up that report for consideration by the House now, for this reason: the Special Committee on Printing and Joint Committee of the two Houses have held several conferences upon this subject, and have finally agreed upon the provisions of a bill, which they intend to present as a substitute for the bill introduced by the Committee on Printing. My only object in calling it up now is to have it postponed till to-morrow, in order to give time to print it. I move that the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing be postponed till to-morrow morning, and that the report of the special committee be printed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will say to my colleague that the Special Committee on Printing have prepared a bill which they are ready to report at any time.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire to know whether the report of the Special Committee has yet been submitted to the House?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. KING. Then it is not yet in a condition to be printed.

Mr. STANTON. I understand the committee have their report ready, and I ask that it be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is not the consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing confined to the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. By a special rule of the House, it is in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time. The Chair, therefore, thinks that the consideration of this report cannot be confined to the morning hour.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to explain the state of the question distinctly to the House. The gentleman from Kentucky—

Mr. STANTON. I presume there will be no objection. I ask that the report of the Special Committee may be allowed to be printed in order that members may have an opportunity of seeing it. I presume the proposition will meet the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. KING, of New York. I object to that for the present.

Mr. STANTON. I then move that the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing be postponed till to-morrow, and that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which this railroad bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. You cannot call that up except in the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the reading of the 56th rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] rose to a privileged motion. I insist that the Chair shall put the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands precisely the same question is made again. Gentlemen seem to be dissatisfied with the decision of Chair in reference to this motion to reconsider. The Chair would like to inquire of those who are skilled in our practice here under parliamentary law, what position that bill would be in if the committee did reconsider it now? Could they find any rule by virtue of which they could force the House to consider it now?

Mr. KING, of New York. I will say one word upon this subject. These railroad bills have occupied the attention of this House from the commencement of the session to the present time, to the exclusion of all other business. It is time that this log-rolling system should be stopped.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Any feelings of this kind, however, ought not to induce you, gentlemen, to introduce a new practice into this House. The Chair overrules again the question of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and ask for the reading of the 56th rule.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The morning hour having expired, is it in order to move to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt about it at all; but there is an appeal made from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BAYLY. But I had the floor before the appeal was taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to take an appeal. There is no question about that.

Mr. STUART. I move to lay the appeal upon the table, and upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the reading of the 56th rule.

Mr. STUART. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that both the rules, and all the rules upon this subject will be read by general consent.

Mr. CARTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] rises in his place and moves that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under a rule which declares that that motion shall be in order at any time. The Chair thinks that is the question now before the body. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] contends, that under the rule authorizing any member to move to reconsider a vote of the House, and to have it considered, that that is the question now before the body. The Chair overrules the point of order taken by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS], and he takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair. Another gentleman [Mr. STUART] has moved that the appeal do lie upon the table, and upon that proposition the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask a question. Does not this motion to reconsider arise out of business reported from the committee, and as such belongs wholly to the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does; and belongs exclusively to the morning hour. Such, certainly, has been the invariable practice of the Chair, during his service in this position. The Chair would further remark, that unless we thus classify our business, as has been the practice, we shall have confusion so confounded that it will be difficult for the wisest among us to get along.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the Chair another question.

Mr. HARRIS. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to elicit a fact from the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That will be debate, but the Chair hopes the gentleman will be heard.

Mr. HARRIS. I object.

Mr. STUART. I withdraw, for the present, my call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the appeal upon the table, and demand tellers.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. PENN and BROOKS appointed.

The House was then divided, and the tellers reported—yeas 25, nays 94.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, Willis Allen, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaugh, Bissell, Bowie, Bragg, Breckinridge, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Burrows, Busby, E. C. NAYS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Beale, Bock, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Caskey, Chastain, Cullom, Dean, Disney, Duncan, Grey, Hamilton, Isham G. Jones, Preston King, Letcher, Martin, McMullin, McQueen, Milson, Morehead, Newton, Outlaw, Savage, Schoonmaker, Benjamin Stanton, Wallace, and Watkins—39.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, being put, it was agreed to.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

So the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Olds in the chair.)

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the committee proceed to the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that motion not to be in order, for the same reasons given yesterday upon a similar motion.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Chair to turn to the rule, which prescribes the course of proceedings in committee, which is, "that the Calendar shall be called, and that the committee shall proceed to the consideration of business as called, unless there be a motion to lay it aside, giving precedence, however, to appropriation bills, and to some others under particular circumstances." The order of this House, closing debate upon any particular bill, does not make it a special order, and compel the committee at each succeeding sitting, to take up that same subject. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requests the Clerk to read a part of the special order, by which debate was closed upon the river and harbor bill.

The latter part of the order was then read, as follows:

"And the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending, or offered to the same, and shall then report it to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee."

Mr. JONES. Exactly, and the Chair will see that, on the resumption of the subject by the committee, it also cuts off five minute debates.

Mr. STUART. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. JONES. Is not the appeal debatable?

Mr. STUART. It is not.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether debate is in order, depends upon the correctness of the decision of the Chair. If, as the gentleman contends, debate be closed upon the bill, no debate can be allowed upon the appeal. The Chair supposes that the order of the House, requiring the committee to vote upon amendments, and then to report the bill, with the amendments, to the House, is a positive order, from which the Chair feels that he cannot take the responsibility of departing. That is the decision, and from it the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] takes an appeal.

The question being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, it had under consideration House bill No. 282, making appropriation for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors. The question pending was the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] to strike out the word "repairs," and insert the word "removal," in the clause—

"For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river below the rapids; the Ohio, including the repairs of the dam at Cumberland Island; the Missouri and Arkansas rivers, $250,000."

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WARD offered the following amendment: Strike out the entire clause above inserted, and insert in lieu thereof:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Missouri, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, the Illinois, the Arkansas, and the Red rivers, $750,000.

Mr. W. said: Mr. Chairman, it is very evident to my mind, when looking over the vast country embraced in this appropriation, that enough has not been done for it. The section of country included in my amendment contains one half of the population of the United States. It furnishes almost two thirds of the internal trade of the United States. It embraces a navigation of upwards of sixteen thousand miles.

The bill recommended by the committee, proposes to appropriate a million and a half of dollars; and of that sum, it proposes to give to the section of country embraced in my amendment, only about $300,000. This is not doing justice to that section of the country. The trade upon these rivers, according to an estimate made in 1846, then amounted to four hundred and thirty-odd millions of dollars, and according to the same report, that trade had been increasing annually at the rate of ten per cent. for ten years preceding that time. It has been increasing at the same, if not a greater rate, up to the present moment. The trade upon those rivers for which this appropriation of $750,000 is asked, amounts to $766,000,000 annually. And for the purpose of cleaning out these highways to market, upon which is borne that large amount of property annually, this committee propose the appropriation of only some $300,000. Is it just, when this money is to be dispensed, that the western community should only receive one fourth of the entire amount of the appropriations in the bill? It seems to me not. The objects proposed to be accomplished are national in their character. Upon that subject there can be no rational dispute. They have been recognized as national by the appropriations that have been made heretofore by Congress, when this subject was up, and fully and fairly discussed. They are all national streams, and the vastness of the interests involved, demands far more than is given by this bill. And those who are in favor of a system of internal improvements, should, when framing one, place it upon a just and impartial basis, or it can never be sustained before the American people.

Mr. WARD demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. KING of New York, and BEALE were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 39, noes not counted.

Mr. PARKER, of Indiana. I submit the following amendment:

Provided, That so much of the said sum as may be requisite for that purpose, be applied to the construction of four substantial snag-boats for use upon said rivers.

Mr. Chairman, I presume there can be no objection to this amendment. It appropriates no additional sum of money. It simply allows those of us of the Mississippi valley who take a deep interest in river and harbor improvements to divert, of the $260,000 appropriated for the western rivers, such an amount as may be requisite for the construction of four substantial snag-boats, to be used on those rivers. There certainly should not be any objection to this amendment, with any friend to these improvements. It meets with the entire approbation, so far as I have been apprised, of the western members thus friendly.

Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, unless these snag-boats be constructed, the appropriation will be of comparatively little value. You might about as well set a mechanic to work to build a house without tools, as our operatives of the West to work in the improvement of these rivers without snag-boats. No snag-boats have been provided for. Dredging machines and mud-scows have been provided for upon the northern lakes. They are indispensable to make the appropriations there available. In like manner are these snag-boats requisite for our western rivers. At the time these river improvements were broken down, the snag-boats were destroyed or disposed of. They were indispensable at all times when improvements were making, and they will be indispensable at all times hereafter, if valuable improvements are in good faith to be made. And this amendment asks only for the diversion of a portion of the appropriation for the construction of these boats. It strikes me that this committee cannot object to it—the western members I am sure will not. Will our northern brethren upon the lakes? Will our Atlantic brethren? It does not affect the integrity of this bill. Let me say, however, with reference to this matter, that there is no gentleman from the West who feels more keenly the rank injustice done to the West by this bill than I do. But, sir, we have spent time enough upon it. I have voted for all propositions to increase the appropriations for the West; for my head and heart are in them; but it is folly to consume the time of the committee further at this late day of the session upon them. I hope my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WARD] will desist. He has struggled enough—he has had his time. We have made the effort time and again, for the adoption of his and numerous other important measures, and it now seems to me, with all respect, a reckless consumption of our time, to attempt them further. Let us then rest satisfied with what we have got, as it is manifest we cannot get any more. I am for that, simply because I cannot do better; and I hope that there is no friend of river and harbor improvements upon this floor that will vote against this bill because he cannot get as much as, or just what he wants. The passage of even this bill, by this Congress, is a great point gained for the future. It will establish an important principle.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the estimates contained in the report of Colonel Long, who has been charged with the improvements upon the western waters, and upon which the head of the Topographical Bureau has based the communications which have been laid before us this session, and upon which the committee have acted. The appropriation in the bill has been based upon his estimates. He has stated what it is proposed to do with the money. It is proposed to build two large snag-boats for use where he should deem them wanted, and three more of a lighter draft—in all five boats—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. PARKER was lost.

Mr. HOWARD. I submit the following amendment:

For dredge and snag-boats for the improvement of the navigation upon the coast of Texas, $50,000.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that this appropriation was in the bill which passed at the last session of the preceding Congress. It was put in the bill by the Committee on Commerce with the full concurrence and consent of the head of the Topographical Engineers, upon a conference with him. I do not know why it was not embraced in the present bill, for certainly, if it had been recommended to the Committee on Commerce by the Department, it would not have permitted the injustice to exist which does in this bill in relation to the coast of Texas. Why a coast of near one thousand miles that is susceptible of so much improvement as this, has been entirely pretermitted in this bill I am at a loss to understand. The entrances to most of the harbors on that coast are obstructed by bars which are shallow. They can easily be dredged out. To Texas, that has furnished and is now furnishing so large an export of cotton and sugar, and is supplying a large contribution to commerce, it strikes me this committee are not disposed to do anything like justice. It seems to me this committee should not stand here merely to register the estimates of the Topographical Department—to do nothing else than to obey the behests of that Department. I trust this amendment, as it received the sanction of the Department at the last Congress, and of this House during the session of the last Congress, will receive the favorable consideration of the Committee of the Whole. The dredge-boats which this comparatively small appropriation would provide, would be sufficient to deepen the bars at the entrances of the bays on the coast of Texas, and also remove the bars at the mouths of the rivers which empty into the bays. There have been surveys of the coast of Texas already sufficient to authorize this estimate, or the head of the Topographical Engineers would not have agreed to it at the last session of Congress. Why is it omitted now, except for the reason that the bill can get more votes by spending this amount of money in the East and North, already so lavishly provided for?

The coast of Texas was surveyed, at least in part, during the war with Mexico. The mouth of the Rio Grande was surveyed by an officer of the Topographical Engineers, who recommended that the bar should be dredged out. Matagorda and Aransas Bays were also surveyed, and Galveston Bay was sufficiently examined to show the necessity of a dredge-boat in that bay, especially on the channel between Galveston and Houston.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to state in brief the reason why we have not included this appropriation in the bill. No doubt the time will come when there will be snag boats needed upon the coast of Texas; but it has been the uniform practice of this Government, before it appropriated to the building of boats, or to any other matter, for the purpose of making improvements, to make an estimate and to survey the work, especially if it were a large one.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state to the gentleman that there was during the war with Mexico a survey made by the engineers of the Army, of Matagorda and Aransas Bays, and, if I am not incorrectly informed, also of Galveston Bay. They found it necessary to survey these bays for military operations. Those surveys are now in the Department, I presume.

Mr. SEYMOUR. The answer to that is found in the fact, that no estimates have been sent to us upon which the House might act by way of improvements for the purposes of commerce. We have provided in this bill for a survey of the bar at the mouth of the Trinity river, and we would have recommended to the House the survey of the mouth of the Rio Grande, which is a large river, and important to the commerce of the country; but at the time the bill was framed the boundary line was not settled, so that no survey could be properly made. When a survey shall be had at the proper points where improvements are necessary in Texas, and the House shall have its attention called to the estimates and data, it will be then time to provide for snag-boats and improvements.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the same condition of things did not exist at the last session, when the committee recommended this appropriation?

Mr. SEYMOUR. That I cannot tell. I have the manuscript statement of the Department, advising that it would be improper to direct even a survey of the Rio Grande at this particular time, or until the boundary line shall have been settled. We have had our attention called to no specific improvements needed upon the coast of Texas. I suppose there are some; and if so, they are connected with the mouths of their rivers.

Mr. HOWARD demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and Mr. HOWARD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. McMULLIN. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the North Fork of Holston river, from Saltville, in the county of Washington, Virginia, to the Tennessee line, $30,000.

I have not offered this amendment, Mr. Chairman, from a factious opposition to the bill, but in good faith, and in the full belief that it should be adopted. I appeal earnestly to the gentlemen of the Committee on Commerce, and to its chairman particularly, to yield this amendment their approval and adoption. The first question which presents itself to the consideration of the committee is as to the character of this stream. It is a national stream. I refer to the members from Tennessee for a proof of its nationality.

This river heads in Virginia, and passes through Tennessee and a portion of Mississippi. Upon it there have been thousands and millions of dollars of property involved. I appeal to the committee, notwithstanding I feel that I am appealing in vain, because it does seem to me that it has been the purpose of the Committee on Commerce not to have permitted an i to be dotted or a t to be crossed. It is true that they have been overpowered with the justice of the proposition of my colleague from the Richmond district, [Mr. CASKIE,] and adopted it, although James river was strangely excluded from the bill by the Committee on Commerce. I appeal to the gentlemen from Tennessee, whose State has been neglected as was Virginia—I appeal to the liberal chairman of this committee, who has been so very prolific in his investigations, according to the speech of my colleague from the Richmond district, [Mr. CASKIE,] and desire to know if he cannot come up and vote for this amendment. It is true, that this river, which I propose to improve, has not been surveyed over the whole route.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish simply to ask my friend from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] whether he is disposed to vote for the amendment himself?

Mr. McMULLIN. Most assuredly. I shall vote for it with great pleasure, and I am desirous that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] should vote for it. If he will come up and vote for it, I have no doubt that it will pass. Propositions have been presented to this House again and again, which to my mind were just. If the committee intend to pass this bill—as it is supposed they do—I appeal to them if they wish to carry out even-handed justice, and if they have any regard to population and taxes, that they will adopt this amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the gentleman say, that if the bill is amended, he will vote for it?

Mr. McMULLIN. I will not; but that does not affect the question. I have a right to appeal to those gentlemen who intend to vote for the bill to do justice. I hope that my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] while he is dealing out justice to all portions of the country, will deal it out to that portion of the country which I have the honor to represent in part.

Mr. MILLER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, whether, if the amendment prevails, he will vote for the bill?

Mr. McMULLIN. No, sir.

Mr. MILLER. Then I have to say that I have frequently heard of Virginia abstractions—

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER. I wish only to make a short reply, and I will yield the floor afterwards.

Mr. BAYLY. Suppose the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] will agree to vote for the bill, will you agree to vote for the amendment?

Mr. MILLER. I have to say this, that I have heard of Virginia abstractions, but this is the first instance of a practical illustration of the term. Here is the gentleman who offers that amendment—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must call the gentleman to order, for not confining his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I intend to make an application of my remarks to the amendment which the gentleman has offered. Here is an honorable Representative from Virginia, who believes that every such appropriation is an infraction of the Constitution, and that every such appropriation is a wrong done to the Constitution, and votes against all such bills; and yet he asks an appropriation of some $30,000, and thereby seeks to induce this committee to make an infraction upon the Constitution. Yes, sir; he goes further, and seeks through this committee to induce the House of Representatives to abstract $30,000 from the public Treasury. This, I say, is a practical illustration of the term, and truly, sir, may it be called a Virginia abstraction.

The question was then taken on Mr. McMULLIN's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to amend the clause, appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river, at the lower chain and English chain, by striking out $50,000 and inserting $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not reached that section of the bill.

Mr. WARD. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Mississippi, Ohio, Missouri, Cumberland, Illinois, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Red river, $700,000.

I am anxious to place this bill in a form in which I can consistently act with my notions of propriety and justice to the portion of country which I represent. I am struggling to place myself and that community right upon the subject of internal improvements. We are in favor of internal improvements; we are in favor of improving the highways to market.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks strictly to an explanation of his amendment.

Mr. WARD. I will do so, and confine myself to the rules laid down. The interests involved in that country are of far greater importance, it seems to me, than this committee are disposed to give to it; not only on account of the immense amount of property which is annually risked upon those streams, but on account of the unnecessary risk of human life, which should be above all price and above all considerations. When we behold from year to year and from day to day the unnecessary sacrifice of life and property, we conceive ourselves justified in calling upon this Government to make an appropriation large enough to prevent such a sacrifice. The amount there proposed will not do it; for after appropriating the $100,000 for the snag-boats, which it is proposed to construct, and $50,000 to repair the dam at the mouth of the Cumberland, you have left only for the improvement of over sixteen thousand miles of navigable water, $110,000, a sum that will scarcely compensate men to employ the hands to do the work. Are the Representatives of this mighty Republic so disregardful of property and life as to permit this sacrifice still to be carried on? It cannot be possible that the committee will refuse to give the sum which is asked to be given here? It will take at least the sum proposed in this amendment to make the necessary improvements upon the rivers embraced in the amendments. I do think that the interests of life and property which are involved here are of sufficient importance to receive a favorable response at the hands of the committee. I wish to see this bill passed. I wish to see the system commenced upon that just and liberal principle upon which it can be sustained. I do not want the whole valley of the Mississippi to be made opponents of that system, because it is so important to their well being, as it regards both property and life. If those who have framed this bill are determined to abstract from us three quarters of a million of dollars and to give us only about $310,000, we will not submit to it, if we can avoid it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to oppose the amendment of my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. WARD.] I rise to oppose it, because the amendment offered is in opposition to the principles of propriety which should rule this House. I oppose the amendment now, and I have opposed no other amendment before, because I have waited to see when patience should cease to be a virtue, and when forbearance on the part of the House would lead to some forbearance upon the part of those who try the patience of the House—

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Are the gentleman's remarks in order?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir, I am in order. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. STANTON. I make the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will confine his remarks in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am confining myself to the amendment, and I hope I shall produce some amendment of another kind. [Laughter.] It is time that gentlemen of this House should know that we cannot and will not—we who are for the bill, and the sober, rational part of this House who are opposed to the bill—will not be dragged into a conformity with what we deem inconsistent with our honor and the dignity of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Am I out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will proceed in order.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the rules of the House be insisted upon, and that the gentleman take his seat.

Mr. ORR. I move that the gentleman be permitted to proceed in order.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CHANDLER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WARD] says that he has a right to be heard. Let him be heard, not in defense of himself, not for any personal rights which I have, but for that respect in which I have been educated for this body, and for that respect which the people of the country have for it. It is not to be overlooked that we are sinking in the esteem of the community, instead of commanding the public admiration. What I have said the committee can comprehend.

Mr. YATES demanded tellers on the amendment; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. WARD's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. YATES. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, $175,000; for the Ohio, $100,000; for the Missouri, $50,000; and for the Illinois, Arkansas, Tennessee, Red, and Cumberland rivers, each, $40,000.

Mr. Y. said: I do not propose to discuss the amendment. It is a plain proposition; it speaks for itself. I propose that amendment with a view of placing myself right upon the record—to show, sir, that I am in favor of the improvement of our navigable rivers. Whatever my vote may be upon this bill, this amendment, which I offer in good faith, will show that I am in favor of the construction of internal improvements by the General Government, when such improvements are proposed to be constructed upon a proper principle. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a fair amendment. It proposes $175,000 for the Mississippi, $100,000 to the Ohio, $50,000 to the Missouri, and $40,000 to the Arkansas, Illinois, Red river, and Cumberland rivers; in all, not half a million of dollars. Now, sir, our western rivers and harbors ought to have an appropriation of at least $1,000,000 to remove the snags, flats, and bars, and to deepen the channels of said rivers. Look at the vast extent of territory through which these rivers flow. Look at the twenty thousand miles of steamboat navigation, the ten millions of people upon the banks of those rivers, interested in their navigation, and at the $250,000,000 worth of property annually floating upon these streams, and at the immense sacrifice of life and property, and I repeat that we ought to have $1,000,000 appropriated for the improvement of these rivers. I only propose by this amendment to have a half million of dollars appropriated.

I contend, sir, that if this committee is willing to do fair and impartial justice to the western country, they will adopt this amendment. Vote it down, if you please—vote against our western rivers and harbors; but the time will come when we shall have the power to resist such oppression, and such partial legislation. I, sir, am not to be deterred in offering my amendment by gentlemen who say we are attempting to tire down this committee. There is a majority of this committee in favor of this very appropriation of half a million of dollars to the improvement of our western rivers; but the voice of the committee is smothered by the determination of gentlemen to vote against all amendments, right or wrong. And, sir, when we get into the House they will move the previous question, and cut off all amendments. I, sir, should like to see their names on the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels constrained to remind the gentleman that he must confine his remarks strictly to his amendment. The Chair called the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] to order for proceeding with remarks of a similar character.

Mr. YATES. Well, sir, I do not wish to proceed out of order. I shall say nothing more, but ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. McMULLIN. It must be obvious to every gentleman in the committee that this amendment cannot be adopted. I most respectfully suggest, therefore, to the committee we decline entering upon any further amendment, and come to a direct vote upon reporting the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The remarks of the gentleman are not in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I beg to say in reply to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. MILLER]—

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman tells us that he has at last found out what Virginia abstractions consist of.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to confine debate strictly within the rule.

The question was then taken upon Mr. YATES's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LANE offered the following amendment:

That the sum of $50,000 be appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of the Willamette river, in the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. L. said: I have very little hopes, from the result of the votes upon the amendments that have been offered this morning, that this amendment will be adopted. I nevertheless know that the appropriation asked is a just and necessary one. Early in the session of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, the Legislature passed a joint resolution asking an appropriation of twice the sum I here ask for this very purpose. The importance of the uninterrupted navigation of that river was known and felt by the Legislative Assembly of that Territory, and they have, therefore, appealed to you for the appropriation necessary to effect this object, so essential to the prosperity of the country, and, in the event of a war with the Indians, so important to the transportation of troops and supplies of our army.

I ask for a small sum of money for the improvement of the navigation of the only tributary of the Columbia river at all valuable for steamboat navigation. This river empties into the Columbia about ninety miles from its mouth. The navigation of the Columbia is uninterrupted for first-class vessels to the mouth of the Willamette, from whence large vessels ply for a distance of twenty miles up that river. At present, there exist serious obstructions to the safe navigation of the last-mentioned river, capable of being removed at a comparatively slight expense to the General Government, and I trust that, in view of the importance of the commercial advantages of that river, the committee will waive their seeming determination not to permit any amendment to the bill before them, and grant the appropriation asked. It is in vain to think of the inhabitants of that Territory effecting the object for which this appropriation is asked. The pioneers of that country are unable, however willing they might be, to engage in such an enterprise. The Territory I have the honor to represent here, has neither demanded nor received huge appropriations for any purpose, nor has she asked for that not absolutely necessary to the immediate wants of the Territory. The amount asked by this amendment, it is true, is insufficient to the completion of the work, but if granted now, will insure a survey, &c., by which appropriations may hereafter be made, with a full knowledge of its importance, and the means necessary to the completion of the work. I repeat, therefore, that I hope the committee will waive their seeming purpose to pass this bill only as reported, and permit the amendment I have proposed to pass.

The question was then taken upon Mr. LANE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved the following amendment:

To strike out $30,000, and insert $100,000 for the improvement of the Des Moines rapids, on the Mississippi river.

Mr. R. said: The sum of $50,000 proposed by the committee to improve the Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river, is wholly inadequate and insufficient to accomplish that object. It is not sufficient for the expenditure of a single season. The Government has heretofore appropriated sums for the removal of these obstructions in the river. They have appropriated small sums, and by the time they have had their boats and materials ready to proceed to the work, the appropriations have been exhausted, and nothing beneficial has been done. The rocks will have to be removed for several miles, and in doing so you can have the work going on at the same time the entire distance, if the appropriation is sufficient to authorize it.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I would ask the gentleman, what length of time in the course of the year can you work upon the improvements in that place?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Upon an average six months, some seasons more, and of course some less; but the average about that time. For about three months, as a general thing, the river is obstructed by ice, either being frozen over or floating ice. For two or three months, as a general thing, the water is too high; but from July until the first of December work can be performed on these obstructions. The fact that you have work done only a portion of the time is an argument in favor of increasing the appropriation proposed by the committee, and in favor of the amendment I propose. The experience of the past ought to satisfy the committee, if they have studied it, and studied it well, that this amount is too small to do any practical good there. If the intention is merely to give to the West enough to be appropriated to contractors for the purpose of undertaking to do work, and to engineers and those who are in the pay of the Government and in its employment, gentlemen have accomplished it, and will accomplish but little else, I fear.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] proposed an inquiry which, I think, more properly I ought to make of him. I would inquire of him, what amount of time he has found it reported that work can be done upon these improvements?

Mr. FULLER. Less than six months in the year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is the report made to you by men who have been upon the grounds operating upon this work? What extent of time do they say they can work there?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. We have had before us in determining this amount, the precise time. It is less than six months, according to my recollection; but I cannot tell the exact time. I wish, however, to say, in reference to this matter, to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] that the amount appropriated, he will see by the terms of the bill, is for two chains—this work having been surveyed, and numbered, or named in specific divisions. The lower chain is at the lower part of the rapids, and the English chain is next above, and the gross amount, I think, which is necessary to complete the work upon these two chains—and not the work for this one year, but actually to complete it—would be between $60,000 and $70,000. The committee supposed that $50,000 would be an ample sum to remove the obstructions that could be removed in one year at these points, which are the most serious obstructions to the navigation.

Mr. HENN offered the following amendment:

Strike out the word "fifty," in the twenty-eighth line, and insert the words "sixty-six," so that it will read: "For the improvement of the Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river, at the lower and the English chain, $66,000."

Mr. H. said: Mr. Chairman, my object in offering that amendment is, to cover the estimates made by the Topographical Bureau, which estimates have been made, I believe, since the action of the committee upon that subject. The committee acted upon the old estimates principally. On the 14th of last month, the Topographical Bureau had their attention called to the subject by the Senate committee. The head of that Department has made an estimate for the improvement of the Des Moines rapids, a part of which communication I wish to read to the House:

"Taking this data, and considering from former experience, that preparations need not be made so long beforehand, I have the honor to submit, in conformity with the letter of the Hon. Mr. HAMLIN, an estimate for the current year, or for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1855. $50,000
Add ten per cent. for contingencies..... 6,000

Total.....$66,000

"But if it be considered desirable to work on both rapids at the same time, the double of this estimate would be more appropriate, say $132,000.

"I beg leave to state that the better way is to operate on one of the rapids (the lower rapid) at a time, beginning at the lower end, and gradually ascending as an adequate passage is accomplished.

"The boats, machinery, tools, and working materials, have to be preserved, while the work is suspended, and good responsible men have to be kept in pay to aid in watching over and preserving the boats, &c. On these accounts the ten per cent. for contingencies is added to the estimates. Respectfully submitted,

"J. J. ABERT,

"Colonel Corps of Topographical Engineers.
"Hon. C. M. CONRAD, Secretary of War."

In regard to the time, Mr. Chairman, that can be profitably employed upon these rapids in one year, the Department estimates it at three months, and it estimates the necessary expenditure per month at $20,000, making $60,000 for the three months. I would have liked very much to have had an appropriation in this bill for the upper or Rock Island rapids, as well as the lower rapids, but inasmuch as the committee have seen fit only to provide for the lower rapids, and the Department is of the same opinion, I shall at the present time, I fear, be compelled to be satisfied, if I can get the amount increased for the lower rapids to that estimated by the Topographical Bureau, to wit: $66,000.

I wish to say one word in connection with these rapids, in order that the House, or that portion of the committee who have not examined the subject, may understand the truth of what has been stated by some who have pretended to have been upon the rapids, to wit: "that it is necessary to blast a channel, through the rocks, two hundred feet wide, for the whole length of the rapids."

This is not the case. The appropriation asked for is mainly for the purpose of straightening the channel by cutting off the points of rocks that project, and to render thereby the channel, not only of greater width, but more easily navigated.

I have a map here of the lower rapids, and also one of the upper rapids, and gentlemen who are interested in this question, if they will look at the map, will see what is the precise work necessary to remove these obstructions, and thereby not only render the great Father of Waters navigable for large boats, for an increased distance of more than five hundred miles, but which will save thousands upon thousands of dollars annually to the people of the Mississippi valley. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will at least give the small increase I ask for this object.

The question was then taken on Mr. HENN's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, proposed the following amendment:

In the twenty-sixth line, after the words "Des Moines," insert "and Rock river." Strike out all after the word "river," in the twenty-seventh line, to the word "fifty" inclusive, and insert "one hundred."

Mr. C. said: I do not propose, sir, to take up any of the time of the committee in discussing this amendment, as there is no prospect of its prevailing. I would beg leave to inform the committee that last fall there was a convention held at the city of Burlington, in the State of Iowa, when four States and one Territory—the Territory of Minnesota—were represented. That convention memorialized Congress for an appropriation of money for the improvement of the Des Moines and Rock river rapids, as contemplated by the amendment I have just offered, which provides that $100,000 shall be appropriated for the improvement not only of the Des Moines, but the Rock river rapids also. My object in offering the amendment is to carry out the intentions and views of that convention. I had thought that those who had the charge of the proceedings of the Burlington convention, and those to whose care they were confided, would have seen that a report upon the memorial would have been made to this House, that the importance of the objects embraced in the memorial might have been brought home to the members of the committee themselves, and that the attention of the country might have been attracted to the necessity, in a commercial point of view, of doing something towards removing the obstructions at the points referred to. But in this I was disappointed.

That memorial was quietly referred to the Committee on Commerce. Whether that committee deigned to take into consideration the memorial and request of that large convention, in which four States, all lying on the Mississippi river, were represented, is a matter which I do not pretend to express any opinion upon. It would seem from the appropriation that they had resorted to other modes of receiving information, than to the proceedings of that convention. That convention, composed as it was of delegates of the most influential and respectable character, representing four States and one Territory, was entitled, I apprehend, to be heard with respect, not only by this House, but by that committee. My object, then, as I said before, in offering the amendment, is to carry out, in some degree at least, the wishes of that convention, having an appropriation made, not only for the Des Moines rapids, but also for the improvement of the Rock river rapids. The sum of $50,000 appropriated for the improvement of the Des Moines rapids, is wholly and entirely inadequate. They could go on and improve all the chains of the Des Moines rapids at the same time that they are improving the two chains designated by the committee, if they only had the means to do so. Where, then, will be the advantage, if you improve one chain and leave another chain immediately above it, that forms an equal obstruction to the navigation of the river? What have you gained? What have you accomplished? If you are going to make an appropriation, make it large enough to be of some advantage, and that will apply immediately, and do not have the work continued from time to time, leaving obstructions to be overcome in the navigation as difficult and serious as they were before the appropriation was made.

I do not agree with the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. Seymour,] that the improvement of the natural channel is an experiment, and that the $50,000 appropriated in the bill is sufficient for that purpose. The committee had before them the report of Lieutenant Lee, in which he shows that the improvement of the natural channel is not only practicable, but preferable to all other modes. And the correctness of that report has never been questioned, except by those who have an interest to subvert, in preventing the improvement of the rapids altogether, that they may continue to profit by a continuance of the obstructions. I say, sir, that their improvement, in the manner indicated, has ceased to be an experiment.

The question was then taken on Mr. CAMPBELL's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, moved to amend the eighth item of the bill by striking out "$75,000," and inserting "$150,000," so as to make it read:

For opening a ship channel of sufficient capacity to accommodate the wants of commerce through the most convenient pass leading from the Mississippi river into the Gulf of Mexico, $150,000.

Mr. M. said: In offering this amendment, I am not influenced by any factious motive; neither do I wish to condemn the action of the committee at all. I suppose, sir, they perceived that a bill had passed the Senate making an appropriation of $75,000 for this object, and they took it for granted that that sum would be sufficient. If they had taken into consideration the immense amount of commerce which goes through that channel—being within a fraction of $54,000,000 to foreign countries, probably a like amount coast-wise outwards and half that amount inward—I feel very confident that they would have put down the sum which I now propose, or more. This subject has attracted the attention of the public, because one of the principal channels has been used, for several years past, as a ship-channel. The bar has been gradually increasing until now ships of the larger class, that formerly navigated there freely, are entirely prevented from entering the Mississippi. If the members of this committee will notice a document that has been laid before them, they will see that the largest class of ships have been detained there from five to forty days. I am impelled by a sense of duty to offer this amendment, because I believe that the sum appropriated in this bill is totally insufficient to do any efficient work, even during the present season; but I will state, that if the committee is determined to make no amendment, I shall be satisfied.

The question was then taken on Mr. MOORE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MOORE then moved to amend the ninth item of the bill, which reads as follows:

"For removing the raft of Red river, $50,000,"

by adding thereto the following:

To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, who shall contract for keeping the navigation free for the space of two years after the removal of said raft.

Mr. M. said: I do not desire to increase the sum. I believe it is as much as could be conveniently expended this season. I offer that amendment because it is according to the recommendation of Captain Shreve, who, I will venture to assert here, was the most efficient and practical engineer that has ever been employed by these United States. Unless something of this kind is done, any appropriations made towards clearing that raft will finally prove inefficient.

In 1839 Captain Shreve recommended that a slight appropriation should be made to keep the channel open for two years. Had that appropriation been then made, there would have been now no necessity whatever for making any appropriation. I do not know that I can convey to the minds of this committee anything like a description of the country around this raft; but I will endeavor to do so, and to show the reason why it becomes absolutely necessary to keep that part of the river open for a year or two after the raft is removed. Above this raft (which is an accumulation of drift timber) the river is pretty wide, and is navigable for five or six hundred miles at high water. At that point it suddenly becomes narrower. Just above the raft the high lands on the western side recede, leaving a wide valley, and again touch the river at Shreveport. Along the foot of these high lands there is a chain of bayous and lakes. These lakes, or portions of them, were, as I suppose, formerly the valleys of the bayous or rivulets which drained the high lands, and were formed into lakes by the action of the former raft below Shreveport, which backed up the water and formed deposits at their outlets. I judge this, because there are many standing trees in those lakes. The action of the raft has thrown the current over the bank, just at the head of this raft, and cut out small channels. The great body of the water flows out there and comes in again in two channels, just above the town of Shreveport. The peculiar quality of this river is, that its waters contain large quantities of sediment that has gradually deposited and partially filled up the old channel of the river between these points. The banks, therefore, are of a loose, alluvial nature; and if kept open for two years, will gradually cut out its natural channel, and keep it entirely clear of drift, as it does now below Shreveport, where probably the greater portion of the original raft lay. I think the amendment necessary, and hope that it will be adopted.

The question was then taken on Mr. MOORE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SCURRY moved to amend the bill by striking out the following item:

"For a survey of the harbor at the mouth of Trinity river, Texas, $3,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

For a survey of Trinity river, Texas, including the bar at the mouth, $3,000.

Mr. S. said: It will be apparent to the committee that I do not propose to increase the amount of the appropriation. I merely desire to correct a mistake which has been made in this item by the Committee on Commerce. There is no harbor at the mouth of Trinity river, but there is a bar there which obstructs the navigation of the river, for which this appropriation is intended. I believe that the appropriation will be sufficient to continue the survey as far as it is necessary to be made. I have no complaint to make of the action of the Committee on Commerce upon this subject. The appropriation is sufficient to satisfy me, if it is changed so as to secure the object for which it is intended.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I rise merely to say that this amendment is one which ought to be adopted. The statement made by the gentleman from Texas is correct.

The question was then taken upon Mr. SCURRY's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, offered the following amendment to the bill:

For survey of harbor at the mouth of the St. John's river and Apalachicola bay, $2,000.

Mr. C. said: Mr. Chairman, it was my purpose to have asked this House for an appropriation for the purpose of improving these harbors, but the committee and the House seem determined not to grant appropriations of this kind without such detailed information as it is not in my power now to give. I am collecting that information. Memorials have been sent to Congress at different times, and there is a good deal of information in the Department bearing on this subject, but it is not of a character which I believe would induce the House to make the appropriations necessary to improve those harbors. I now ask for an appropriation of $2,000 for each of these harbors—at the mouth of the St. John's and of the Apalachicola, for the purpose of surveys.

If the obstruction at the mouth of the St. John's river should be removed—and I believe it can be for a very moderate sum—it would open the navigation of that river for two hundred miles. There is a point on the St. John's river at which we can approach the navigation on the Gulf of Mexico about sixty miles; and if this appropriation at the mouth of the river should be deemed practicable—and I believe it will be so found—it will shorten the transit across the isthmus of Florida very materially. It is for that reason that I ask an appropriation of $2,000, which, I understand, will be sufficient for the survey. The city of Apalachicola is the third in importance on the Gulf of Mexico. The exports from that city amount to about $10,000,000 annually, and if it were in any other locality, I need not say to this House how large an amount would have been obtained for the improvement of that harbor consequent upon the great importance of it. I have not, however, the kind of information before me which is necessary to influence the action of the House in regard to that harbor, and therefore I only ask for the small appropriation of $2,000 for a survey.

I trust, sir, that in consideration of the moderation of my request, and in consideration of the fact that I represent twelve hundred miles of seacoast, if there is anything national anywhere, it seems to me this improvement is national. I ask for this small appropriation, and nothing less, and I hope this committee will grant it.

The question now being upon the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. CABELL demanded tellers; but they were not ordered.

The question was then put upon the amendment, and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 40; no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Call the roll!"]

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair thinks he has the right to order tellers.

Messrs. HENDRICKS and HART were appointed as tellers; and the question being again put, it was decided in the negative—ayes 55, noes 76.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I offer the following amendment to the bill:

For the connection of the Cumberland road, west of Springfield, in the State of Ohio, $200,000, to be expended on the present surveyed and located line between the said town of Springfield, Ohio, and the Indiana State line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the amendment is not in order.

Mr. BELL. From that decision I take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio submits an amendment for the construction of the Cumberland road between the town of Springfield, Ohio, and the Indiana State line. The Chair decides the amendment to be out of order. From that decision the gentleman from Ohio takes an appeal. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was then taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana. I do not think the committee could have understood the object of the amendment submitted by me a short time ago, or they would have agreed to it. I offer the following as a proviso to that clause of the bill providing for the removal of the Red river raft:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to contract for keeping the navigation of said river open at that point for one year after the removal of said raft.

The CHAIRMAN. At what portion of the bill does the gentleman propose to insert his amendment?

Mr. MOORE. At the end of the thirty-ninth line.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have passed that clause of the bill, and it is not in order to refer back to it.

Mr. APPLETON, of Maine, offered the following amendment:

After the word "harbor," in the forty-fourth line, insert "$10,000," so that the section will read: For a breakwater at Richmond Island harbor, $10,000; and for repairing the breakwater at Portland harbor, Maine $10,000.

Mr. A. said: Mr. Chairman, I do not offer this amendment for the purpose of making a speech on it. Still less do I offer it for the purpose of embarrassing the bill. I cannot say, as the gentleman from Ohio did yesterday, that upon the fate of my amendment will depend my vote upon the bill; for my vote will not be determined by any such consideration. I shall consider the measure as it may present itself when the final vote is taken on it, and shall then act with relation to it as, on the whole, I think it deserves. But the bill is open to improvement; and I offer my amendment in good faith, in order to improve it.

There are two works mentioned in the clause under consideration, both of which are recognized by the committee as coming within the scope and principles of the bill. But the appropriation inserted for them is wholly inadequate to do them justice; and neither of them can be omitted without doing wrong to the commerce of that part of the country to which they apply. One of them—Richmond Island harbor—is intended to complete a harbor of refuge on the Atlantic coast, where nature has almost completed it already. The estimate for this work by the Department has never been less than $10,000, and no less sum will complete it. It is a work suggested by the Coast Survey; and in which New York and Massachusetts, and every State which sends ships along the coast of Maine, is interested almost as much as Maine itself; and to neglect it now would be to neglect one of the most important works which the bill contains.

The other work—the breakwater on Staniford's Ledge—is an old work, which requires completion. In its present condition it may be productive of mischief, because, at the end of the completed portion of it, a number of rocks have been submerged, which have been found inconvenient, being concealed from view to vessels entering the harbor. The estimate for this work, embodied in the river and harbor bill of the last Congress, was $20,000; and I suppose the committee must have intended to make some appropriation for it this year. Yet I do not see how they intended to divide the sum appropriated between the two works embraced in the clause; and I do not see how the Secretary of War is to divide it. I have not time to examine this subject fully; but it is surely good policy, in the case of a small work like either of these, to assign money enough to finish them at once, and not allow them to drag along for years, and thus increase the cost by delaying them. I hope the committee themselves will vote for this amendment, and that it may be adopted. The State of Maine has only a small amount in this bill, at best; but I do not offer to amend the bill on that account, but because the amendment is right in itself, and is demanded by the very principles upon which the committee have proceeded in granting this bill.

The question was taken upon Mr. APPLETON's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BISSELL. I desire to know whether the appropriations in this bill for the breakwater at Richmond Island harbor, and for the repair of the breakwater at Portland harbor, were recommended by the Department?

Mr. FULLER. Yes, sir; they have been estimated for.

Mr. BISSELL. I now desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce the same question.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman intends to submit any remarks, he must first submit his amendment?

Mr. BISSELL. Very well; I submit the following amendment:

For the improvement of the harbor at Waukegan, in the State of Illinois, $11,000.

I would now, as a preliminary to the few words I have to say upon this amendment, like to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] again if the $10,000 appropriated in this bill for a breakwater at Richmond Island harbor, and the repairing the breakwater in the Portland harbor was recommended by the Department the present session of Congress?

Mr. FULLER. I am not able to answer the gentleman as to whether this appropriation was recommended the present session or not. I do not know.

Mr. BISSELL. I should now like to address the same question to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whether this appropriation was recommended by the head of the proper Department the present session?

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I will say, in reply to the gentleman, that there were no printed estimates sent us for appropriations for these two works. There was a general item in those estimates for repairs and improvements upon the Atlantic coast. We have cut that item down considerably—it is the last item in the bill but one—and appropriated $10,000, a portion of which is to be applied to the breakwater at Portland harbor, or so much as may be necessary to repair that work. So far as the other work is concerned, we learned, upon consultation at the Department, that it was a valuable work, and should be made. There were also numerous memorials and petitions upon the subject of constructing this work.

Mr. BISSELL. Then, as I understand it, there were no specific recommendations from the Department for this particular case.

Mr. FULLER. Then you do not understand it right. [Laughter.]

Mr. BISSELL. I thought that was what the gentleman said.

Mr. FULLER. There have been recommendations from the Department for this appropriation, but I said I did not know whether there were recommendations to the present session.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I am to understand that this appropriation has been recommended by the Department, but not at this session. Now, heretofore it has been a sufficient reason for the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] and his colleague upon that committee, [Mr. FULLER,] to reject all amendments when they could rise and say the appropriation was not recommended by the Department.

Mr. FULLER. I have made no such statement.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon, and will except him from the charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that the gentleman is not confining his remarks to the amendment offered by himself. The gentleman must restrict his remarks to the explanation of that amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. I am giving a reason why the amendment should be adopted. Now, my amendment proposes an appropriation of $11,000 for the improvement of the harbor upon Lake Michigan in Illinois. The Department has at the present session, in the strongest manner, urged upon the committee to appropriate $10,000 for that very harbor in the State of Illinois.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Were they by printed estimates?

Mr. BISSELL. No, sir; but by a written letter did the Department strongly urge upon the committee to make an appropriation of $10,000 for the harbor of Waukegan in Illinois. Not only that, but the last bill, of a similar kind to this, which passed this House, contained an appropriation of $10,000 for that harbor. When we attempt to put upon the bill an amendment of a few hundred or thousand dollars for any improvement in the West, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is very much in the habit of rising and saying—and I admit the argument is good as far as it goes—they cannot admit that amendment, because the Department has not recommended it. Now, it is admitted right here, upon the spot, that they have made an appropriation for works which the Department has made no recommendation for this session.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Not by me. The gentleman entirely misunderstands me. I say it was recommended by the Department.

Mr. BISSELL. There is no misunderstanding between us. I admit that heretofore such a recommendation may have been made; but this session no recommendation was made to the committee, and the committee take the responsibility; and I do not know but it is right to put in $10,000 for those two little harbors; but I know, at the same time, that the Department did strongly urge the necessity of a harbor at Waukegan, and the committee rejected it. Now, I hope the House will hear no more of that argument. I hope this amendment will be adopted. It is but for $1,000 more than the Department recommended.

Mr. SEYMOUR. The amendment which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] has so strenuously urged, considering the reference he has made to the Committee on Commerce, needs a single word in the way of reply.

The harbor of Waukegan was brought to the attention of the committee. The friends of the appropriation brought to us from the Topographical Bureau a survey of that harbor, estimates, and a statement that if improvements were made there, it would make a good harbor; but the committee declined putting it into the bill, and for this reason: Chicago is the great center of commerce for that part of the lakes. We found that Chicago needed an appropriation of a considerable amount for the repairs of her harbor, although she had received over $200,000 before for that purpose, and we recommended an appropriation for Chicago.

The next large point or center of commerce, as we proceed northward upon that lake, is Milwaukee, the great port of Wisconsin, which lies eighty or ninety miles, I believe, further north. We recommended a considerable appropriation for that harbor, and it was also recommended by the Department. Now, between those two large points or centers of commerce, it was established to the satisfaction of the committee that steamers, as well as sail vessels, in passing would need harbors of refuge, or at least one harbor of refuge; and upon the principle we have acted, as I stated in opening this discussion, we recommended an appropriation for a harbor of refuge. Racine and Southport lay between those two places. Both have heretofore received appropriations, and works were in progress, but needed something more to finish them. Racine, from its position, has a harbor which, under certain circumstances connected with the storms upon the lakes, would answer a better purpose as a harbor of refuge than any other; and the committee deemed it for the general interest of commerce that those two harbors between Chicago and Milwaukee should be completed, rather than we should make an appropriation for the commencement of a new work at Waukegan. There were circumstances arising out of the position of Waukegan itself that would render it, in our opinion, inferior as a harbor of refuge to either of the others I have referred to. The reason is this: Waukegan lies upon the dead face of the lake shore. It has, we understand, no indentation for a harbor, no river of any size empties in there; whereas at Racine there is a river which helps to form a harbor, and a point of land juts out into the lake that affords protection from storms. At Southport, too, there is a small lake or bayou near the shore, and the improvement already begun contemplates the use of that bayou as a harbor of refuge. This work when completed will form one of the best harbors of that kind on the lake.

The question was then taken on Mr. BISSELL's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SMART offered the following amendment: For the construction of a breakwater at the mouth of Rockland harbor, in the State of Maine, $25,000.

Mr. S. said: There has been no estimate submitted for this appropriation, but I have yet to learn that we sit here as a House of Representatives, merely to record the edicts of a Department. I think, sir, if I can satisfy gentlemen that this appropriation ought to be made, that this House will take the liberty to act, whether the Department has acted or not. I wish to say that I have received a petition, and presented it to this House, of some eight hundred names, asking for this appropriation. That petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce. I believe no action has been had upon it by that committee.

I offer this amendment in good faith, and hope it will pass. I will say to the House, that the State of Maine has less in this appropriation bill than almost any other State in the Union. She has only $16,000 out of an appropriation of $1,500,000. A fair appropriation would give her $50,000 out of that sum. I will frankly say, I cannot vote for a bill so unjust to my State.

To the harbor of Rockland, I desire to call the attention of gentlemen. Rockland is a commercial and lime-burning town of nearly six thousand inhabitants, and is one of the most flourishing towns in Maine. The harbor of Rockland is situated on the southwest part of Penobscot Bay, and is the last town at which vessels touch in proceeding from the cities and towns on the Penobscot Bay and river, on their way to Boston, New York, and southern ports.

The harbor is now exposed to easterly and southeasterly storms, by which vessels are often driven ashore, and great losses sustained. Ships of the largest size are built at Rockland, and more lime is manufactured and exported from this town, than from any other town in the United States. I establish, then, I think, a strong case, and I ask gentlemen of this committee to decide upon its merits, without regard to the despotic edicts of the Department. If I can satisfy this House that the appropriation should be made, I ask the House to make it, and not go to a Bureau, and ask them for their opinion. The opinion of this House is worth something upon a question of this kind, and if I make out a case demanding the appropriation, I ask the House to give me this appropriation. I claim it, in the name of a State that has been dealt unjustly by in this bill, in my judgment. I claim it because it is as meritorious a case as can be found from the first line of the bill to the last.

There is another harbor in the district I represent—the harbor of Searsport—which has better claims than many that are provided for in this bill; and if river and harbor bills are to pass, I hope the citizens of Searsport will forward their petitions to Congress. The citizens of Rockland have petitioned, and I ask, at this time, that their prayer be granted.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine. I do not oppose it so much from the amount he requires, as from the simple fact that I am desirous to see some places left out of this bill, for the purpose of giving force and power to pass one other bill, which I hope to see introduced into this House at its next session, for about the same amount. I consider that the friends of the improvements of our harbors and rivers have heretofore done much towards defeating all such measures by adding amendments to any reported bill until the amounts become so large, and also embracing so many locations of a doubtful national character, that no sane man could vote for them. I am confident, sir, that the real friends of these bills must come up to the point of sustaining the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce, and reject all amendments of much amount, or they will see this bill increased to an amount which will sink it to the same level with all of its predecessors for the last fourteen years. I feel constrained to call upon all common-sense business men to pursue a more reasonable and consistent course upon the bill now before this committee, and to bring it to a vote upon its merits. It is of too much importance to the interest of this really great commercial nation to be lost from year to year by factious opposition of individuals, who claim to be in favor of the principle.

We have a bill now before us which has been reported by a standing committee of this House, amounting to about $1,500,000, which I think sufficiently large to recommence this long-neglected system of improvements.

Those rivers and harbors which are not embraced in this bill, will lay a good foundation for a bill at our next session; and allow me to appeal to all gentlemen upon this floor, who desire to see the system prevail, to abandon all their opposition to this bill, and come up with an honest support of the committee, and the bill which they have reported.

And in proof of my own sincerity, allow me to say that I have four ports in my Congressional district, upon Lake Erie on one side, and the Allegany river upon the other, all of which have been surveyed by the General Government, and more or less outlay has been made upon these improvements. And this bill only provides for one of them, and I have refused to move any amendment to this bill to bring them in, for fear of embarrassing this bill, and being the means, with others, of killing this bill.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. SMART, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to strike out the following:

"For the breakwater at Richmond Island harbor, and repairing the breakwater in Portland harbor, $10,000."

Mr. R. said: Mr. Chairman, if it is a good reason why we should not amend a bill, that the proposed amendment has not been recommended by the proper Department, it is a good reason why the Committee on Commerce should not put in anything which was not recommended by the Department. I want to make the rule alike applicable to all cases, and make it operate upon the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] who is a member of the committee, as it operates upon me.

Mr. FULLER. What is the rule?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If it is a good reason why we should not insert amendments in the bill for the Illinois river, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, because they have not been recommended this year, it is a good reason that the committee should not put in anything that was not so recommended.

Mr. FULLER. In all cases where an appropriation has been made at some previous time, there has been a recommendation, giving particulars of the work. I suppose the recommendations are not like a white bird's egg, which rots the first year. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not understand the point of the gentleman's wit. If I did I would reply to him.

Very many of the appropriations that have been proposed to be added to this bill by gentlemen representing western States, have been recommended heretofore by the Department; for instance, the one recommended by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WARD,] for the Cumberland river, has been recommended by the Department, and placed in the bills of this House, year after year, for half a dozen years in succession, and yet the Committee on Commerce tells us it has not been recommended this year, and therefore it is a good reason why it should not be in. I want the rule applied to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] as well as myself.

I want to see whether the gentleman is willing to stand by the principles that he says governed him in acting upon this bill. The chairman tells us the reason of the omission of an appropriation for Waukegan was, that there were other ports convenient to it. There are ports convenient to the one in Maine, which I have indicated as provided for in the bill which I shall move to strike out. There are more reasons why appropriations should be made for improvements upon the lakes and rivers of the West than for those upon the sea-board provided for in this bill. I ask the gentleman from Maine what population will be accommodated by his improvement? Is there any considerable port there?

Mr. APPLETON. That harbor of refuge at Richmond Island will accommodate every merchant, ship-owner, and mariner, who has occasion to traverse the Atlantic ocean, along the eastern coast of Maine. It costs but $10,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. So will any other port on the Atlantic where ships go.

Mr. APPLETON. You cannot find another point upon the Atlantic in that region, which will answer the same purposes. It is a harbor of refuge peculiarly.

Mr. ORR. I am opposed to the amendment, but I do not propose to debate it. I will only request the Chair to rigidly enforce the rule hereafter, when amendments are offered, and to confine gentlemen to explanations of their amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to do so, strictly.

Mr. RICHARDSON demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. MACE and CLINGMAN were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. RICHARDSON was disagreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 6, noes not counted.

Mr. MOLONY. I propose the following amendment:

For the construction of a breakwater and the erection of a pier at the harbor of Waukegan, $12,000.

Mr. Chairman, my object in offering this amendment, is to correct a statement of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that Waukegan, as a harbor of refuge—such as it can be made at a trifling expense—would be inferior to others in the vicinity provided for by the bill before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to an explanation of his particular amendment.

Mr. MOLONY. I intend to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now too late to vindicate the Department.

Mr. MOLONY. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce ventured an opinion here, that the harbors in the immediate vicinity of Waukegan were better for refuge than this could be made. The chairman did not see fit to give to us the reasons upon which that opinion was based. But, sir, I state that it is right in the face of an opinion entertained by the head of the Topographical Corps, officially given to the Committee on Commerce; which opinion is founded, not as the chairman's was, by looking at the map two thousand miles from the port in question, but, sir, is the result of an actual survey; which survey, Colonel Abert tells the committee is conclusive in his mind of two things, viz: First, that a harbor of refuge is much needed there; and second, that said harbor can be constructed, and a better one for refuge than any one on Lake Michigan, and for about one half of the money that has been estimated for any other one on said lake. Yet with no evidence before the Committee on Commerce, other than what was furnished by the Topographical Bureau, which was most emphatic in favor of this appropriation, the chairman rises up here, and gives his opinion that this would not be as good a harbor of refuge as others in the vicinity.

Such, Mr. Chairman, are the facts in this case. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce has declared, again and again, that the rule which governed his committee in making up this bill, was the estimates of the Department. Yet, sir, the longitude of Waukegan is too far west to have the benefit of that rule. But in contempt of their own rule, this port is left out of their bill, while little points east of the Alleghanies, for which no estimate has been submitted by the Department, have been included.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. MOLONY was rejected.

Mr. CABELL. I offer the following amendment:

For the survey of the harbors at the mouth of the St. John's river and at the mouth of the Appalachian river, $3,000—$1,500 for each.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this application for appropriation was not entirely understood, or I am sure it would have been adopted when it was last submitted to the consideration of the committee. The St. John's river is navigable for about two hundred miles, but at its mouth there is a bar which materially obstructs navigation. At the town of Jacksonville, which is about twenty miles from the mouth of the river, there are now fourteen large steam saw-mills, and more in the process of construction. They cut, I understand, at least thirty millions of feet of lumber annually, which is more than is cut at the town of Wilmington, on the Cape Fear river. Besides this, there is an annual exportation of ten millions of feet of range timber from that place. From the knowledge of these facts, the committee may estimate the shipping that will be necessary to this business. I stated before that I did not ask for a large appropriation for the improvement of this harbor, because I had not all the data essential. I simply ask an appropriation of $1,500, for the purpose of making a survey of the mouth of the river. I mentioned before, that if this harbor were improved it would give a steamboat of the largest class navigation at one point within about sixty miles of the navigable waters of the Gulf, and that it would facilitate and shorten the transit across the peninsula.

I may state further, that the light-house at the mouth of the St. John's river is in great danger of being destroyed, for the want of a survey and an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor. If the harbor be improved, as is recommended by those who have examined the coast of Florida, it will tend to preserve the light-house.

The importance of the town of Appalachicola is known to commercial gentlemen from the northern and eastern States. The exportation of that town is about $10,000,000. All that is asked by this amendment is an appropriation of $1,500 for the survey of the harbor at the mouth of the Appalachian river, on which is situated the town of Appalachicola. I appeal to gentlemen to give this appropriation. There was nothing in the bill of the last session of Congress for us. I could not get anything in it for my State. I ask the committee to show that there is no ground for the charge that this bill is sectional in its character. I have not the constitutional scruples that gentlemen have in regard to many of these works of improvement upon the coast. But whatever be the constitutional scruples of gentlemen, I do not hesitate to say, that if there is anything constitutional in the system, it is the kind of improvement I now ask. The harbor is almost without the jurisdiction of the State. To improve it, would be as constitutional as to improve any point in the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay between Norfolk and Old Point. I trust the committee will allow this small appropriation. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then put, and the amendment was disagreed to, there being, upon a division—ayes 26, noes not counted.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment:

For the purchase of the outstanding shares of stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company held by private individuals, provided the same shall not cost more than $230 per share, $250,000.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I rise to a question of order upon this amendment. It is not germane to the bill, as it provides for the purchase of stock of a company.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair entertains doubts as to whether the amendment is in order; but so many propositions have been entertained with reference to that canal, the Chair could not well rule it out of order.

Mr. MARSHALL. The very object of the amendment is to facilitate river navigation there. I have but to say that in the speech which I made a few days ago, I stated the exact condition of that property; $250,000 will free that canal and relieve the commerce of the Ohio river from the burden of $250,000 which it will have to pay under existing arrangements by a tax upon that commerce. I do not choose to waste the time of the committee.

I trust that the proposition will pass, and that gentlemen who vote for these appropriations for various localities will remember that this proposition is one in which some thirteen or fourteen States are interested.

Mr. MARSHALL demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MARSHALL's amendment, and it was rejected.

The following section was then read by the Clerk:

"For the protection of Great Brewster Island in the harbor of Boston, $30,000."

Mr. APPLETON, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out $30,000 and insert $50,000.

Mr. Chairman, in the year 1848 an appropriation of $40,000 was made for the protection of the Great Brewster, on condition that the island should be ceded to the United States. The city of Boston purchased the island and ceded it to the Government, by an act of the Legislature of Massachusetts giving jurisdiction. The work was commenced in 1849, and suspended in 1850 for the want of funds. From personal observation I state that no inconsiderable portion of the work was destroyed by the gale in March, 1851, and by the action of the sea, the work being left in an unfinished state. The object of this appropriation is the protection of the channel to the largest, or one of the largest naval depôts in the United States and the harbor of Boston. The present position of the channel has been placed before the Committee on Commerce by scientific engineers in the service of the Government. The Great Brewster is an island situated at the entrance of the harbor of Boston and Charlestown, on the north side of the channel, and forms a natural breakwater of about three thousand yards, covering Nantasket Roads, containing nearly forty acres. The eastern side of the island is exposed to the direct action of the sea, and is rapidly washing away. Its bank on that side is very high and nearly vertical. The highest point of the hill is on the west of this bank, showing that at least the half of the island has disappeared within a few years. This island forms one side of the channel, opposite to which is one of the most efficient forts in the United States, lately built at a great expense. Should a new channel be formed by the washing of this island, this battery might become useless. I am assured by General Totten that I cannot too strongly advocate an appropriation sufficient to secure the object, which he thinks can be accomplished for $50,000.

The question was then taken on Mr. APPLETON's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. MOREHEAD moved that the committee rise.

The question was then put, and it was not agreed to.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. SCUDDER. I offer the following amendment:

For a breakwater at Great Point, Nantucket, Massachusetts, $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed is for an appropriation for the purpose of erecting a breakwater at Nantucket Point near the northeast end of the island of that name. This appropriation is for one of the cases, among many others, which the committee have seen fit to leave out of their bill. I will endeavor, very briefly, as I must under the limited time, to show the public expediency and necessity of this appropriation. I do not ask it as some appropriations are asked for, where there has been no survey and estimate. There was a survey and estimate in this case as early as 1827, under the authority of the Government. The lowest estimate for a breakwater of convenient length, that would shelter twenty-five or more vessels, is $250,000. It is a work of magnitude and great importance, not only to Massachusetts, but to the whole country. The proposed structure is to be at the east end of the Vineyard Sound. This Sound is on the coast of Massachusetts, extending about sixty miles from one part of the Atlantic to another. It is bounded on the south and east by a group of islands, of which Nantucket is one, and on the north and west principally by the continent. It is from four to thirty miles in width and incumbered with many shoals, bars, and ledges. At the east end of this Sound, and in an easterly direction, the Nantucket shoals extend out to a great distance. The navigation over these shoals is exceedingly dangerous at certain seasons of the year, depending much upon the winds and tides. There is no harbor of refuge nearer to them, for vessels going through what is called the south channel, than Holmes's Hole, which is about forty-five miles to the west. At the inclement seasons of the year, in order to get safely over the shoals, it is necessary for vessels to avail themselves of the first of southerly winds and favorable tides. They frequently leave Holmes's Hole with a fair wind and prospect, and by the time they arrive at the shoals the wind ceases, or tide makes ahead, and they are left to point their way back again, or navigate the dangerous passes in the night and storms. I need not say that they are frequently driven to sea or shipwrecked in making this attempt.

If the contemplated breakwater were erected so as to form a harbor at Nantucket Point, near these shoals, then the vessels, instead of harboring at Holmes's Hole, would go on to the Point, and from thence would be able to take an early advantage of the south winds and tides, and navigate the shoals in daylight, and with safety. It is said by the report of the engineer who surveyed this place, that fifty vessels a day sometimes pass down to the shoals from Holmes's Hole harbor. I have counted, I think, one hundred vessels at a time passing down the sound in the north and south channels.

The amount of shipping which passes through the sound is very great. The coasting vessels of New England, the tonnage of which is about 500,000, all pass through it many times in the year; many of the foreign-bound vessels, and those to the English Provinces also pass this way. The scientific gentleman who made the survey said, as long ago as 1827, that 8,000 vessels a year would avail themselves of the breakwater, if erected. Since then our coasting tonnage has more than doubled. Although the contemplated breakwater is intended as a harbor of refuge principally, yet the local conveniences of Nantucket should not be overlooked.

The inhabitants of this town have about 20,000 tons of shipping employed in the whaling business. They have been engaged in this industry for a century or more, and have carried on their business under a disadvantage of having no ship harbor. The harbor at which their ships enter when loaded, is Edgartown, about thirty miles from their residence; and from and to this harbor they transport the cargoes and outfits by lighters. Even under these circumstances, the town has become wealthy, and its citizens are not excelled in industry, respectability, and intelligence, by any part of New England. If the breakwater should be built, it would afford them a ship-harbor, and give a new impetus to their enterprise. Probably there is no place on the Atlantic coast where a harbor of refuge is more needed, than at or near the Nantucket shoals. There are but few citizens in this country who have been engaged in commerce, that have not met with losses by shipwrecks in that region, and fewer still, I apprehend, who have not lost near and dear friends, who would have been saved had this contemplated harbor been built. Within my own recollection, I could recount the loss of single ships and cargoes, on these shoals, whose value was equal to about one half of the costs that would be incurred in making a convenient harbor: according to the estimates of the Department. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce if this is the same place to which he referred?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I understand that this amendment relates to Nantucket. If it is, then it is the same breakwater to which I referred.

The question was then taken on Mr. SCUDDER's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I offer the following amendment:

For a survey of the bars and obstructions at and near the mouth of the east branch of the Pascagoula river, in the State of Mississippi, with a view to the removal of said bars and obstructions, $2,000.

I have offered that Pascagoula amendment for the last time. [Laughter.] I stand here pretty much in the attitude of the man who visited General Jackson when he was President. He came on to Washington asking for the mission to England. It was refused him. He then asked a Cabinet appointment. That was refused him. He came down to a collectorship, and when that was refused him, he said he would put up with a clerkship. But that also was denied him. As a last dying hope he inquired of the old General if he could not give him a pair of old boots; and when they were refused, he swore he would not be a Jackson man any longer. [Laughter.] I have asked $60,000 to make improvements on the Pascagoula, and I have come down by little and little until now I ask only $2,000 for a survey. If you do not give it to me I shall certainly vote against this bill. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen do not seem to understand the value of the Pascagoula river. Let me tell them it is a river of national importance, and ought to be improved by the nation. Three rules have been prescribed by distinguished men for governing cases like this. One by General Jackson, another by Mr. Calhoun, and the third by some one else—I do not know who. This third party said a work to be national ought to be in salt water. But General Jackson thought you could improve up to the last port of entry on a river, whether it was on salt or fresh water; and Mr. Calhoun laid down the rule that a river flowing through three States could properly claim the jurisdiction and protection of the National Treasury.

Now, this improvement on the Pascagoula is in salt water; for it is in the Gulf of Mexico, and, besides, I understand there was a salt barge sunk there about ten years ago. [Laughter.] Then it may be called a port of entry; for the river at this point enters directly into the county of Jackson, in my State. The Pascagoula river flows through three States. It rises in a State of prosperity—it flows through a State of affluence—but it empties into a State of embarrassment. If, however, you will only give me this $2,000 to make the survey, I have no doubt it will empty, ultimately, into a State of extraordinary wealth, and that will make four States. I will not take less than $2,000 for this survey. That is the last and lowest proposition. If you do not give me that, I shall vote against the bill most certainly. [Laughter.] I believe you think I mean to do it, any how.

The question was then taken on Mr. BROWN's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. TUCK offered the following amendment to the bill:

For the construction of a sea-wall from Great Island to Goat Island, in Portsmouth harbor, New Hampshire, provided the same can be done, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, without increasing the current of water against said islands to any injurious extent, the sum of $21,313.

Mr. T. said: I offer that amendment in good faith, and I hope it will be adopted, because I believe it ought to pass. I propose this amendment for an improvement in Portsmouth harbor, and I will state this fact—although I do not pretend that it is a very strong argument in favor of the allowance of the claim—that there is not a dollar appropriated in this bill for my State. Now, sir, it is verified by the affidavits connected with the petition that I hold in my hand, that on the day on which those affidavits were made, there were no less than three vessels run aground, in consequence of the violence of the current, which may be remedied by erecting the sea-wall proposed. The petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Colonel Abert, of the Topographical Engineers, went into an estimate of the cost of the work, which is the sum mentioned in the proposed amendment, and Colonel Abert made a report on the subject. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that the main reason, if not the only reason, why the committee acted unfavorably upon the proposition was, that in the latter part of this report of Colonel Abert, he suggests the possibility that by erecting this sea-wall, the current might be increased to such violence as to do damage to the land. Now, sir, I have drawn my amendment in such a way, that if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, the rapidity of the current would be dangerously increased, there shall be no appropriation, and no erection of this sea-wall. Now, I submit that this amendment stands better than any of those which have been voted down, and that it stands equal to any of the few amendments which have been sustained by this committee. I hope that gentlemen will not vote it down, because they have got into the habit of voting down all amendments, but that they will grant us this little sum, which is less than our State ought to receive in the way of improvements. I state that in one day, no less than three vessels went ashore in consequence of the want of this improvement, which may be given us for the sum of $20,000.

The question was then taken on Mr. TUCK's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DISNEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SCUDDER. I offer the following as an amendment to the bill:

For the improvement of the harbor of New Bedford, Massachusetts, $10,000.

Mr. S. said: Mr. Chairman, we have sat and heard patiently the numerous propositions and arguments upon this bill from the western gentlemen, and I hope that New England will be heard in the same manner upon the points of imperfection which they may wish to point out and amend.

Sir, I hope this amendment will prevail. It is for the purpose of improving a very important harbor in New England—the harbor of New Bedford—one, perhaps, of the most importance in Massachusetts. In view of the whaling interest, there is no place in the United States, if in the world, that excels it.

The men and capital engaged in this department of industry, and which make this harbor their post, constitute more than one half of the whole so engaged in the United States. One half of all the oil and whalebone of the country is obtained by these ships. The number of ships, including a few smaller vessels, is about three hundred and thirty-one. Arrivals and departures of these ships are occurring daily at almost all seasons of the year. The object of this appropriation is to improve their harbor, so that their loaded ships may enter and depart without detention. I am informed that the harbor is so shallow that it is very difficult for loaded ships to approach the city or landings at ordinary tides, without being lightened; and that it is so narrow by reason of bars and flats that ships cannot move in and out conveniently without getting aground on one side or the other. Private industry and contribution have done much towards removing these obstacles, but they would be too onerous to the citizens if borne to the extent which would be necessary to render the facilities which are required. It is of general importance to the commerce of the country that this harbor should be deepened, and I now press it upon the attention of this committee.

I do not intend to censure the Committee on Commerce, as others have done, for leaving this and other appropriations out of their bill. I doubt not they have acted according to their best judgment; but I differ from them, and hope the amendment which I have now offered to them will be adopted.

The question was then taken on Mr. SCUDDER's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. FOWLER offered the following amendment to the bill:

For surveying the entrance to Taunton harbor, Massachusetts, with reference to its improvement, $1,500.

Mr. F. said: I am in favor of improving the harbors and navigable rivers of the country. I would make these improvements in the West, in the East, in the South, in the North. On this subject I am ready to shake hands with the friends of internal improvements across the Alleghany, across the Rocky Mountains. The bill now before us proposes to save men's lives, to save their property, to promote the wealth, prosperity, and happiness of the whole people. Imperfect as this bill is, I will go for it; but I am anxious to improve it by the addition of items that ought not to have been omitted. Among the omissions is Taunton harbor. This item was in the bill passed by this House last year, and ought, most assuredly, to be in this bill. The harbor of Taunton, Massachusetts, situated at the head waters of the eastern arm of the Narragansett Bay, is an important harbor. A large amount of merchandise is constantly passing in and out of that harbor. If a moderate amount of money were expended in the removal of rocks and shoals, that merchandise might be transported safely in vessels of a much larger size than can be employed at present. The necessary improvements can be made in a manner to secure permanent benefits to an enterprising community, whose business is connected not only with all parts of New England, but with the whole country—I may say, with every country on the globe. The eastern branch of the navigable waters of the Narragansett Bay, at the head of which stands the beautiful and thriving village of Taunton, in the rapid progress of commercial enterprise, has become a thoroughfare for a large amount of domestic and foreign merchandise. The amount of mercantile and manufacturing business done on that branch of the bay within the State of Massachusetts is exceeded but by few northern ports. I will mention a few items of merchandise transported upon these waters yearly: 500,000 bushels of grain; 50,000 tons of coal; 25,000 tons of iron; 20,000,000 feet of lumber; 100,000 casks of nails; 50,000 barrels of flour; 10,000 casks of lime; 6,000,000 bricks; 10,000 dozen of shovels, spades, and forks; 10,000 bales of cotton; 200,000 pieces of cotton and calico goods; 50 tons of anchors; 700 packages of Britannia ware; 40 tons block tin; 1,000 tons of provisions; besides numerous other articles. The aggregate amount of tonnage of the United States is 3,772,000 tons. The tonnage of Massachusetts is about 700,000 tons—greater than that of any State except New York. Massachusetts owns nearly one fifth of our whole tonnage, and she should by no means be overlooked. I hope this amendment will be sustained.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, demanded tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FOWLER and CARTER were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 74.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The following section of the bill was then read: "For the further improvement of the harbor of New York, by the removal of the rocks at Hellgate, $30,000."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether these rocks at Hellgate are in New York harbor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot make the inquiry, unless he makes an amendment to which it will be pertinent.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I do not wish to make any remarks. I only wish to make the inquiry for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Then I move to strike out the appropriation, for the purpose of giving the chairman of the Committee on Commerce an opportunity to reply.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I shall be happy to respond to the gentleman's inquiry, but I do not understand it perfectly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I want to know whether these rocks at Hellgate are in the New York harbor?

Mr. SEYMOUR. They are.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. How far are they from the Battery?

Mr. SEYMOUR. It is in the East river, near where it empties into the harbor of New York, and unites with the Harlem, a small river, coming from the North river.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether these rocks are not seven miles from the Battery?

Mr. SEYMOUR. No, sir; I do not think it is three miles. It is known to all navigators in that part of the country. It has been excavated, in part, by a French engineer. This is designed to remove the remaining portion, which I have no doubt it will.

The question was taken on Mr. BRECKINRIDGE's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER offered the following amendment:

For surveying the entrance to Taunton harbor, Massachusetts, with reference to its improvement, $1,200.

Mr. F. said: Mr. Chairman, I perhaps made a mistake when I was up before. I asked for $1,500, but the House could not go so large a sum.

Mr. CARTER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. FOWLER. I perceive the item just read in the bill, of $1,200 for the survey of the harbor of Port Jefferson, New York, with reference to its improvement passed unanimously. Now, I insert $1,200 for the improvement, of this port, and I hope the committee will also pass this. It is not necessary to say another word in reference to it.

The question being upon Mr. FOWLER's amendment,

Mr. FOWLER demanded tellers; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GREEN offered the following amendment: For the improvement of the harbor at Port Clinton, on Lake Erie, $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment a few days since for the removal of the bar at the mouth of the Sandusky river, which the committee rejected, although it will not be denied that it is a work of as much if not more merit than many of the appropriations contained in the bill now under consideration. It is of vast importance to the commercial interests of a large section of the northwestern part of the State which I in part have the honor of representing on this floor—a portion of the State whose interests have been heretofore entirely neglected. The amendment then offered, as well as the present one, is free from the objections made by the chairman and other members of the Committee on Commerce to almost every amendment that has been offered to this bill, that no survey and estimates had been made by the proper officers of the Government.

I have now before me, Mr. Chairman, the survey and estimates for making these two improvements, made by authority of Congress by the United States Topographical Engineers, showing the necessity and the practicability of the work at a moderate expense compared to their importance when completed. This report and estimates have been before the Committee on Commerce since the commencement of the present session of Congress, and I am afraid that they have been entirely overlooked by that committee, or that they have not received that attention which their importance demanded at their hands, or they would undoubtedly have placed them both, or one, at least, in the present bill.

The amendment I have just offered, Mr. Chairman, proposes the sum of $10,000 for the improvement of the harbor at Port Clinton, on Lake Erie, not so much on account of the local commerce of that place at present, for the country back of it is comparatively new, but filling up rapidly with a hardy and industrious population, who will compare in intelligence and energy with any portion of the Union, and who are rapidly developing the vast agricultural resources of that rich and fertile country which but a few years since was a wilderness. I say, sir, that it is not on account alone of the local commerce, but as a harbor of refuge for the protection of the general commerce of all the northern lakes, the extent and importance of which no gentleman in this House can be ignorant.

It will not be overlooked, Mr. Chairman, by the people interested in the improvement of the western lakes and rivers, that in the formation of this Committee on commerce not one single member of this House in the least interested in the commerce of the northern lakes or the great valley of the Mississippi has been placed upon that committee. The majority of them have no personal knowledge of the wants and interests of the West. It cannot, therefore, be expected that its interests should find that favor in the opinion of the committee necessary to protect the lives and property of its citizens. The West has nothing to hope for from Congress until western men shall exercise the power they have in this House, and demand from this Government at least an equal share in the distribution of the general fund for the general welfare.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I now desire to offer, as an amendment, a section which was in the bill of the last session. I offer the following:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Rio Grande, $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have, perhaps, already sufficiently explained the importance of this appropriation. It would result in an annual saving to the Government, of more than double the amount of the appropriation in transportation for the army. It has been earnestly recommended by the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster's Department.

The head of the Topographical Engineers objected to it at the last session, that the question of jurisdiction as to the channel had not been settled between the United States and Mexico. There was never anything in the objection, as the treaty gives to the United States the right of navigation of the river, and the Secretary of War overruled Colonel Abert, by saying it was a question for Congress. That officer, in resisting this improvement, has placed himself in direct opposition to the Secretary of War, who in his last report, urged it for military purposes. And as to the question of the jurisdiction, the survey of the Rio Grande will be completed by the Boundary Commission, before this bill can become a law.

There is no doubt that it is a national stream, as it separates this country from the Republic of Mexico, and its navigation is made national and common to both countries by the treaty. There has been a large commerce on the river ever since peace with Mexico, which would augment to ten or fifteen millions a year if adequate protection was given to that frontier.

The statement that there has been no survey, or estimate for the river, is wholly unfounded. There was a survey by Lieutenant Smith, one of the most accomplished officers in the Topographical Corps. He goes into a minute estimate of the whole work and sums up as follows:

Cost of outfit.....	$4,700
Amount of pay-roll, (for labor hands).....	12,350
Provisions.....	2,142
Total.....	$19,202

And concludes as follows:

"If we add one third of this amount to cover unforeseen accidents, delays, &c., there will result for the final estimate, $25,600."

He goes minutely into the consideration of each and every obstruction, and accompanies his report by a map showing its locality. The river, therefore, has been carefully surveyed, and estimated for by the officer who made the survey. It was in the bill of last Congress, but there is no justice to my district in the present bill.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SAVAGE offered the following amendment:

That the sum of $50,000 be appropriated for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Cany Fork and Cumberland rivers, above the city of Nashville, in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. Chairman, these are the only two navigable streams which touch the district I represent; and I can say further, that I represent upon this floor a district in which a single dollar has never been expended by the General Government for internal improvements. I am opposed to this whole system, but I am in favor of this amendment, for the reason that if such a system is to be put into operation, this ought to be made a part and parcel of it. It is a system which gives to a large portion of the people of the United States all the benefits which are claimed to be derived by the provisions of this bill for the respective localities to which they are applied; and though our rivers are not so large, yet I cannot appreciate that sort of logic, which would fail to give us the necessary means of improving those streams, and would give to others, whose navigation is by nature much superior to ours. The streams for which I ask this appropriation, it is true, are small, but their improvement is as much a matter of importance to my constituents, as is the improvement of the larger streams to the constituents of gentlemen representing the sections of country in which those streams are located. My constituents have ever been ready to sustain this Government by money and by men; and I ask that a portion of the benefits of this bill shall go to them; I ask gentlemen, who are so fortunate as to live upon larger streams than I do, whether they will vote these large sums of money, of which we pay an equal proportion, and, at the same time, refuse to give us a single cent? I say, we must ever regard a bill of that kind as a fraud upon our rights. Sir, a certain class, upon this floor, have put just enough into this bill to secure a majority of this House for the purpose of appropriating large sums of the public money to their own individual interest. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN] discloses the true state of facts, when he says he wants a portion of these appropriations reserved for the purpose of passing bills of this kind hereafter. The truth is, that if you were to make a bill fair and equal to all portions of the country, such a bill could not pass this House. One man could go home to his constituents, and tell them "I have brought you $50,000 to improve your river;" but let that constituency be able to tell him, "You have brought us home an appropriation to improve our rivers, but you have given an equal one to every other district in the country;" and they will not thank him for it.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GOODENOW. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GREEN offered the following amendment:

For the survey of Mouse Island and Ottawa City, on Lake Erie, with reference to the establishment of a break-water, $400.

Mr. GREEN called for tellers upon the adoption of the amendment; but they were not ordered.

The question was then put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EDGERTON offered the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Maumee river, in the State of Ohio, below the foot of the rapids, $20,000.

Mr. E. said: Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a few remarks in explanation of that amendment. There is no amendment which has been proposed to this bill which has more justice in it than this. The reason is, that there is now in the National Treasury, derived from those immediately interested in this improvement, the money which we ask for making it. It is known that, in 1815, the Government laid out Government lots at the foot of the rapids, near the side of Fort Meigs, now the town of Perrysburg. The Government officers intimated that that point would be the head of navigation in the Maumee river. The Government also reserved for itself, at the same time, the principal lots in the town of Perrysburg for a military post. For these reasons the people purchased lots at that point, at exorbitant prices, upon the supposition that Perrysburg and Maumee City, upon the opposite side of the river, were to be the head of navigation. In 1835, the Government ordered a survey of the Maumee river, upon which the estimated expense for making this improvement was $51,000. I now ask for $20,000 to commence making this improvement. It is absolutely necessary to the business of these towns at the foot of the Maumee rapids. The town of Perrysburg is the county seat of the county of Wood, and Maumee City is the county seat of Lucas county. The Government has, by its acts, indicated this as the head of navigation for that river, and the State of Ohio has, by means of locks and a canal, so increased the business facilities of these towns, that nothing is required but an improvement in the navigation of the river to add much to the commerce at the foot of the rapids. It is so for a good part of the year, and, during the prevalence of the southwestern winds, the waters are driven from the bay, and their navigation is impeded. This appropriation which is asked for is believed to be nearly sufficient to accomplish the object.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. EDGERTON, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to strike out "$8,000," and insert "$25,000" in the following clause:

"For the improvement of the channel at the mouth of the Cape Fear river, North Carolina, $8,000."

Mr. C. said: I know, Mr. Chairman, that this is an unfortunate time of the day to ask the House to listen to me for even three minutes, which is as much as I shall occupy at this time. We are anxious, I know, to get through the bill, and many of us would like to get our dinners; yet I hope the committee will hear me for a moment.

This sum of $25,000 is exactly what Professor Bache recommended for this work, as I have been informed by my colleague, [Mr. ASHE;] and it is to remove an obstruction which was put in the mouth of the Cape Fear river by the Government itself. Ten years ago, there was about fifteen feet of water upon that bar, and the Government, in endeavoring to protect the fort at Smithville, caused to be erected some piers, or jetties, which checked the current, and by reason of the deposit of sand, made the bar shallower, and also by throwing the current to the opposite shore, has greatly widened the river at that place, and rendered it much shallower than formerly. The consequence is, that the depth of water on the bar is reduced to only seven feet, and is becoming less every year, so that the harbor will possibly soon be destroyed. I hope gentlemen will remember, too, that there is not another harbor within one hundred miles of this entrance at the mouth of the Cape Fear, into which a vessel can go for refuge.

We ask that the Government will repair the mischief it has caused—do what it did for Great Britain in the harbor of Gibraltar. You will recollect that, some years since, the steamer Missouri sunk in that bay by a casualty, and somewhat obstructed the passage of the shipping there; and at the request of those interested, we appropriated, during the last Congress, the sum of $80,000 to remove that obstruction. There was the case of a vessel which was sunk by mere accident, and yet we felt it to be our duty to remove it. In the present instance the Government, by its own operations, has stopped up the harbor in the mode I have stated, and we only ask that the wrong done be remedied.

I would say, further, that this sum was asked for by Professor Bache, or his subordinates, and I understand it has been refused by the Committee on Commerce, upon the ground that they had already given $55,000 to North Carolina.

Why, sir, it is a little extraordinary that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce did not see that they had given about $250,000 to the State of New York, and North Carolina has—

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, (interrupting.) I only wish to say, I did not refuse my vote to it upon any such ground. I wished an appropriation put into the bill adequate to the purpose.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My colleague [Mr. ASHE] informs me that Professor Bache recommended $25,000. I was about to say that North Carolina has four times as much sea-coast as the State of New York, while they will not allow us one fourth as much money as they give to that State, and the navigation with us is perhaps more dangerous than upon the coast of any other part of the continent; and, sir, bear in mind, that there is not a port within one hundred miles of Cape Fear harbor, and the Government has thought proper, not by design, I admit, to obstruct it, and reduce the depth of the water from fifteen feet down to less than seven feet. Have we not a right, then, to demand an appropriation adequate to the removal of that obstruction? The commerce of the place, too, is rapidly growing, thanks to the enterprise of its inhabitants; and as soon as the improvements on the upper part of the river, now in progress, are completed, and the large coal-fields of that region are made readily accessible from tide-water, there must be a vast increase in the tonnage and shipping of that port. When the Government ought to be aiding us, it is too much that it should be throwing obstructions in the way. Upon the principles of common honesty, I feel that I have a right to demand of the committee an adequate appropriation.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and FLORANCE appointed.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLINGMAN's amendment, and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 73.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. CALDWELL. I move that the committee rise.

The question was put, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SAVAGE offered the following amendment:

That there be and is hereby granted to the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000 each, to aid them in making that part of the southwestern railroad lying between the village of Tullahoma, in the county of Coffee, in the State of Tennessee, and the town of Danville, in the State of Kentucky; and that the sums aforesaid be subject to the disposal of the Legislatures of said States, for the purpose aforesaid, and for no other whatsoever.

And be it further enacted, That the sums aforesaid are granted upon condition that the Legislatures of said States shall, in disposal thereof, secure to the United States stock in the railroad aforesaid equal in amount to the sums above appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that amendment not to be in order, as it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. I then propose the following amendment:

That there is hereby granted to the States of Tennessee and Kentucky the sum of $200,000, to aid them in building a ship-channel, or whatever other means of transportation the Legislatures of the said States may agree upon, between the village of Tullahoma, in the county of Coffee, in the State of Tennessee, and the town of Danville, in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. GOODENOW. I rise to a question of order. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposes an appropriation for building a ship-channel, and he thinks it is in order.

Mr. DUNCAN. I rise to a question of order. This amendment is similar to those which have been ruled out of order upon the ground that they were for the construction of canals. This is for the construction of ship-canals, and is not for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks an amendment in order for the construction of a canal around the falls of Louisville. It is germane to the bill.

Mr. GOODENOW. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this is a proposition to grant money directly to a State.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment to be in order. Does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. GOODENOW. I do not.

Mr. SAVAGE. This appropriation is intended for that portion of the country which I represent, and which is represented by the gentleman over the way, [Mr. WARD.] It is a portion of the country which has never received any benefit from the system of internal improvements, and this appropriation, if granted, will be the first ever obtained for that section of country, and I think would be the last they will ever ask for. It is the opinion of those best acquainted with the subject, that this sum would be amply sufficient to establish such a means of communication as will satisfy the wishes of that quarter of the country, and do more towards facilitating commerce between the northwestern and southern States than any appropriation that could possibly be made. It is in the direct line which connects Charleston with Cincinnati, and is a nearer route, by a hundred and ten or fifteen miles, than any other. I cannot assert that a ship canal is certainly practicable, but some mode of transportation ought to be established, and I leave that to the wisdom and discretion of the Legislatures of the two States, which have always been able to make a proper distribution of any funds which have been given into their charge. If they determine not to build a ship canal across the Cumberland—and I have no idea that it will be undertaken unless it can be accomplished—it will be left to their wisdom to consider other modes of transportation over this route, which, in my opinion, is of more importance to the States of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, Ohio, and Kentucky, than anything embraced in the bill. It is a practicable route, and much nearer than any other that can be found. It has now engaged the attention of intelligent men of that section of the country. I have been induced to present this amendment by instructions from my own constituents and those of gentlemen from Kentucky who have given the subject their fullest consideration. A line of communication between the town of Danville in the State of Kentucky, and Tullahoma, in the State of Tennessee, is desired, because it will connect that region of country with the northern States. It will be a connection between the northern and southern railroad, and the most rapid means of communication between Charleston and Cincinnati.

Mr. STUART. I am opposed to that amendment for several reasons, but I will only state one of them now for the information of the Chair hereafter. It proposes a grant of money to the States to carry out works, whereas this bill provides for granting money to improve works over which the General Government has power, and the States have none.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. SAVAGE was disagreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line one hundred and thirty-seven:

For the survey and improvement of the navigation of the Brazos and Guadalupe rivers, Texas, $30,000.

Mr. H. said: I wish simply to state, Mr. Chairman, that the Quartermaster General, in his annual report to the last Congress, asked for the improvement of the navigation of these rivers, for the purpose of military transportation. This appropriation is, therefore, applied for by the Government itself. Upon the application of the military commander of that division, a survey of these rivers was ordered; but subsequently, when the Department wished to cut down the improvements for the West, the head of the Topographical Engineer corps countermanded that order. The improvement of the navigation of those rivers according to the reports of the Quartermaster General, is highly necessary for Government purposes, and it must be apparent to all that it is necessary; for it has in that country, a large number of infantry with whom they can do nothing in the way of fighting or defense against mounted Indians. Some means of cheap transportation to them of pork and beans is absolutely necessary.

[Laughter.] I do not offer this amendment with the vain expectation that it will be voted into the bill, but I submit it to show the people who reside in that country that they stand no more chance of getting anything for the improvement of their rivers, than they do of getting protection of their men, women, and children, now subject to Indian inroads. But, sir, these rivers run through a large planting district which is as rich in soil as any other portion of the United States. There is a large production upon the banks of those rivers of cotton and sugar; and the emigration to Texas at this time is about as large as that to California. It is, therefore, manifest that these rivers are to contribute largely to commerce. They will furnish for exportation the great staples which will give rise to a foreign commerce. There is now exported from this section of country a large amount of cotton, and the region on these two rivers is filling up rapidly with a planting population. It is, together with the Trinity and Colorado, one of the most fertile planting regions in the Union.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. HOWARD was disagreed to.

Mr. STUART. I propose the following amendment, to come in after the one hundred and forty-third line:

For the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Kalamazoo river in the State of Michigan, $10,000; and $8,000 for the improvement of the harbor at South Black river in said State.

I shall not detain the committee a moment with reference to that amendment. I simply desire to say that it proposes appropriations for the improvement of two very important points upon the eastern shore of Lake Michigan—important, not only so far as regards local commerce, but highly important as harbors of refuge. Lake Michigan is known to be the most difficult of navigation in a storm, of the whole chain of lakes. More vessels in proportion to the number upon it, are wrecked, than upon any other. The winds usually prevailing are from the west, the northwest or the southwest, which invariably drive the vessels upon the eastern shore, upon which there is not a single harbor approachable in case of a storm. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The question was put and the amendment of Mr. STUART was disagreed to.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move to strike out the following:

“For continuing the improvement of the harbor of Cleveland, Ohio, $30,000.

“For the further improvement of the harbor of Fairport, at the mouth of Grand river, Ohio, $10,000.

“For the improvement of Black Lake harbor, Lake Michigan, $8,000.”

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000.

For the further improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Grand river, $8,500.

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Ashtabula, Ohio, $8,500.

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Conneaut, Ohio, $8,500.

Mr. Chairman, if I can obtain the ear of the committee, I will state the cause of my making this motion. In the first place, I say we ask nothing more from the Government than the committee have reported, although the appropriations for the district which I represent have been cut down from the recommendations of the Department, $35,000—more, perhaps, than any other district in the United States. The committee in their report have omitted the harbor of Conneaut. And here let me say, that my own personal interests are at Ashtabula and opposed to Conneaut; but I know the importance of that harbor; forty-six years ago last month I landed in that harbor, and for forty-six years I know that it has been a harbor of refuge for vessels in distress. The shores have been lined with vessels which have been wrecked, and the bones of many of our western people have been scattered upon it between that place and Erie upon the one hand, and that place and Ashtabula upon the other. The whole commerce of the lake—every sailor upon that lake is interested in the harbor of Conneaut; and I only ask the transfer of $8,000 from Cleveland, Fairport, and Ashtabula, to Conneaut. I do it upon my own responsibility, because I do not believe that there is an elector or citizen in the whole district but what will say that it is right and ought to be done. I do not believe there is a sailor upon the lakes but what will say it ought to be done. I say, upon my own responsibility, it ought to be done, and I hope the committee will do it, inasmuch as we ask for nothing more than what the Committee on Commerce have given us.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to; there being upon a division—ayes 23, noes not counted.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to insert the following at the end of line one hundred and eighty:

And $15,000 to repair the piers the Government has constructed at Big Sodus Bay, Wayne county, Lake Ontario, and to improve the harbor at that place.

I trust I may have the attention of the committee to this subject for two or three minutes. I am quite sure, if the amendment be understood, there will be no opposition to it. I hold in my hand the report of the Department with regard to this appropriation. I will read one or two extracts, showing the reasons upon which this application is made. I have only time to read extracts; the report is long. There is no place upon the American shore which possesses so great advantages for a harbor, or for a naval depot. Upon its importance as a naval depot, the report says:

“There is no place on the American shore which possesses greater advantages. The ease with which the harbor may be entered; its spacious and commodious bay, in which a large fleet may be maneuvered; its protection from ill winds, as well as from sudden incursions from an enemy; its position about equi distant from either end of the lake, by which it could afford prompt assistance to any point, all combine to characterize it as a highly favorable site for a naval depot. It can also be well defended by works upon the heights to the east and west of the entrance, to which the pier heads, properly modified, might be made powerful auxiliaries.”

The report upon the present condition of the piers the Government has constructed at this harbor, holds the following language:

“After the great length of time which has elapsed since the piers were constructed, it is hardly necessary to say, that they are much decayed from the water line and above; being made of timber cribs, loaded with stone, they now need extensive repairs. The officer in charge of the work, reports that the working season being far advanced when he arrived there, he had to confine his operations to the western and most exposed pier. A portion of it contiguous to the beach, had settled very much on the lake side. The planks being decayed and broken, or torn off and much of the loading of the cribs washed out. And on further examination it was found that many of the lower timbers were much decayed.

“The eastern pier being much sheltered by the one on the west, was not considered as requiring such immediate attention. Its condition, however, is very precarious, and the pier head has been seriously injured. The planks have been swept off, as well as one of the courses of timbers, and the stone in many places swept out.

“Big Sodus, about twenty-five miles from Oswego. This is an extremely fine bay, of great capacity and depth.”

The Department recommends $15,000 as necessary to keep these works in repair. This harbor is by far the most important harbor, touching any naval operations that may ever transpire upon that lake, that there is upon it. It is from five to six miles long, and from one to two and a half miles wide.

The Government, at an early day, seeing the importance of securing and protecting this harbor so that it might be available to it, laid out $143,000 in constructing piers about a mile long for its protection. Those piers are now in a condition which renders it absolutely necessary that there should be a small sum appropriated to preserve them from destruction. The sum contained in my amendment, is the sum reported by the Department as now necessary. This fine harbor has been abandoned by the Committee on Commerce without reason and against right, and it is the duty of this House to provide for its preservation. The committee has gone fifteen miles east to begin a new work, of which they know nothing, and which, though the very place has been surveyed, the Government has never recommended as a harbor at all. The course of the committee is not worthy of support. There are light-houses at Big Sodus; and the beacon light at the head of the pier is in imminent danger of being lost, in consequence of the state of the pier where it stands. The abandonment of this harbor is little else than to abandon the commerce of all the central part of the lake. As I have but five minutes, I cannot go into all the detail of its importance, but I can say every interest of commerce demands its improvement; and if it is defeated, I intend the responsibility of its defeat shall rest, where it belongs, with the Committee on Commerce and those who are sustaining it—the Democratic majority in this House. I ask a vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT.] Looking over this bill of more than a million, we find that the improvements along New York are as thick as mile-posts along a public road. I think they have had enough. When I look into this bill and see that they get over $200,000, and see that the great valley of the Mississippi gets but the same amount—a few thousand more—I think that gentlemen from New York ought to be satisfied. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. DEAN. I am satisfied.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no doubt of it. The gentleman who has proposed that amendment by which he is to get $15,000 to Little Sodus or Big Sodus, does not seem to be in the same fix as my friend near me. It is to his amendment I am speaking, and not to my friend near me, who has got all he wants, I have no doubt, and would have had more if he wanted it. The Hudson gets $50,000, which is the best navigable stream in the world, with but a single obstruction in it; and I have no doubt they could get $50,000 every year to the end of time if they demanded it. Why, the West have nothing—really nothing, and yet gentlemen are urging their amendments here to increase the amount which their State gets.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. We have been here five and a half hours, and I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. SACKETT's amendment, and being put, was not agreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE moved the following amendment:

At the end of line one hundred and eighty, on the eighth page, insert:

For the preservation and improvement of the pier at Great Sodus Bay, Wayne county, New York, $10,000.

Mr. W. said: This appropriation is not asked for the purpose of commencing any improvement, but to preserve a work which the Government have already been to a large expense in erecting. It is conceded, sir, and the reports show it, if you will look through them, that this harbor at Great Sodus Bay, is one of the most important harbors upon Lake Ontario. And as a harbor of refuge, (to say nothing of the business and commerce of the village situated there,) it is of almost incalculable importance to those engaged in navigating those waters. The Government have expended there about $140,000. The works, I believe, are built principally of wood, and it is a number of years since they were erected. They are no doubt somewhat decayed and dilapidated, and I understand that a week ago last Sabbath night, a small portion of the pier, in a gale that took place at that time, was carried away. I am informed by a gentleman of that place, and I have his letter to that effect, that the work for the distance of about half a mile will be liable to be carried off, unless the work is protected. I desire, sir, to read an extract from a letter which I have received, which shows the condition of this work:

"Great Sodus Bay, as you well know, is, by universal consent, admitted to be the best harbor on the northern frontier.

"These improvements long since suffered much from natural decay, through lapse of time, and need an appropriation for necessary repair, and the more urgently as the lake is higher this season than it has been in fourteen years before, giving to the storms a greater destructive power on the rotten and dilapidated piers than in low water of ordinary seasons.

"There is great danger that unless repairs be made before winter, nearly the entire east pier, of about half a mile in length, will be swept away, leaving the harbor entirely unsheltered from easterly storms, and rendering necessary a great outlay for rebuilding.

"It certainly cannot be the intention of the Government to adopt the 'penny wise and pound foolish' policy of going into heavy outlay for new works, and leave those already constructed to perish for want of slight repairs.

"Mr. Samuel Cole, disbursing agent for the Pension Office, has been recently at the point, and having visited the piers and inspected their condition, I refer you to him as a competent witness; but since he saw them, on Sunday night last the sea made a breach through the east pier, although the blow was by no means a heavy one, and nothing to compare with the storms of fall and winter, reinforced with floating ice."

Now, sir, my view in relation to this matter is, that for the purpose of saving to the Government what they will necessarily have to expend if they suffer this to remain as it is, it is better to make a small appropriation—say of $10,000—for the purpose of preserving this work, than to suffer it to be carried away, and the harbor to become entirely useless. That harbor is very essential and important to persons who navigate that lake. It is one that concerns the commerce of the country; and if it should be destroyed, those who carry on commerce upon that lake may suffer to a great extent. Prudence and economy require that the appropriation should be made.

The question was then put upon Mr. WALBRIDGE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EVANS moved the following amendment: For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee rivers, each, $15,000.

Mr. E. said: I do not intend to make a speech. I want, as an eastern man, to offer something for the western country. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The question was then taken upon Mr. EVANS's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SACKETT obtained the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whether there is not a law now in force, and whether it is not in his recollection, that the gentleman who served in the last Congress from the Oswego district, (Mr. Duer,) obtained the passage of a law authorizing the levy of a tonnage duty at that port?

The CHAIRMAN. These remarks are out of order; the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SACKETT moved the following amendment:

For the improvement of the harbor at Pulneyville, on Lake Ontario, $10,000.

Mr. S. said: The Committee on Commerce have adopted the idea of abandoning old and important works and taking up new ones.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is commenting upon the course pursued by the committee.

Mr. SACKETT. I think the committee deserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. SACKETT. That is precisely what I intend to do. This harbor is situated about twelve miles from the mouth of the Genesee river, and is most convenient and important as a harbor upon Lake Ontario. To illustrate its importance I will state that the committee in their report have abandoned the only good harbor upon that lake, where the Government has expended $143,000, and picked up a new work fifteen miles the other way from the one that I am now proposing, and which has never been recommended by the Government in any way whatever, on account of its importance as a harbor of refuge. The harbor I am now proposing to improve may be made a good harbor, and ought to be improved. It is of more, vastly more importance than Little Sodus, where the committee has recommended $10,000.

The question was then taken upon Mr. SACKETT's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. EWING moved that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK proposed the following amendment:

For repairing the pier and continuing the improvement of the harbor of Port Ontario, Lake Ontario, New York, $10,000.

Mr. B. said: I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, not with any view of embarrassing the passage of this bill—a bill which I regard as one of the most important and useful measures which has received the consideration of this House during the present session. Knowing the impatience of the committee, I only ask for a minute or two. I believe there is merit in my amendment, which should secure for it the favorable action of this committee.

This Government has already expended $50,000, or thereabouts, upon this improvement, and, although it was left in an unfinished state, the harbor was made accessible and useful to the commerce of the lake.

It was a leading object of the Government in making this improvement in the outset, to make a good and safe harbor of refuge in bad weather at a point where such a harbor was greatly needed. That object was accomplished, and, in addition, the improvement had the effect to increase considerably the commerce and navigation of this lake, as well as to make it more secure.

Though the construction of a railroad in the vicinity within the last year has impaired the business of this place, it is still the depot of a considerable amount of property for shipment on the lake; sufficient to make it worthy of note in considering the propriety of protecting the Government works at this point.

This harbor is situated at the mouth of Salmon river, a river which empties into Lake Ontario, not far from midway between Oswego and Sackett's Harbor, and it is the only port which a vessel of ordinary draught of water can make or enter, between those two places, which, by the shore line, are between fifty and sixty miles apart. This coast, between Oswego and Sackett's Harbor, is very much exposed in bad weather, and has proved fatal to many vessels and their crews before this improvement was commenced. A sad wreck of a fine ship, and the loss of the passengers and crew, on this coast, in 1835, had much influence in inducing the Government to commence this work in 1836.

The estimate submitted by the War Department to this Congress for this improvement is $20,000; but, appreciating the importance of making this bill a moderate one, I ask for only $10,000, one half of the estimate—a sum little, if any, above the amount required to repair and secure from entire destruction the present Government works.

I know, sir, from personal examination, the condition of the pier built at this point by the Government, and know it to be in a dilapidated and ruinous condition, and liable in every storm upon the lake to further serious injury, if not entire destruction.

Mr. Chairman, it is as a harbor of refuge mainly, that I urge this small appropriation for this work—a work of great importance to the already large and rapidly-increasing commerce of Lake Ontario. I sincerely hope my amendment will be adopted.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BABCOCK's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. EWING moved that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHOONMAKER. I offer the following amendment:

For the removal of the bar at the mouth of the river Rondout, in the State of New York, $20,000.

Mr. S. said: Mr. Chairman, I propose this amendment in compliance with the request of some of my constituents. It proposes to remove the bar from a stream out of which in 1851 plied regularly twelve steamboats, fifty sail vessels, and fifty barges. During the season of navigation in that year over seven thousand five hundred sail vessels and barges cleared from and were loaded in that stream, and the commerce of the stream is constantly increasing.

Mr. HART. I would inquire of the gentleman

if the river was not previously known as Esopus creek?

Mr. SCHOONMAKER. Yes, sir.

The question was then taken on Mr. SCHOONMAKER's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. EWING. I move that the committee rise, and I demand tellers upon that motion.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and upon a division, there were—ayes 6, noes 117.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. EVANS. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of Queestown creek, Maryland, $3,000.

Mr. Chairman, a large number of persons in Maryland are interested in this work. I do not design to detain the committee at this time, but I trust the amendment may be adopted.

The question was then taken upon Mr. EVANS's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. BOWIE. I offer the following amendment:

For removing the obstructions in the channel of the river Potomac, between the Long Bridge and the Aqueduct at Georgetown, and at the mouth of the Eastern Branch, $23,000.

Mr. Chairman, all are aware that the city of Georgetown sustained very great injury by the freshet this last spring in consequence of these obstructions. It is said, upon the best authority, that the town suffered damage of not less than $60,000 or $70,000. This results, as I am informed, by the construction of piers to the Long Bridge, and I think it no more than justice that some change should be made now. That bridge has been removed by act of Providence. In addition to this, I am told that there is a bar at the mouth of the Eastern Branch, which prevents vessels of great tonnage coming up to Washington, and up to the navy-yard, over that bar, on the other side of which there are twenty feet of water. The improvement I ask for here is of great importance to Government, as well as the citizens of this District. I hope that, as they are not represented upon this floor, that we will take them under our peculiar charge, and protect their interests.

Mr. DURKEE said: Mr. Chairman, I have been greatly surprised while listening to arguments made use of by gentlemen in opposing the passage of this bill. I allude to remarks made by honorable gentlemen representing important sections of the West. To me it appears that in this matter some of my western friends have not exercised that sagacity and good judgment which usually mark their public conduct. They complain that New York, Boston, and other Atlantic cities receive more than their share in this appropriation; that great injustice is done to western rivers, and that they will vote against the bill, unless it be amended so as to meet their views. Sir, admit that these complaints are well founded, it does not follow that the interests of the West require its Representatives to oppose the bill. Appropriations that are actually needed for the removal of obstructions in the harbors of our large importing cities, or the removal of obstructions in the Hudson river, against which so much has been said, are beneficial to the West as well as to the East. The improvement of the Hudson river, and of all the harbors on the great lakes, will certainly lessen the insurance and freight on goods passing over this route. When goods can be shipped from New York to Chicago for five dollars per ton, instead of fifteen, they will of course come that much cheaper to the consumer, and the value of produce shipped in return, necessarily enhanced in western markets. This argument, too, holds good in regard to appropriations for improving the mouth of the Mississippi. The removal of these obstructions benefits all the States lying on this great river and its tributaries. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will pause and weigh the subject well before they shall finally determine to give their influence against this measure, whether it may or may not be so amended as to meet their views.

There are other objections, Mr. Chairman, made against this bill. Gentlemen say they have scruples about the power of Congress to make such appropriations. But without entering upon a constitutional question, it strikes me as sufficient for our present purpose, to know that the General Government is in possession, and has sole jurisdiction of these harbors and rivers; that Congress has deprived the States of all authority to raise a revenue by way of tonnage duty for their improvement, and is therefore bound by the strongest possible obligations to make such improvements as are necessary for the safety of human life and the transportation of merchandise.

Sir, there is no getting away from this conclusion; for the General Government to hold possession and do nothing itself, nor let the States, is indeed acting the part of the "dog in the manger." This has been the policy for several years, at the sacrifice of thousands of valuable lives and an immense loss of property. Our internal commerce amounts to $800,000,000 annually, and yet is thus grossly neglected by the Government. One quarter per cent. on this large amount, expended annually upon our harbors and rivers, would, in a few years, put them in good condition for refuge and navigation, whereas we lose a much larger amount every year for the want of these improvements.

Sir, the people are beginning to inquire how this $50,000,000 is yearly expended—and well they may! Look at the immense sums misapplied by Congress. Two years ago, we appropriated $10,000,000 for the purchase of Texas scrip, at a par calculation, when it was worth only ten cents on the dollar. We have paid, during the last twenty years, $10,000,000 to officers of the Navy, who have not been employed on service. We have paid, or agreed to pay, about $20,000,000 to Wall street speculators, the effect of which is to sustain a monopoly in ocean steam navigation, thus depriving the people of all the advantages that might otherwise accrue from competition and cheap ocean postage. Yet gentlemen that could vote to appropriate public funds so liberally for the benefit of private corporations and individuals, have terrible misgivings about lending their support to a small harbor bill for the protection of a commerce of such magnitude. Sir, this surely is "straining at gnats, and swallowing camels." If this gross neglect, by the Government, of the lives and property of its people, and this profligate expenditure of the public funds, is to continue, and the great commercial interests of the country finally abandoned, I cannot see why the people should not in their turn abandon and dispense with such a Government. For what is the possible advantage to them in paying $50,000,000 a year, if they receive not the least equivalent in return?

Mr. Chairman, it would be well for us to call to mind, in this discussion, the origin and history of this Government. It was for the protection of commerce, and the lives of those engaged in it, that it was called into being. Great Britain infringed on the laws of a legitimate trade in America, the States formed an alliance to resist these aggressions; this was the origin of the Federal Government. We had no other necessity for its creation—we have no other for its continuance. The State governments are competent to protect and maintain all our civil and political rights, except those involved in commercial relations. If, then, the Federal Government is to disown all care and responsibility over four fifths of the whole commerce of the country, and refuse to give up its jurisdiction over harbors and rivers to the States immediately connected with these interests, it will become necessary for the people to provide a remedy for such grievances, and let me tell gentlemen they will not fail to do it. Sir, let Congress pass this bill, and extend its fostering care over this immense accumulation of American industry, at least till some better method shall be instituted for such protection.

Mr. WARD. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

For the improvement of the Cumberland river, $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to make a speech. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] for the lecture which he has given me for my pertinacity in urging the necessity of improvements for western rivers. I urged them from a consideration of their vast importance, and I think that they are worthy the consideration of this House. I believe that the amendment which I now propose ought to be adopted.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to make an inquiry of the honorable gentleman. Is this the same Cumberland river? [Laughter.]

Mr. WARD. Identically the same, and one well worthy of your consideration and mine.

Mr. EWING moved that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. BOWIE's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. FLORENCE. I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Delaware river, commencing at a point opposite Pine street, in the city of Philadelphia, extending along the said river the entire front of the district of Southwark, and thence to the southern line of the township of Passyunk, in the first Congressional district of Pennsylvania, being the points of the northern and southern boundaries of the eastern line of said district, or as much further north or south as competent engineers may designate after such actual and careful survey as may be proper, to deepen the channel of said Delaware river, so as to secure a sufficient depth of water to enable the authorities entrusted with the duty, to securely harbor and safely dock any United States vessel-of-war of the tonnage of the largest ship-of-the-line upon the United States dry-dock at the United States navy yard, in the county of Philadelphia, and to facilitate this purpose, the extension of the wharf line be authorized, as much further out as may be deemed proper to build a pier, by which the purpose indicated may be attained, $50,000.

Mr. Chairman, I submit this amendment in good faith, because it is of the utmost importance, and will be advantageous to my constituents, the first object nearest my heart. Whether this amendment is passed or not, I deem it proper to say I intend to vote for the bill now before the committee. The self-evident necessity of the improvement I suggest, opposite the city of Philadelphia, is so strongly impressed upon my mind that I need say but little in its favor; but for that I ask the ear and attention of the committee. There is not now a sufficient depth of water for the purpose of securely docking "a ship-of-the-line" at the United States navy-yard, Philadelphia. An appropriation of $50,000 will be sufficient to enable us to deepen the channel, and by that means to securely dock a ship-of-the-line. This will, in the accomplishment, give employment to a large number of clever, frugal, and industrious people living in my district. That is the impelling motive which induces me to offer this amendment. With the declaration of this fact, and with the reasons I offer, which to my mind are clearly irresistible, I earnestly hope that an amendment of so much consequence as this is, of so much advantage to my constituents, of so much importance to the United States, in securing the use of the United States dry-dock, a work which cost the large sum of $842,000 to construct—I repeat, sir, I earnestly hope the sum named in the amendment may be appropriated. I want to make the United States navy-yard at Philadelphia a favorite place with the Government for the employment of our skillful artisans and mechanics.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks are out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Very well, sir, I will not detain the committee longer. I desire a vote upon the amendment I have offered to hasten on business. I may say, however, again, that whether it is passed or not, I shall support the bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, now under consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] if this amendment is to make an appropriation to prevent Pea Patch Island from washing away?

Mr. FLORENCE. I will offer an amendment, if the gentleman will vote for it, to build a fort there. At all events, I will be gratified if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will vote for the amendment I have offered. He will aid in accomplishing a good purpose, I assure him. Besides, he will have the thanks of all classes of people in and about Philadelphia, especially those I have the pleasure and honor to represent upon this floor. If it was in order, I would clearly prove and explain the indifference which I think has been exercised toward our navy-yard, and the want of proper appreciation of our skillful mechanics. At a more favorable opportunity, I assure you all, I will do so. I hope my amendment may meet the approval of the committee, and be passed.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. FLORENCE, and decided in the negative.

Mr. STRATTON offered the following amendment:

For the erection of a breakwater on Crow Shoal, at Cape May roads, New Jersey, $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to make a five-minutes speech on the amendment I have just offered, but I desire to say that no proposition contained in the bill before the committee, is, in my judgment, more deserving their approval.

The attention of Congress was a few years since called to the importance of the proposed work, by resolutions of the State of New Jersey, and numerous petitions of citizens of that State, engaged in the coasting trade.

A survey of Cape May roads, including Crow Shoal, was made under instructions of the Secretary of War, by Major Bache, of the Topographical Engineer Corps. His report shows that the proposed breakwater can be advantageously constructed, and that it will afford great security to the trade intended to be protected.

The Committee on Commerce in their report, say that they have carefully examined the subject, which is important from its involving the protection of life and property, and that the practicability of erecting this work, is fully shown by the able report of the engineer.

The report of the engineer shows that the "commerce of the Delaware is carried on through two channels communicating with the sea. The main, or ship channel, enters by Cape Henlopen, and is capable of receiving vessels of the largest class; the New England channel, by Cape May, is limited to a draft of twelve feet." Vessels passing through the first-named channel, are protected by the breakwater near Cape Henlopen. To protect the trade passing through the latter, is the object of erecting the proposed breakwater.

"The Cape Henlopen channel is generally used by the foreign trade, and by the coasting trade south of the Delaware, while the Cape May channel is preferred by the coasting trade east of the Delaware.

"The great increase of this trade has greatly increased the necessity of this work."

The committee, in closing their report, say "that influenced by a sense of duty to afford every proper protection to prevent loss of life, to protect the great and increasing trade passing through this channel, and by the various considerations presented in their report—in their opinion this work should be erected."

The question was then taken on Mr. STRATTON's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HOW, of New York. I offer the following amendment:

For continuing the improvements at the harbor of Big Sodus, county of Wayne, and State of New York, and for repairs of the same, $12,000.

The question was then taken on Mr. How's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. ASHE. I offer the following amendment:

And he it further enacted, That the commissioners of the town of Wilmington, North Carolina, be authorized to levy and collect a tonnage duty, not exceeding four cents per ton, upon all vessels not less than sixty tons, for the purpose of clearing out the obstructions in the mouth of Cape Fear river, and that to effect that purpose the said commissioners to pledge the receipts from the said tonnage duty to pay the interest or principal on any loan they may effect for that purpose: Provided, That the Legislature of North Carolina, at its next session, order and authorize such a tonnage duty.

Mr. SEYMOUR. That amendment is not germane to the bill, and therefore not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has previously entertained a motion of that kind, and he considers it as in order.

Mr. ASHE. My friend from New York [Mr. Seymour] cannot see anything in order but what is consistent with his own notions. I have a few remarks to make upon this amendment. On yesterday I offered an amendment, in which I explained, in a very few words, the difficulties under which the town of Wilmington labored—the first town in the State of North Carolina, and the most enterprising one in the whole South. These difficulties were laid before the Committee on Commerce. They were informed of the fact that all the improvements in North Carolina concentrated at that single point, and that the bar in the river there has been gradually filling up, until now there are only eight or nine feet of water. These facts I am authorized to state upon the authority of Professor Bache and others, who have examined the work.

This amendment asks no privilege of the Government but what was granted to the city of Savannah, in Georgia, fifty odd years ago for the removal of similar obstructions.

Now, sir, it is proposed to cut off my State from all the benefits of this bill because, forsooth, I am not one of those Democrats who will vote for this thing and that thing, and everything, and because I will not vote for this bill. I have been asked if I will vote for this bill. As an honest man, I cannot vote for it, but as an honest Representative, I ask this House to allow the city of Wilmington to tax its own tonnage, in order to remove the obstructions which have been put there by your Government to protect your fortifications, and which fill up the only harbor that is of any consequence to that town. I ask you, as a favor to the people of Wilmington, not to expend Government money, but to allow them, by and with the consent of the Legislature of North Carolina, to levy tonnage duties which will operate against themselves, in order to raise money to put themselves in a better position. The request is reasonable and just, and now that the magic spell which prohibited all amendments has been broken, and several important amendments have been ingrafted on the bill, I hope the committee will not refuse it, but will grant us this mere act of justice to enable us to survive at least until another Congress can be elected. I ask for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VENABLE and McNAIR were appointed.

The question was then put upon Mr. ASHE's amendment; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it in order for me to move to amend the amendment which has just been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been adopted, but an amendment to come in at the end of it would be in order.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, moved to amend the following item of the bill:

"For removing the raft of Red river, $50,000,"

by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of War be authorized to contract for keeping the channel of Red river open at the point now obstructed by raft for one year after the removal thereof.

Mr. M. said: I will not detain the committee one minute, but I feel the necessity of this amendment in order to make the appropriation at all effective. It is absolutely necessary that these obstructions should be kept out for a year or two after they are removed, otherwise they will immediately re-form. These obstructions are composed of drift timber, that floats down the river and stops at this point, where it is narrower than it is above; and, if it is kept open for a year or two, the current of the river will cut out its own channel, so as to make it perfectly clear, as has been done below this point. The raft originally existed about one hundred and sixty miles below where it at present exists, but that portion of the river is now perfectly navigable.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Moore's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I propose to add to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ASHE,] which has just been adopted:

And the same privileges are granted to the State of New York that are granted to the State of North Carolina.

I offer that amendment for the purpose of making a few remarks. I do not propose to resist the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina any further here, but to meet it in the House. One of the very purposes for which the Constitution was formed, was to prevent this rivalry of ports, to prevent undue tonnage being levied at one port different from that which might be levied at another. That was one of the great objects in the formation of the Constitution. The amendment which this committee has adopted gives to the city of Wilmington power to levy tonnage duties, not only on her own commerce, but on the commerce of New York, Maryland, South Carolina, and all other parts of the United States. It vests the State of North Carolina with the absolute power of doing this. If a like privilege is given to the State of New York, it will be within our power to tax the whole commerce of the United States to any extent our State Legislature may will, and thus to have the whole commerce of the United States subservient to our State legislation.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Do it.

Mr. BROOKS. Why, if we were to tax our immense commerce one sixteenth part of a cent, we should raise an enormous revenue—enough to carry on our Government. The principle is wrong; but if the privilege is given to Wilmington, it must be given to all the ports on the Mississippi and Ohio.

Mr. ASHE. I ask the gentleman if it has not been given to Savannah and to Baltimore?

Mr. BROOKS. I know of but one case in which it has ever been granted, and that was to Baltimore. It was refused to Oswego at the last session of Congress.

Mr. ASHE. It has been granted to Savannah.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order. I submit whether it is in order for my colleague to speak in opposition to his own amendment?

Mr. BROOKS. I am not doing so. I am arguing to show that if this privilege is granted to Wilmington, or any other city, it must be granted to New York, also. I am arguing to show the immense benefit which we might derive from tonnage duties of this sort levied by our people upon the commerce of the United States. But I did not rise to delay the action of the committee on this bill. I merely rose to call attention to the principle involved in the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina. I have no doubt we can defeat it in the House, or vote it down on the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I entirely disagree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] in respect to this question of the tonnage duty, and as to the history of the adoption of the clause in the Constitution in respect to it. If the gentleman will look into the history of the formation of the Constitution, he will find that that privilege was granted with express reference to these improvements, and the contemporaneous expositions of the Constitution bear out the history of that formation in this respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, and no doubt the committee, would probably like to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, but the Chair must remind the gentleman that he is speaking in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, sir, I desire simply to state one fact. The gentleman from New York says that the city of Baltimore is the only one to which this privilege has been extended. Now, one of the earliest acts of the Government was to authorize the laying of a tonnage duty, for the purpose of removing an obstruction from the Savannah river, in the State of Georgia, and that act was renewed for many successive sessions, and at that day no man in Congress believed that the General Government had any authority to remove that obstruction in any other way than by authorizing the State to levy a tonnage duty.

Mr. FLOYD. Is it in order to offer a substitute to my colleague's amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. FLOYD. I offer the following substitute:

The consent of Congress is hereby granted and declared to the passage and operation of any law which any State shall hereafter pass, to lay a duty of tonnage, for the purpose of improving the harbors and rivers in such State.

The amendment which I have had the honor to submit, is in phraseology in accordance with the Constitution and the acts heretofore passed by Congress. From 1790 to 1850, there have been no less than thirty-six laws passed by Congress, giving its consent to different States to lay tonnage duties for particular improvements and for specified time. Acts of that description have been passed for the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama; so that there is nothing new in the principle of the proposition which I now make to this committee. It is merely making it a general proposition instead of limiting it to a particular city, or to a particular port for a specified time.

In regard to the Constitution, I think my honorable colleague [Mr. Brooks] was mistaken in the view he expressed. Mr. Madison says the right of laying tonnage duties was reserved by the States, subject to the consent of Congress, for the express purpose that the different States might lay tonnage duties to improve their harbors. Such is the commentary of Mr. Madison upon this clause of the Constitution; and in corroboration of that there is this fact, that for thirty years after the formation of the Constitution, this right was never asserted or exercised by Congress. The danger of which my honorable colleague seems to be afraid, consists in this; that one State will lay tonnage duties which will be injurious to the commercial interest.

Now, in my opinion, you cannot have a better guarantee than the particular interest of each State that it will not lay an improper or oppressive duty which will embarrass commerce in its own ports, in addition to which Congress can prevent any abuse of this right by withdrawing its consent. It is not intended by this proposition to affect the other portions of this bill, nor do I anticipate that it will have that effect; but I am fully impressed with the belief that this power may be better and more wisely exercised by the States than it ever has been by the General Government. My colleague—the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. SEYMOUR]—has already informed the committee that so uncertain are these appropriations by the General Government that many of the rivers and channels have been made worse rather than better by the improvements which have been commenced. Now, if they are undertaken and carried on by the States, they may be commenced and carried on with a certainty of revenue arising from these tonnage duties, and with some sort of system which may, perhaps, result in good. I am informed by gentlemen upon the Ohio river that it is a question whether much more harm has not been done upon that river than good, by the works which have been commenced there.

Mr. CARTTER. I am opposed to the last amendment. Without entering into a discussion of the constitutional power, and without reference to its history, it is enough for me to know that the Federal Government has been engaged ever since its existence in making appropriations for opening up its external commerce, and I am opposed to delivering up into the hands of the State of New York or any other State this power.

Mr. ASHE. I beg leave to ask my friend from Ohio when this system commenced by the General Government?

Mr. CARTTER. It commenced with the very existence of the Federal Government.

Mr. ASHE. For many years there were no appropriations of this kind by the Federal Government. I think the gentleman will find that the gentleman from New York is right in his statements in reference to this matter.

Mr. CARTTER. I object to this amendment especially, for the reason that one solitary State in this Union now forms the gateway to nearly all the commerce of the nation; and especially to all the commerce of the great West. I protest against the principle that will deliver up to the State of New York the power of determining what duties shall be imposed upon the commerce of the West. Why, sir, the history of the State of New York is a history of subsidy upon the part of the western States to her support. We have constructed her internal improvements. We have supported her government, and this proposition, if carried into effect, would serve to bring us into the same subordination in reference to our external commerce. Her harbors are now prepared for free trade with all the earth—all the oceans of the earth; and now to deliver into her hands the power of levying a tribute upon the commerce which must pass that gateway, would be a folly in legislation against which I enter my protest.

The question now being upon the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. FLOYD demanded tellers; but they were not ordered.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. FLOYD's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. BROOKS's amendment, and being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. STANLY's substitute to the whole bill, [heretofore published in the Globe.]

Mr. STANLY. I hope the question will now be taken upon that substitute without further debate.

[Loud cries of "Question!" "Question!"]
Mr. STANLY demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. BROOKS and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 85.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. YATES. I offer the following amendment, upon which I call for tellers:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river, $25,000.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was not agreed to—ayes 7, noes not counted.

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I rise to a question of order. I submit that it is not in order, after the bill has been read through by sections and has been amended, and after a substitute for the whole bill has been offered and rejected, to amend the bill or alter it in any manner except by offering an additional and independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order to go back and insert an amendment in any portion of the bill. The committee have passed upon this bill, and it is not in order to insert an amendment into any part thereof. The point was made, the Chair recollects, when the bounty land bill was under discussion. The Chair then so decided. An appeal was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by the committee.

Mr. WARD offered the following amendment:

For the improvement of the navigation of the Cumberland river, $30,000.

Mr. W. said: Mr. Chairman, I desire to urge, as a parting admonition, upon the friends of internal improvement, this my last appeal, before I place myself in the ranks to which I have never yet attached myself upon this particular subject. But, sir, my district has rights—

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to the explanation of his particular amendment.

Mr. WARD. I am in order, and intend to apply my remarks.

Mr. CARTTER. I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to the merits of the amendment.

Mr. CARTTER. He is talking about political alliances.

Mr. WARD. The interest involved in that stream is clearly of a national character, and that interest has been entirely overlooked by the Committee on Commerce. We are, as it were, expatriated from our own country; we are exposed to continual losses from the accumulation of snags in that river since 1838, and I hope and trust that this committee, who have the power of making appropriations towards the various objects in various portions of this Union, will exercise that power in favor of justice, and with a due regard to the interests I have the honor to represent. I know that gentlemen who feel not, and see not as I do, may look upon me as unnecessarily troublesome in this matter. But they do not behold the difficulties which surround the district which I represent. They know not the losses daily sustained there. I know them all, and feel them more keenly than they can, and I now appeal to this committee, as I have on previous occasions, not that I desire to be troublesome, but that my district should be properly regarded by this House; so that, when money is paid out of the Treasury, she should receive her proportion to prevent those losses of lives and property she is daily suffering.

The navigation is six hundred miles in extent, and the annual trade amounts to from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, and it has been regarded as a national stream since 1832, and the only reason that I did not go before the Committee on Commerce was, that I knew that that committee would report to the Committee of the Whole House, which had power, independent of that committee, on this subject, or any other, and also the right to say where money should be appropriated and used. They have the right to overrule the recommendation of the committee upon a subject of that sort, and believing that when a claim was made out worthy of the consideration of this House, they would hear and respond to it, I rested content.

Mr. WARD demanded tellers upon his motion; which were ordered; and Messrs. BOCCOCK and HARRIS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 72.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move now to strike out all after the enacting clause.

Mr. EVANS. I rise to a question of order. The committee have agreed to the sections in this bill, and it is not in order to move to strike out what the committee have inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is immaterial when that amendment is offered, whether before the committee proceeded to the consideration of the bill, or afterwards. The committee can proceed to perfect the bill, and then it is in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause.

Mr. EVANS. Is it in order to go back and move to strike out any particular portion of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That could not be done, but the Chair thinks it in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause.

Mr. BROOKS. Would it be in order for me to move, for instance, to strike out the appropriation for James river?

The CHAIRMAN. Not by itself, but with all the rest after the enacting clause.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If that motion, to strike out all after the enacting clause, is carried, will not that be a rejection of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be if the House confirms the report of the committee; not without.

Mr. JONES. I submit whether the committee can reject a bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can easily decide the question for themselves.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers upon the motion; which were not ordered.

Mr. C. then asked for a division of the House. The House was divided on the motion, and there were—27 in the affirmative, and 76 in the negative; no quorum voting.

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

[Cries "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

The CHAIRMAN. There is a motion pending, and a motion that the committee rise and report the bill is not in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. There was a mistake in the count.

Mr. JONES. The Chair announced that there was no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has a right to ascertain by tellers whether there is a quorum or not.

The Chair appointed Messrs. CHANDLER and HAMILTON as tellers.

Mr. COBB. What is the question?

The CHAIRMAN. It is upon striking out all after the enacting clause.

The question was then again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 91.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. POLK proposed the following amendment:

Provided, however, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be drawn from the Treasury, unless the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands shall be sufficient to satisfy the same.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to consume five minutes in the discussion of this amendment. But if the bill known as the Bennett bill, distributing the public lands to the different States, or if the various railroad bills now pending shall pass into laws, and the public lands are consumed in that way, I would like to know where this money is to come from? If we dispose of all the public lands, we must take the money from other sources of revenue; and I am unwilling to embarrass the Treasury, by taking the means which should be otherwise appropriated, and squandering them upon rivers and harbors. I merely state the proposition, without intending to argue it.

The question was then taken on Mr. Polk's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. WELCH. I desire to offer an amendment.
Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of order.
The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] had the floor, and moved that the committee rise. It is not in order to take the floor from him to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. So long as gentlemen offer amendments, the Chair is obliged to entertain them.

Mr. SKELTON. I make the point of order, that, after a motion is made that the committee rise and report the bill, it is out of order to receive an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SKELTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it in order to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] how the revenue can be raised? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" all over the Hall.]

Mr. WELCH offered the following amendment:

For surveys and estimates, with a view to the construction of artificial dums and reservoirs on the head waters of the Ohio river, for the improvement of its navigation, upon the plan proposed by Mr. Elliott, $50,000.

Mr. WELCH. I do not intend to discuss the amendment, but I want a vote upon it.

[Cries of "That's right!" "That's right!"]
The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I renew my motion, that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. STANLY. I have an amendment to offer. The amendment was as follows:

For the improvement of the Illinois river, $50,000; for the improvement in the Tennessee river, $50,000; and for the improvement of the Cumberland river, $30,000.

Mr. STANLY obtained the floor, and yielded it to

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, who moved that the committee do now rise; which motion was disagreed to.

Tellers were demanded and ordered; and Messrs. MASON and VENABLE were appointed.

Mr. CARTER, (in his seat.) We Whigs want to defeat the river and harbor bill. [Laughter.]

The question was then put, and the committee refused to rise; the tellers having reported—ayes 38, noes 80.

Mr. STANLY. If our western men upon both sides of the committee stand up to the amendment I have submitted, we can adopt it. I have offered it because I thought the West should have justice done it, after the legislation of this Congress has done so much for the North and East. I have hitherto voted against the various amendments which have been presented, because I had reason to hope that the substitute I offered, which does more justice to the West, would be adopted by the committee. That has not been done. The Illinois is an important river, and so also are the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers important. There is no provision in this bill for them; and if our friends from the West will stand up and vote for appropriations for these three important rivers, they can be attended to. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SACKETT. I offer the following substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina:

At the end of the bill add:
For the improvement of the Ohio river above the falls at Louisville.....$80,000
For the improvement of the Ohio below the falls.....40,000
For the improvement of the Mississippi below the mouth of the Missouri.....65,000
For the improvement of the Mississippi above the mouth of the Missouri.....65,000
For the improvement of the Cumberland river.....40,000
For the improvement of the Tennessee river.....40,000
For the improvement of the Illinois river.....40,000
For the improvement of the Arkansas river.....40,000
For the improvement of the Missouri river.....40,000
For the improvement of the piers and harbor of Big Sodus Bay on Lake Ontario.....15,000

For the improvement of the harbor at Pultreyville, Lake Ontario.....10,000
For the construction or purchase of snag boats for the Mississippi, Ohio, Missouri, and Arkansas rivers.....100,000
$525,000

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. SACKETT was disagreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. STANLY.

Mr. STANLY demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HAYEN and RICHARDSON were appointed.

The question was then put, and the amendment was disagreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 56, noes 68.

Mr. FLORENCE. I offer the following amendment, that I may be enabled to make an explanation:

And provided further, That in the event of a reduction of the revenue below the sum necessary for the ordinary expenses of Government, the duties upon iron be increased to forty per cent. ad valorem; that amount coming within the revenue point, and approved by a late distinguished Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

[Cries all over the Hall of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I desire, before that motion is put, to submit the following amendment:

For the improvement of the Ohio river above the Falls at Louisville, $25,000.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will yield I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield for that motion.

Mr. LETCHER. I then move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put, and the committee refused to rise.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not participated in the discussions upon the various amendments which have been offered to this bill, from the fact that I took occasion at an early period of the session, to express my views at large upon the subject of internal improvements. I desire the adoption of this amendment for the purpose of carrying out, to some extent, the principles which control me in relation to these improvements. I am now, as I always have been, in favor of a system of internal improvements by the General Government, but I desire, whenever it is to be adopted, to embrace equality to all the various sections and interests of this great Confederacy.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of order. My colleague is making metaphysical discriminations. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is wonderful that my colleague is able to discover it! I say, sir, that injustice has been done to the western rivers. There appear to be in this House a combination on the part of the sea-board, and—

[From the loud cries of "Order!" "Order!" and the general confusion pervading the Hall, the remainder of the sentence could not be heard by the Reporter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. You cannot get clear of me in that way. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Yell on, gentlemen, I have been in just such rows as this before; here and elsewhere. I say there is a combination on the part of the sea-board—[Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Go on!" "Go on!" and I denounce it! A combination has been formed by those representing the interests of the northern lakes and eastern sea-board, against the great rivers of the interior. They are the only passengers in this omnibus, and the mighty valley of the Mississippi is again cast off with a mere pittance.]

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I ask that the rule be enforced upon the gentleman, as well as it has been upon others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds it difficult to enforce rules of order upon a great many. The gentleman's remarks are out of order. He must confine himself to an explanation of his amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am showing that the inequality of the provisions of the bill is a reason why the amendment should be adopted. That is certainly in order, though it is difficult to get a great many to so understand it just now.

Mr. FLORENCE. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I offered a proviso here for the purpose of informing the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] how revenue may be raised, if the calamity occurs which he so much fears, in the event of the passage of the land bills to which he refers; but it is not in order, alas! for the Old Keystone and her resources, which, but for that, might be benefited. It is the means, however, of forcibly illustrating the expressive lines of Hudibras—

"Ah, me! what troubles do environ
The wight who meddles with cold iron!"

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order, and he will please take his seat.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This is not the first evidence of combinations of this sort that I have seen made in this House. I remember during the last Congress, of our effort on the part of protection—[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] I am merely showing the means resorted to for the purpose of carrying measures partial in their character. And I only desire to add that western Democrats, after all their Buncombe speeches in favor of western rivers, have aided to carry out this unequal system by voting as they have done, with scarce an exception, against the substitute of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] which offered liberal appropriations to western States.

Mr. POLK. This rule has been enforced upon all others, and I do not see why it should be tolerated upon the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FLORENCE. Most assuredly, for it was enforced upon me. I insist upon its enforcement. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order. His time, however, has now expired.

Mr. EVANS. I must confess that I feel surprised at the course of remark indulged in by the gentleman from Ohio, when he proclaims to the House of Representatives, that east of the Alleghanies there is unfriendliness towards the great improvements of the West.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will feel itself constrained to call the gentleman to order.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] offered an amendment containing appropriations for the improvement of western rivers and harbors, and he voted for it, and I did the same thing. Opposition, sir, came to it from quite other quarters. I do not know whether the gentleman voted for it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to call the gentleman to order.

Mr. EVANS. I want the country to know that the Democrats from his own portion of the country are at heart opposed to these measures—[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Order!"] The sincere friends of these river and harbor improvements are the Whigs of the East and the Whigs of the West—[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] Ah! you are endeavoring now to cry down and suppress the utterance of the truth; but I, like the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] have been in just such crowds before, and mean to say my say.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair had the power to command the Sergeant-at-Arms, he certainly would preserve order in this committee. The gentleman is out of order, and he will please take his seat.

Mr. EVANS. I want to see these appropriations passed.

A MEMBER. Let the riot act be read. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. This is a branch of the American Congress, a body which is respected throughout the world, and the Chair hopes that the committee will throw itself upon its dignity for a few moments, and the bill will be reported and passed.

Mr. EVANS. I have not heard what the Chair has been saying, there is so much noise in the Hall. I am in order. Let others be kept quiet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32<sup>d</sup> CONGRESS, 1st Session.

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 126.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. CAMPBELL was rejected.

Mr. EVANS. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the bill:

For the improvement of the Missouri river, $51,100; and for the improvement of the Illinois, Cumberland, and Tennessee rivers, each, $33,000.

I do not intend to occupy a moment in discussion. I only make the assertion, that if the pretended particular friends of western harbors and rivers will come up and join with eastern and western Whigs, we can pass this amendment. I demand tellers upon it.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cobb and Hart were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was disagreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 55, noes 70.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House; which motion was agreed to.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 282, making appropriations for certain harbors and rivers, and have directed him to report back the same, with sundry amendments.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled, bills with the following titles:

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of James C. Watson, of Georgia;

An act to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads and macadamized turnpikes passing through the public lands belonging to the United States; and

An act to establish additional land districts in the State of Wisconsin; which several bills received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the question may be taken upon the adjournment.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. No question is in order, except the question for adjournment.

Mr. DEAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 56, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Babcock, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Dawson, Dimmick, Dunham, Edmundson, Ewing, Ficklin, Gilmore, Hamilton, Isam G. Harris, Hendricks, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, Letcher, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McMullin, McQueen, Milson, Morehead, Murphy, Oids, Orr, Phelps, Savage, Origin, S. Seymour, Smart, Benjamin Stanton, Stone, Venable, Wallace, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Wildrick, Williams, and Yates—56.

NAYS.—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, Wm. Appleton, Babcock, Barrere, Bell, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Cleveland, Conger, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dean, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Evans, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, T. J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goodenow, Green, Harper, Hart, Haws, Haven, Henn, Horstford, John W. Howe, Thos. M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jackson, John Johnson, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Martin, McNair, Miller, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Murray, Newton, Oulaw, Pennington, Perkins, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Scurry, D. L. Seymour, Skelton, Stanley, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, and Welch—90.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order; and that is, whether the gentlemen who reported this bill [Mr. SEYMOUR] is not entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] was entitled to the floor until he demanded the previous question; but he is not entitled to it now. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] moves to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] certainly had a right to withdraw his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] was seeking the floor, and therefore he recognized the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON]; and, in the opinion of the Chair, this is a question about which there can be no doubt.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish merely to say, that I sought the floor, and I believe I addressed the Chair before the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only say that he never saw the gentleman from New York struggling to get the floor, as his eyes would have been turned in that direction.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Is it in order to move a call of the House? This is an important bill, and I therefore move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] desires to withdraw the previous question, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. CARTTER. I object.

Mr. STANTON. I insist upon my motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It has been the universal practice of the House to give the floor, in preference to any one else, to the gentleman who introduces a bill. That was done in this case at the start. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] called the previous question. The Chair did not expect that he wished to withdraw it, and did not see him. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] should have the floor to withdraw his motion. I withdraw the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just stated that there was a motion pending, that the House adjourn. Is that motion withdrawn?

Mr. STANTON. It is not withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of order. No business has intervened between the two motions to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Another motion was made for a call of the House. The Chair has no doubt that there has been business.

Mr. POLK demanded tellers on the motion; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now pending is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken; and a call of the House was refused.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I now ask a vote upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That is the question now before the House.

Mr. ORR. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. CARTTER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina, to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] to make a motion to recommit the bill, with a view, if the House adjourn, that it come up to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 59, noes 88.

Mr. VENABLE. I move that there be a call of the House, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTTER. The question is on laying the bill upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHASTAIN moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. VENABLE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to make a statement to the House. I am willing to make a motion to recommit the bill, if gentlemen will allow me to do so.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" and "Order!"]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. EVANS. I desire to ask a question of the Speaker, for information. If the House adjourns now, where will the bill go?

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. If it be the pleasure of the House, the Chair will respond to the interrogatory of the gentleman.

[Loud cries of "No!" "No!" and "Order!"]

Mr. CARTTER. The bill will go upon the Speaker's table; there is where it will go.

[Renewed cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was then taken on Mr. CHASTAIN's motion, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Babcock, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Dimmick, Disney, Dunham, Edmundson, Ficklin, Gilmore, Hamilton, Isam G. Harris, Hendricks, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Letcher, Mason, McMullin, McQueen, Milson, Morehead, Murphy, Phelps, Ross, Savage, Smart, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Stone, Stratton, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Addison White, Wildrick, and Williams—50.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allison, John Appleton, Wm. Appleton, Babcock, Barrere, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Cleveland, Conger, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Evans, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thos. J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Green, Harper, Hart, Haws, Haven, Horstford, John W. Howe, Thos. M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jackson, John Johnson, George G. King, Preston King, Landry, Lockhart, Mann, Martin, McNair, Miller, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Murray, Newton, Oulaw, Pennington, Perkins, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origin S. Seymour, Skelton, St. Martin, Smart, Sutherland, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Walsh, Welch, and Yates—87.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ORR. If the House will indulge me for half a minute, I think that we can relieve all parties from the difficulty in which we are placed, and adjourn.

[Loud cries of "Go on!" "Agreed!" and "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] who made that motion, is willing to withdraw it. I will withdraw the motion to lay the bill upon the table; the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] will withdraw the demand for the previous question, then move to recommit the bill, renew the demand for the previous question, and move an adjournment, without requiring the previous question to be sustained.

[Cries of "Agreed!" and "Good!" "Good!"]

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a question of order. The yeas and nays have been ordered on all those motions, and the gentlemen cannot withdraw them without unanimous consent. I object to the withdrawal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee. The gentleman is aware that an amendment can be withdrawn any time before action upon it.

Mr. SAVAGE. Not after the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it.

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. VENABLE. I ask the House to indulge me in a single remark. I moved a call of the House with no other object than to teach gentlemen that it is impossible to force this House to do business while fifty persons are determined they shall not do it. I made the motion for no other purpose than to teach gentlemen that lesson, which it seems hard for them to learn. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] had moved to recommit the bill, there would have been no objection to an adjournment. I now withdraw the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. ORR. I withdraw my motion to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I now withdraw the demand for the previous question, and move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 30, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. TOUCEY. I move that the rule requiring to-day to be devoted to the consideration of private bills, be suspended until one o'clock, as I wish to present a memorial.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no objection to devote until one o'clock to the morning business, but I shall then make a motion to suspend the order, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CASS. If there is any particular reason why private bills should be postponed, I will not say a word about it; but unless there is some particular reason, it seems to me that we ought not to postpone the consideration of private bills. It is very late in the session, and a great many cases demand our action immediately, which, if not acted upon immediately, must be postponed till the next session. But I repeat, if there is any particular reason for suspending private bills for a short time, I shall not object.

Mr. TOUCEY. My object merely is to present a memorial, and ask its reference at this time.

Mr. PRATT. I hope there will be no postponement of private bills; I hope we shall proceed to the consideration of private bills at once, without even devoting the morning hour to any other business. We have notice already that at one o'clock the Senator from Virginia will make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill; so that to-day will again be taken away from the object to which it should be devoted. I hope, therefore, the Senate will concur with me in proceeding at once to the consideration of private bills. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brooke, Butler, Charlton, Cooper, Davis, De Sauture, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Foot, Hunter, King, Mangum, Mason, Pearce, Seward, Soule, Spruance, Toucey, Upham, and Weller—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Borland, Bright, Cass, Clarke, Cluett, Downs, Hamlin, Mallory, Meriwether, Miller, Morton, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. M. P. FILLMORE, his Secretary, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 27th instant, a copy of the notes of Mr. Luis de la Rosa and J. M. Gonzales de la Vega; which was read, and,

On motion by Mr. WELLER, referred to the select committee appointed on the subject of the United States Mexican Boundary Commission.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. TOUCEY presented a memorial of James Hamilton, for himself, and in behalf of Sarah A. Hunt, Ann Barnacastle, William S. Wetmore, assignee of the trustees of the Bank of the United States, and others, praying Congress so to modify the proviso of the boundary act passed 9th September, 1850, that the creditors of Texas may file their releases separately, and receive the amounts respectively due them by the State of Texas.

On motion by Mr. TOUCEY, it was Ordered, That the memorial be referred to a select committee, consisting of five members, to be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. TOUCEY, Mr. SOULE, Mr. FOOT, Mr. MASON, and Mr. SEWARD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BRIGHT subsequently moved to reconsider the vote by which the memorial was referred to a select committee; which motion was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COOPER presented a petition of P. Wideman and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the "homestead bill" may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a remonstrance of the citizens of Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, against the further extension of Woodworth's patent for a planing machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition of Truman Gilbert and others, citizens of Connecticut, praying that the "homestead bill" may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Connecticut, praying the passage of the "homestead bill," which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HUNTER presented a memorial of the laborers employed in the State Department, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHARLTON presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Savannah, Georgia, praying that an appropriation may be made for surveying the Chinese seas and the whaling region of the North Pacific; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SOULE presented the memorial of Henry Johnson, executor of Philo B. Johnson, deceased, praying indemnity for spoliation committed by the Mexican authorities on the schooner Constitution, of which the deceased was master; which was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of J. J. B. Walbach, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying repayment of his expenses in returning home, sick, from the United States ship St. Mary's, on the Pacific station; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BORLAND. I present the petition of a large number of merchants and other respectable citizens and professional men, residing at Memphis, Tennessee, and that region of country, praying the establishment of lines of mail steamers between Louisville and New Orleans, connecting the shallow and deep navigation at Memphis. The object sought by the petitioners in this case was presented to the Senate by myself, a month or two ago, and the subject was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. That committee has reported a bill accomplishing the object in view. I will not, therefore, ask a reference of the memorial, but move that it be received and laid on the table. I wish merely to say to the Senate, that at a very early day I shall move to call up that bill which has been reported by the committee, and ask the action of the Senate upon it.

The petition was laid upon the table.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Davis, widow of Daniel W. Davis, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill to repeal an act entitled "An act concerning tonnage duty on Spanish vessels," reported it back without amendment; and on his motion the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 1st of April, relating to the subject, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which were referred the President's message of the 28th instant, and the documents accompanying it, concerning the right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, with a view to examine into the propriety of printing them, have examined them as far as practicable, and instructed me to say that, in their judgment, it would be desirable to print all the documents; they are not voluminous. I move, accordingly, that the President's message and the documents accompanying it, relating to the Tehuantepec treaty, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. P. B. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill for the relief of Cornelius Covert, of Michigan.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE LAWS AND DEBATES OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PEARCE. I am instructed by the Joint Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution from the House of Representatives "providing for the distribution of the laws of Congress, and the debates thereon," to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I will state for the information of the Senate, that though the title of the resolution seems to bring it within the cognizance of the Joint Committee on the Library, the subject-matter does not. It is a resolution which provides that the Congressional Globe, in which the laws and debates of Congress are reported, shall pass through the mails free of postage. The subject-matter of it properly belongs to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Therefore I am directed to move that the Joint Committee on the Library be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we had better put the joint resolution upon its passage. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, supposing the matter would have been referred to them, has given it a consideration and it meets their approbation. I apprehend there can be no objection to it. I move that it be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT. It cannot be put upon its passage in this stage of the resolution. The question is on discharging the Joint Committee on the Library from its further consideration, and referring it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I ask a division of the question; first that it be taken on discharging the Joint Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be divided. Will the Senate discharge the Committee on the Library from the further consideration of the resolution?

The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that the joint resolution be now put upon its passage; and for that purpose I move to postpone all prior orders that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution as in Committee of the Whole. It is as follows:

With a view to the cheap circulation of the laws of Congress and the debates contributing to the true interpretation thereof, and to make free the communication between the representative and constituent bodies:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the present session of Congress the Congressional Globe and Appendix, which contain the laws and the debates thereon, shall pass free through the mails so long as the same shall be published by order of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the circulation of the Daily Globe free of postage.

Mr. PEARCE. It seems to me that the resolution is of doubtful propriety. It is true that the Globe, which it proposes to send free of postage, is not a political newspaper. It is true that it publishes nothing but the debates of Congress, and the laws which we pass. But, then, it is also true that it is a private enterprise. Each House of Congress subscribes for a certain number of copies of the Congressional Globe, for the use of their members. Those copies each member, as he receives them, may frank, as he pleases; and we do frank them. But it is proposed, now, that this paper shall pass through the mails free to all subscribers in every part of the country. Although this work does not come into competition with any other paper, it is very doubtful to me whether, if we give this privilege to the Globe, we shall not be importuned—and with some show of reason, perhaps—to grant the same privilege to other papers. We shall be told that they are papers of eminent public utility; that they are not connected with politics at all. If it be not a public document, I do not see how we can make the discrimination without extending the same privilege to other papers. I think, perhaps, the Senate are going a little too precipitately about it. My only object in saying a word now, is to call the attention of Senators to it, that they may understand what they are voting upon, and consider whether it is altogether proper. I doubt it myself.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I am sorry to have to differ in opinion from the Senator from Maryland on this subject, but I think he has put this resolution upon a ground upon which it really does not and should not stand. It is not a proposition to give to the proprietor of the Congressional Globe the privilege of circulating his paper free of postage; but it is a proposition to disseminate the laws which we enact here, and the discussions upon them, which make up their true interpretation, freely among the people, who are interested in these laws, and in those discussions. We are every day ordering the publication of public documents, and we are circulating them by thousands and hundreds of thousands, in the form of books, all over the country. Now, sir, if it be proper to circulate matter of that sort, which, by the order of either House of Congress, is published and deemed of interest to the people of the country, it must certainly be of equal, and I deem it of far greater importance, to circulate freely among the people the laws themselves, and all the discussions which go to enable, or in any way help them to interpret the laws—to understand them properly, in all their bearings, and the objects in view in their passage. We are paying annually many thousands of dollars for the publication of the laws alone in the different States in the Union, in various newspapers. I do not know how many thousands we expend in this way, but it is a great many. That is a very proper object upon which to expend the public money. I would, if I could, have the laws of the United States published in every newspaper in the Union, so that all the people might see them, and fairly understand them. This, then, is a proposition to carry out that good object. It is not only to present freely and fully before the people the laws, but all we say in regard to them; not only to enable the people to acquire a thorough knowledge of the laws themselves, but to look to the conduct of their representatives in the two Houses of Congress, to enable them to see the considerations which govern them, and be able to hold them to a just accountability, so that it will not be in the power either of the representatives themselves to impose upon their constituents, or of those who may choose to undertake to misrepresent the representatives, to succeed in so base an object. It will give a fair exposition before the people of the country of the proceedings of their representatives.

Mr. BUTLER. So far as regards the laws of the United States, if they could be separated from the debates in this resolution, I concur entirely in the views expressed by the Senator from Arkansas. But, I object to allowing a private newspaper go free of postage, because it publishes the debates. My friend says that they are the key to the interpretation of the laws. That is not so, sir. If I wanted to understand one of the laws of Congress, I believe the last way in which I would approach it, would be through the debates that have nothing to do with it. Is it not notorious, that one question is up, and another debated in the other House, particularly, and sometimes in this? I think the title of this joint resolution, had better be one for the encouragement of public speaking, and for the propagation of a great deal of bad speeches. I am satisfied, that the best thing which is done in Congress, is the speaking. If we were to speak altogether, as I have heard a distinguished man say, and pass no laws, I do not know but what it would be the best employment of Congress. But, it would be the very worst use of the public money, to appropriate it for the purpose of spreading and communicating this species of literature—a kind of literature very little instructive, and, in my opinion, not much listened to in Congress, and which, I think, ought not to be read much out of it, except in a few instances. If we had a censor, to circulate the few good speeches, I would be very willing to make this publication of them. But, we cannot do that. I wish there were no reporters. It would be better if there were none. And, then let the newspapers, like the bee, extract what is good, and exclude what is bad. Let the best editors come here and take what they choose; but let not reports go out by the wholesale, and be the vehicle for all sorts of communications. If a man wants to publish a treatise on any subject,—on the fisheries, or whales, or whalebone, or anything else, all he has got to do, is, to select his subject, deliver his speech here, and it makes quite a little book, and he may have it bound and published at the public expense. Any one who wants a theme, can select it in this Chamber or in the other House,—take any subject—chemistry, philosophy, &c., and make his speech and publish it in the Globe, and there is his book. I have only to say, that I agree with my friend from Maryland, that I think we ought to postpone this. I cannot agree to extend, because I think it an abuse of our power, the privilege of circulating that kind of matter free through the mails.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senate have seen fit to adopt a system to provide for reporting the debates. The House have adopted a similar system. They have made contracts with the individual who publishes the Congressional Globe, and, under those contracts, he is compelled to report the proceedings of both branches of Congress. By the existing postage law, those reports are excluded from the mail. They are absolutely excluded, unless the postage is paid in advance, at such enormous rates as actually to exclude them. It is not a newspaper. There is no description of that paper in the existing postage law, which allows it to go through the post office, except as printed matter paid in advance. If, then, there is importance enough attached to the subject to induce Congress to provide for the reporting of their proceedings, I apprehend those reports should be circulated through the country.

I attach somewhat more importance to them than the Senator from South Carolina. I think, however, much of evil may be attached to the excess of debate; but we should be very much worse off if we were to circumscribe it, or stop it, which would be virtually stopping, in that respect, the freedom of speech. I hope the joint resolution will commend itself to the favorable consideration of the Senate, as it has to that of the House. Having taken such steps as we have taken to procure reports, I think we do no more than justice to the community by providing for the free dissemination of the debates through the mails. We all of us need watching. I think, if we bring the eyes of the people upon us, they will at least do no harm. I think that very much good will arise from the free and extensive dissemination of the doings of both branches of Congress. I hope the resolution will receive the favorable action of the Senate.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, the proposition, as I understand it, is to circulate, free of charge, through the mails, the Congressional Globe and Appendix, which contain the proceedings of Congress. It strikes me that there are two decided objections to the resolution. The first is, that you should not only report and print, at the public expense, the debates of Congress, but extend it still further and circulate them free; because to circulate them free of charge is to circulate them at the public expense. I think we went very far in calling upon the Treasury to pay for the reporting and printing of the debates of the Senate, and now, to circulate them at the expense of the Treasury, seems to me to be transcending our proper duty to the people we represent.

But there is another and even stronger objection. It is, that this resolution gives an undue preference to the owners of that paper over the owners of other papers. It must follow, if this paper is circulated without charge, that it will invite a subscription with which other papers cannot compete. It will be lending the bounty of the Government to benefit and enrich that paper. If the objection exists, as the honorable Senator says, that it cannot now be carried through the mails like other papers, because it is not within the class of newspapers provided for in the postage law, let the law be changed in that respect, and make it a newspaper. Further than that I cannot go.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, there is one view of this subject which induces me to vote for the resolution. The debates of the Senate are now published in one party paper, the Union; and they are published also in the Congressional Globe. As far as one of the two great parties of the country is concerned, its members are subscribers to this party paper, and get the debates of Congress; but the party to which I am attached do not generally subscribe for it; and they are excluded entirely from perusing the debates of this and the other branch of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. It is their own fault. The Intelligencer had the same privilege and renounced it.

Mr. PRATT. The gentleman says it is the fault of the Whigs. I am sure there is no one attached to the party to which I belong, who would not have desired the Intelligencer to continue the publication of the debates. But its proprietors have refused to publish them; and, therefore, there is now no Whig paper in the country publishing in full the debates of this and the other branch of Congress. That great portion, therefore, of the American people who are Whigs are excluded, by the present law, from participating in the advantages which the other party have in seeing the debates.

There is another answer, I think, to the argument of my friend from Virginia. He says, that it is giving an advantage to this paper over all others. I do not look upon it in that light. This paper is not like any other. It is not a party paper. It contains nothing on earth but the debates of Congress. It excludes everything else. It, therefore, does not stand upon a footing with any other paper. It is said, by the Senator from Maine, who made the motion to take up the resolution, and who is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that by the existing postage law, it cannot be sent through the country, because the postage is so high; therefore, none, or very few, subscribe to it; consequently, we are paying the enormous expense of having the debates published, and by the existing postage law, we exclude the people of the country from subscribing to the paper. Now, I think it will not be a very great incumbrance to the Post Office Department to have this paper sent free of charge; and therefore I shall vote for the joint resolution with a great deal of pleasure.
